TO THE

E P I S T L E S.*

THE New Testament may be very properly divided into two parts, one Historical, the other Epistolary. The exposition of the latter we now enter upon; and shall offer some thoughts on the epistolary way of writing in general, and then proceed to observe the divine authority of these Epistles, together with the style, matter, method, and design of them; † leaving what might be said concerning the several inspired penmen to the prefaces appertaining to the particular Epistles.

Epistolary writing has usually three properties; it is more difficult to be understood, but very profitable, and very pleasant: these will be found to be the properties of these sacred letters. Where we cannot so well discover the particular occasions on which they were written, or the questions or matters of fact to which they refer, they will be difficult: but we shall find the strongest reasoning, the most moving expostulations, and warm and pressing exhortations, mixed with seasonable cautions and reproofs, which are all admirably fitted to impress the mind with suitable sentiments and affections. And how much solid pleasure and delight must this afford to persons of a serious and religious spirit, especially when they wisely and faithfully apply to themselves what they find to suit their case! And how then should we prize this part of holy Scripture, when we consider herein that our God and Savior has written these letters to us, in which we have the great things of his Law and Gospel, the things that belong to our peace! By these means not only the holy apostles, being dead, yet speak, but the Lord of the prophets and apostles continues to speak and write to us; and while we read them with proper affections, and follow them with suitable petitions and thanksgiving, a blessed correspondence and intercourse will be kept up between heaven and us.

But it is the divine inspiration and authority of these Epistles we are especially concerned to know, and be fully established in. And because such has been the universally received opinion of all Christians in all ages of the church, and for the same reasons that lead us to acknowledge the other parts of the Bible to be the Word of God, we must own these to be so too, 1 Cor. 14:37. If there be good reason, as indeed there is, to believe that the books of Moses were written by inspiration of God, there is the same to believe that the writings of the prophets were also from God; nor can any person, who pretends to believe the divine authority of the historical part of the N. T. containing the Gospels and the Acts, with good reason question the equal authority of the epistolary part; for the subject-matter of all these Epistles, as well as of the sermons of the apostles, is the Word of God, Rom. 10:17. 1 Thess. 2:13. Col. 1:25. and the Gospel of God, Rom. 15:16. 2 Cor. 11:7. and the Gospel of Christ, 2 Cor. 2:12. The apostles confirmed what Christ Himself began to teach, God also bearing them witness, Heb. 2:3, 4. and it was the will of our blessed Lord, that his apostles should not only publish his Gospel, but also, after his resurrection, should declare some things more plainly concerning Him, than He thought fit to do while on earth; for which end He promised to send, and accordingly did send (Acts 2:) his Holy Spirit to teach them all things, to bring all things to their remembrance which He had spoken unto them, John 14:26. John 16:12, 13.

That in preaching the Gospel, they were under the influence of the infallible Spirit, is undeniable, from the miraculous gifts and powers they received for their work, particularly that gift of tongues, so necessary for the publication of the Gospel throughout the world, to nations of different languages; nor must we omit that mighty power that accompanied the Word preached, bringing multitudes to the obedience of faith, notwithstanding all opposition from earth and hell, and the potent lusts in the hearts of those who were turned from idols to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven.

Now that they were under the same mighty influence in writing these Epistles, as in preaching, cannot be denied, considering that these Epistles were written to remind them of those things that had been delivered by word of mouth, 2 Pet. 1:15. and to rectify the mistakes that might arise about some expressions that had been used in preaching, 2 Thess. 2:2. and were to remain with them, as a standing rule and record to which they were to appeal, for defending the truth and discovering error, and a proper mean to transmit the truths of the Gospel to posterity, even to the end of time.

Besides, the writers of these Epistles have declared, that what they wrote was from God: and they are careful, when they speak their own private opinion, or only under some common influence, to tell the world, that not the Lord, but they, spake those things, but that in the rest it was not they, but the Lord, 1 Cor. 7:10, 12, &c. And the apostle Paul makes the acknowledgment of this, their inspiration, to be a test to try those that pretended to be prophets or spiritual: Let them, says he, acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord, 1 Cor. 14:37. And the apostle Peter gives this as the reason of his writing, that those he wrote to might, after his decease, have those things always in remembrance, 2 Pet. 1:15. which afterward he calls the commandment of the apostles of the Lord, ch. 3:1, 2. and so of the Lord Himself. And the apostle John declareth, 1 John 4:6. We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us; by this we know the Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

As to the style of these Epistles, it may be allowed, that the penmen of them made use of their own reasoning powers and different endowments in their manner of writing, as well as of their different sorts of chirography; and that by this we are to account for that difference of style, which has been observed between the writings of Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and those of Peter and John, who were fishermen. The like difference may be discerned between the style of the prophet Isaiah, who was educated in a court, and that of Amos, who was one of the herdsmen of Tekoa. However, we must believe, that these holy men spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, that He put them on, and assisted them, in this work, and always infallibly guided them into all truth, both when they expounded the Scriptures of the O. T., and when they gave rules for our faith and practice in the gospel-church state.

The subject-matter of these Epistles is entirely conformable to the rest of the Scriptures: in them we find frequent reference to some passages of the O. T., and explanations of them; in the Epistle to the Hebrews, we have the best exposition of the Levitical law. Indeed the N. T. refers to, and in a manner builds upon, the Old, showing the accomplishment of all the ancient promises and proph-entertain his family and friends, in his delightful work of opening the Scriptures.

† If anywhere some things in the comment do not seem to flow so naturally and necessarily from the text, we believe, when they are well considered and compared, it will appear they come under the analogy and general reason of the subject, and truly belong to it. If there be any that think this exposition too plain and familiar, that it wants the beauties of oratory, and the strength of criticism; we only wish they will read it over again with due attention, and we are pretty confident, they will find the style natural, clear, and comprehensive: and we think they will hardly be able to produce one valuable criticism out of the most learned commentators, but they will have it in this exposition, though couched in plain terms, and not brought in as of a critical nature. No man was more happy than Mr. Henry in that useful talent of making dark things plain, while too many, that value themselves on their criticising faculty, affect rather to make plain things dark.

En.

‡ In the Acts of the Apostles, a history, or specimen, is given of the manner, in which the apostles and their fellow-laborers fulfilled the former part of their risen Lord's commission, given to them just before his ascension, 'Go ye therefore and teach' (or make disciples of) 'all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' In the epistles is more fully shown the particulars, and the way, in which they executed the latter part of it; 'Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.' Mat. 28:19, 20. Mark 16:14-16. The former therefore is more exactly suited to the case of missionaries, and persons in similar circumstances: the latter to stationary pastors and their flocks, as far as they are true believers. Both, however, are essentially requisite to an accurate and comprehensive view of Christianity, and of the office and duties of its ministers.

SCOTT.

* The continuators and compilers of Henry, thus remark: 'After much expectation, and many inquiries, the last volume of the late reverend Mr. Henry's Exposition now appears. The common disadvantages that attend posthumous productions, will doubtless be discerned in this; but we hope, though there are diversities of gifts, there will be found to be the same spirit. Some of the relations and hearers of that excellent person, have been at the pains of transcribing the notes they took in short-hand of this part of the Holy Scripture, when expounded by him in his family, or in the congregation; they have furnished us with very good materials for the finishing this great work; and we doubt not but that the ministers who have been concerned in it, have made the use of those assistances, which may entitle this composition to the honor of Mr. Henry's name; and if so, they can very willingly conceal their own.'

† It is now about fourteen years since the first part of this exposition of the Bible was made public; in five years' time the O. T. was finished in four volumes. The first of the N. T. was longer in hand; for though the ever-memorable author was always fully employed in the ordinary work of his ministry, yet those last years of his life, in which he drew up this exposition on the historical part of the N. T., were less at his own command than any other had been; his removal to Hackney, his almost continual preaching from day to day, his journeys to Chester, and the necessity of more frequent visits to his friends in and about London, together with a gradual, sensible decay of health, will more than excuse the three years' time that passed before that was finished. And under such difficulties, none but a man of his holy zeal, unwearied industry, and great sagacity, could have gone through such a service in that space of time. He lived not to see that volume published, though left by him ready for the press. The church of God was suddenly deprived of one of the most useful ministers of the age. We have now been gathering up the fragments of those feasts with which he used to ecies concerning the Messiah, and explains all the antiquated types and shadows of the good things that were then to come. But beside these references to the preceding part of Holy Writ, in some of these Epistles there are contained prophecies, either wholly new, or at least more largely and plainly revealed, as that in the Revelation, concerning the rise, reign, and fall of Antichrist, of which great apostasy we have some account in 2 Thess. 2:3, 4. and in 1 Tim. 4:1—3. And in these Epistles we have several of the great doctrines of the Gospel more fully discussed than elsewhere, particularly the doctrine of original sin, of the sin that dwells in the regenerate, and of justification by the righteousness of Christ, of the abolishing of the Jewish rites and ceremonies, of the true nature and design of the seals of the new covenant, the obligations they bring us under, and their perpetual use in the Christian church.*

The general method of these Epistles is such, as best serves the end and design of them, which is indeed the end of the whole Scripture,—practical godliness, out of a principle of divine love, a good conscience, and faith unfeigned; accordingly, most of the Epistles begin with the great doctrines of the Gospel, and after these, practical conclusions are drawn and urged from them. In taking this method, regard is had to the nature and faculties of the soul of man, where the understanding is to lead the way, the will, affections, and executive powers to follow after; and to the nature of religion in general, which is a reasonable service; that we are not to be determined by superstitious fancies, nor by blind passions, but by a sound judgment, and good understanding in the mind and will of God; by this we are taught how necessary it is that faith and practice, truth and holiness, be joined together; that the performance of moral duties will never be acceptable to God, or available to our own salvation, without the belief of the truth; and the most solemn profession of the faith will never save those, that hold the truth in unrighteousness.

The particular occasions on which these Epistles were written, do not so evidently appear in them all as in some. The first to the Corinthians, seems to have taken its rise, from the unhappy divisions that so early rose in the churches of Christ, through the emulation of the ministers, and personal affections of the people; but it does not confine itself to that subject. That to the Galatians, seems directed chiefly against those judaizing teachers, that went about to draw the Gentile converts away from the simplicity of the Gospel, in doctrine and worship. The Epistle to the Hebrews is manifestly calculated to wean the converted Jews from those Mosaic rites and ceremonies they retained too great a fondness for, and to reconcile them to the abolition of that economy. Those Epistles that are directed to particular persons, more evidently carry their design in them, which he that runs may read.

But this is certain, none of these Epistles are of private interpretation; † most of the Pss. and of the prophecies of the O. T., were penned or pronounced on particular occasions, yet they are of standing and universal use, and very instructive even to us, on whom the ends of the world are come. And so are those Epistles that seem to have been most limited in their rise and occasion.

There will always be need enough to warn Christians against uncharitable divisions, against corrupting the faith and worship of the Gospel: and whenever the case is the same, those Epistles are as certainly directed to such churches and persons, as if they had been inscribed to them.

HENRY.

The Epistles are letters, written either to individuals, to particular churches, or to several churches; or they are catholic [universal] Epistles, i. e. circular letters to the churches in general. It is supposed they were all written by one or other of the apostles; and excepting the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Epistles ascribed to John, each has the name of an apostle prefixed to it. The apostle Paul's name is affixed to 13 Epistles, and the Epistle to the Hebrews has generally been ascribed to him: that of Peter, to two; those of James and Jude, to one each. Now, if they were actually written by the apostles, what shadow of reason can there be in the opinion, which numbers maintain, that they are not to be considered as of equal authority with the Gospels? The Gospels, indeed, record the words and actions of Christ; but the human testimony, by which these words and actions were recorded, might even be thought inferior to that of the Epistles; for neither Mark nor Luke were apostles: and we have as full proof, that the Epistles were divinely inspired, as that the Gospels were: and where are we to look for the full and explicit declarations of 'the whole counsel of God,' but in the writings of those, whom the Lord Jesus selected as the depositaries of his truths; to whom He gave 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven;' to whom He promised to give the Holy Spirit, 'to teach them all things, and lead them into all truth;' and whom

'He sent,' to make known his Gospel, even 'as the Father had sent Him?' Mat. 16:19. John 14:25, 26. 20:19—23. vv. 21—23. If the doctrine of the apostles was the unadulterated and entire truth of God, and altogether of Divine authority, as they preached it; why should it not be so when they committed it to writing? and if it was not the unadulterated entire truth, but either redundant or defective; then Christianity was corrupted or mutilated, even from the first. It must also be observed, that it is impossible, that we can know what the apostles preached, except from what they themselves wrote, or what others wrote concerning them: and can we suppose that their own writings are of less authority, than the writings of others on the same subject? If there be any ground for making this distinction, between the Gospels and the apostolical writings, how is the church 'built on the foundation of apostles and prophets?' Eph. 2:19—22. Rev. 21:9—21, v. 14. Hence then it follows, that what the apostles have delivered in these Epistles, as necessary to be believed or done by Christians, must be as necessary to be believed and practised, in order to salvation, as what was personally taught by Christ Himself, and is contained in the Gospels. Whitby.

Most of the Epistles, especially those of Paul, were written to those churches, the planting of which is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles: and the history so entirely coincides with them, even in the most minute particulars, and evidently without the least design or aim at coincidence; that the more carefully they are examined, and compared with the history, the more evident will it appear, that both are indisputably genuine. This has been clearly shown by the learned Dr. Paley, in his Horæ Paulinæ: and I am decidedly of opinion, that all the genius, sagacity, and care of any number of the most able men who ever lived, would be absolutely insufficient to forge a history, and a number of Epistles, so manifestly frank, artless, and often immethodical; and yet to make the one so completely to confirm the other. If ever books had such internal evidence of being genuine, that no reasonable man, after a diligent examination of them, could doubt of it, these are the books. But if the Epistles be genuine, they must be inspired, and also prove the divine original of Christianity.—Our Lord not only foretold his own death and resurrection, and that before the destruction of Jerusalem, and that in that generation the Gospel should be very extensively preached; but He promised to invest his apostles and disciples with miraculous powers, and especially with the gift of tongues, in order to accomplish this object.—'Now was anything of this nature ever undertaken, or laid as the foundation of their credit, by any other authors of any doctrine, religion, sect, or heresy? Did they ever make their own violent death, and resurrection, the foundation of their veracity? Or promise the like powers and assistances when they were risen, to those who should promote, or should embrace their doctrine? Or was not that, which no man else durst undertake, performed by the holy Jesus so effectually, as that his doctrine presently prevailed, and was received throughout the world, in spite of all the opposition of men and devils made against it; and wrought in Christians such a lasting faith, as time, and vice, though most concerned to do it, was never able to deface?' Whitby.—To the fulfilment of these promises, the apostles, especially Paul, in these Epistles, continually refer, as to facts most certainly known, by those to whom they wrote; and which none could deny or question. They appeal to the churches, whether they themselves had not exercised these miraculous gifts among them, nay, conferred them on others: they argue with them, from these gifts, as to the truth of their doctrine, when heretics perverted it; they appeal to these gifts, as deciding between them and their opposers; they lay down rules, for the behavior of the churches in respect of them; and they sharply reprove several instances of misconduct in this particular. Can it then be doubted, that, supposing the Epistles genuine, these miraculous gifts were publicly exercised and conferred, and that all knew them to be so? And if this were the fact, was not the promise of Christ fulfilled? Is not Christianity from God? And can it be supposed, that the writers, who exercised and conferred these powers, in so conspicuous a manner, were left to themselves, without the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in addressing the churches on the most important subjects, and transmitting their doctrine to posterity?

The Epistles, in general, are written in language, which shows, that if genuine, they must have been known by the churches, to which they were addressed, during the life of the writers: but can it be supposed, that such facts were spoken of as undeniable, during the lives of the writers; and yet, that no one of their opposers, either heretics or persecutors, (not to say their friends,) knowing that no such facts had taken place, should stand forth publicly to he can only on some incidental matters deduce instruction from them. In general, if the various terms, used in Scripture concerning Israel as a nation, be in the same, or nearly the same sense to be applied to Christians under the N. T., where is the type and the antitype? Where is 'the true Israel,' as distinguished from 'Israel after the flesh?' And where are we to learn either the character, privileges, or duties of true believers? SCOTT.

*The peculiar doctrines of the Gospel are here more explicitly stated and explained, and their practical tendency more argumentatively shown, than in the historical books. The distinguishing truths, here laid down, have been kept in view through the whole of the preceding exposition: and it will therefore be unnecessary formally to answer those, who have endeavored to reconcile this part of the Scripture, with systems of a contrary nature and tendency. It may, however, be proper to say, that the author has considered, with much attention, both Dr. Taylor's key to the Epistle to the Romans, and the eminent Mr. Loeke's comment on several of the epistles: but, deeply convinced, that both of these publications 'darken counsel by words without knowledge;'

†Nor has anything ever yet been devised, more suited to render 'the Word of God of no effect,' than the notion, that we have little or nothing to do with this and the other part of Scripture, and can conclude nothing general from it, because it was 'written on a particular occasion.' Id.

PREFACE TO THE EPISTLES.

deny or confute them?—It is also undeniable, that most of the Epistles were known, at a very early period, to other churches, as the writings of the apostles whose names they bear. In a short time, translations were made of them into other languages, copious quotations were taken from them, and homilies, or expositions, were made on them. The churches, with one consent, acknowledged them as the Word of God; and neither heretics, schismatics, nor opposers of the Gospel, denied that they were the genuine writings of the apostles, and the standard records of Christianity. But had these Epistles, bearing the name of this or the other apostle, been brought forward after their death, when no one, either in the church specially addressed, or in other churches, had ever before heard of them; can it be conceived, but that they would have been rejected as spurious? It is evident the claim would have been absurd, and the imposture manifest. Had they not been known during the life of the writers; at what time, or in what manner, could it have been possible to palm them on the church, and obtain them the credit of apostolical writings?

The Epistle to the Hebrews, not bearing the name of Paul; that of James, which it seems at that time, as well as in later ages, was supposed irreconcilable with the doctrine of Paul; the second Epistle of Peter, which, probably, was written just before his martyrdom, and was not generally known till after his death; and the second and third Epistles of John, in which he only styles himself 'the elder,' were not for some time received by the churches, as genuine; but this shows the scrupulous caution of the primitive Christians in this respect; and further inquiry, together with internal evidence, at length obtained the admission of them into the sacred canon. (Pref. to Heb., Ja., 2 Pet. and 1. 2. 3. Jn.) Yet very many writings, which, in some places, and for a time, were admitted as apostolical and divine, were afterwards, on fuller investigation, rejected, and most of them have sunk into oblivion.

The epistolary part of the N. T., while it shows, more fully than even the historical, the accomplishment of the ancient prophecies, concerning the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, contains also many remarkable prophecies, several of which have already received as remarkable an accomplishment; but some still remain to be fulfilled. (Rom. 11. 2 Thess. 2:1—12. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—5. 2 Pet. 2:3.) This also constitutes an irrefragable proof, that they were written by inspiration.

Finally, it will appear, as we proceed, that the writers of these Epistles speak of themselves, and of each other, as authoritatively delivering the truth and will of God to mankind. Even the exceptions, (as they are supposed to be,) in a few instances, more undeniably established the general rule: for why should an apostle intimate, that he only gave his own opinion, and not a divine and authoritative injunction, in a particular case; unless conscious, and unless demanding his readers to allow, that in all other cases he 'spoke as moved by the Holy Ghost?' But if they advanced these claims, what alternative is there, between admitting them to the full extent, or decidedly rejecting them? That is, What alternative is there, between receiving the apostolical Epistles, as the infallible Word of God, and the standard of truth and duty; and wholly rejecting them, as bold impostures? Had no such claims been advanced; it might have been allowed, that they were good men, right on the whole, yet erroneous in some things: yet on this supposition where shall we find a divine standard of Christianity? But as the case is, either they are infallibly right, their doctrine divine, their writings the standard by which all other doctrines must be tried; or they claim for themselves, and each other, what they had no right to claim. I would be very cautious, in venturing on this ground; but I am fully persuaded, and often feel most deeply grieved by the assurance, that far more injury is done to the cause of truth, by a half-hearted allowance, that the Epistles (or other parts of Scripture) are genuine, authentic, and instructive, but possibly in some things erroneous, than by all the open attacks of infidels. For these plausible statements leave us no standard of truth and duty; no way of discriminating between true doctrine and heresy; no divinely appointed exhibition of the Christian religion, with which all other exhibitions must be compared and tried. Sc.

NUMBER, ORDER, PLACES, AND DATES, OF THE EPISTLES.

The 21 Epistles, or Letters, of the N. T. are generally divided into two classes, viz.

I. Epistles of Paul, (in number 14.)

Among the Epistles to Churches, that to the Romans stands first, because Rome was the chief city of the Roman empire; this is followed by the 2 Epistles to the Corinthians, because Corinth was a large, polite, and renowned city. To them succeeds that to the Galatians, of Galatia, a region of Asia Minor, with several churches. Next follows the Epistle to the Ephesians, because Ephesus was the chief city of Asia Minor, strictly so called. Afterwards come the Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians; for which order Dr. Lardner can assign no other probable reason than this, viz. that Philippi was a Roman colony, and, therefore, the Epistle to the Philippians was placed before those to the Colossians and Thessalonians, whose cities were not distinguished by any particular circumstance. He also thinks it not unlikely, that the shortness of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, especially of the 2d, caused them to be placed last among the letters addressed to churches, though in point of time they are the earliest of Paul's Epistles.

Among the Epistles to particular persons, those to Timothy have the precedence, as he was a favorite disciple of Paul, and also because those Epistles are the largest and fullest. To them succeeds that to Titus, who was an evangelist; and that to Philemon is placed last, as he was supposed to have been only a private Christian. Last of all comes the Epistle to the Hebrews, because its authenticity was doubted for some time (though without any foundation, as will be shown in a subsequent page. [See Horne]); Dr. L. also thinks it was the last written of all Paul's Epistles.

Some have proposed to arrange Paul's Epistles in the order of time; but, 1. The order of their dates has not yet been satisfactorily or unanimously settled; and 2. Very considerable difficulty will attend the alteration of that order which has been adopted in all the editions and versions of the N. T. As it is the order of Eusebius' time, the 3d cent., and probably Irenæus', of the 2d cent., it is the most ancient: and according to Dr. L. the best. As, however, the order of time is important in many respects, it is given. For the dates, see Dr. L. [and Horne.]

II. The Catholic Epistles, (in number 7.)

These contain the letters of the apostles James, Peter, John, and Jude. They are termed Catholic, i. e. general or universal, because they are not addressed to the believers of some particular city or country, or to individuals, as Paul's epistles were, but to Christians in general, or to Christians of several countries.

AN EXPOSITION
WITH

(Horne's Exposition, completed by J. Evans, D. D.)

PAUL's natural parts, I doubt not, were very pregnant. his apprehension quick and piercing, his expression fluent and copious, his affections, wherever he took, very warm and zealous, and his resolutions no less bold and daring: this made him, before his conversion, a very keen and bitter persecutor; but, when converted and sanctified, the most skilful, zealous, preacher; never any better fitted to win souls, nor more successful.*

* In all his writings we perceive evident proofs of a sound judgment, a talent for close reasoning, a lively imagination, and fervent affections: sometimes, yet not so often by far as many have supposed, he induces a measure of obscurity, by long parentheses. All his abilities and endowments, however, were directed and superintended by the Spirit of inspiration. SCORR.

The form and character of Paul's epistles, however peculiar, appear to have been derived from the circumstances of his early life. Tarsus, where he was born, and where his parents dwelt, was, in that age, a celebrated seat of learning. But, in every seat of ancient learning, eloquence held a principal rank; and each species of it was denominated from the place where it was most practiced, or in the greatest perfection. Thus we read of the chaste Attic eloquence, and of the florid Asiatic; and Tarsus, also, gave name to its peculiar mode. The last is, indeed, the least known; because, from the very nature of it, its productions were not likely to remain. The Tarsic eloquence was employed in sudden and unprepared harangues. And Paul, long accustomed to compositions of this sort, transferred the style and manner from speaking to writing. He seems to have written his epistles with the force of a speaker; not opening the way to his subject, nor advancing gradually towards it, but rushing into it. Little solicitous about method, he is often drawn from his design by the accidental use of an expression or a word; and neither when he quits his purpose, nor when he returns to it again, does he employ the usual forms of transition. Sometimes he assumes another person, and introduces a kind of dialogue: in which it is not always easy to distinguish who is speaking, the objector or answerer. Lastly, he abounds with broken sentences, bold figures, and hard, far-fetched metaphors. These peculiarities in the apostle's manner, occasion continual difficulties, and, therefore, could not escape the notice of his commentators; of whom, the most rational impute them to such a warm temper, and a mind so full of religious [and controversial] knowledge, that his thoughts seem to strive for utterance, and his zeal suffers him to attend to nothing but the great mysteries revealed to him. But what they excuse as the effect of fervent zeal, and plentiful knowledge, either necessarily belongs to unprepared discourses, or may be admitted into them without blame. He who speaks on a sudden, cannot make those regular approaches to his principal design, nor dispose his matter in that exact order which we find in studied compositions. He may safely pass from one subject, or one person, to another, without the ceremonies which a reader requires, but which a speaker supplies the want of by his countenance, his voice, and every motion of his body. And those agitations of mind, which, in numerous assemblies, are mutually excited by

PREFACE TO THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

Fourteen of his epistles we have in the canon of Scripture; many more, probably, he wrote, which might be profitable enough, but, not being given by inspiration of God, they were not received as canonical Scripture, nor handed down to us. Six epistles, said to be Paul's, written to Seneca, and eight of Seneca's to him, are spoken of by some of the ancients, (Sixt. Senens. Biblioth. Sanct. lib. 2.) and are extant; but, on the view, they appear spurious and counterfeit.

This Epistle to the Romans is placed first, not because of the priority of its date, but because of the superlative excellency of the epistle, it being one of the longest and fullest of all, and, perhaps, because of the dignity of the place to which it is written. Chrysostom would have this epistle read over to him twice a week. It is gathered from some passages in it, that it was written A. D. 56, from Corinth, while Paul made a short stay here, in his way to Troas, Acts 20:5, 6. He commendeth to the Romans, Phebe, a servant of the church at Cenchrea, ch. 16. which was a place belonging to Corinth. He calls Gaius his host, or the man with whom he lodged, ch. 16:23. and he was a Corinthian, not the same with Gaius of Derbe, mentioned Acts 20. Paul was now going up to Jerusalem, with the money given to the poor saints there, ch. 16:26.

The great mysteries treated of in this epistle, must needs produce in this, as in other writings of Paul, many things dark, and hard to be understood, 2 Pet. 3:16. The method of this, as of several other of the epistles, is observable; the former part of it doctrinal, in the first eleven chs.; the latter part practical, in the last five: to inform the judgment, and to reform the life. And the best way to understand the truths explained in the former part, is to abide and abound in the practice of the duties prescribed in the latter part, John 7:17. I. The doctrinal part of the epistle instructs us, 1. Concerning the way of salvation. (1.) The foundation of it laid in justification, and that not by the Gentiles' works of nature, ch. 1. nor by the Jews' works of the law, ch. 2, 3. for both Jews and Gentiles were liable to the curse: but only by faith in Jesus Christ, ch. 3:21, &c. ch. 4. through the whole. (2.) The steps of this salvation are, [1.] Peace with God, ch. 5. [2.] Sanctification, ch. 6, 7. [3.] Glorification, ch. 8. 2. Concerning the persons saved, such as belong to the election of grace, ch. 9. Gentiles and Jews, ch. 10, 11. By this, it appears, that the subjects he discourses of, were such as were then the present truths, as the apostle speaks, 2 Pet. 1:12. Two things the Jews then stumbled at,—justification by faith without the works of the law, and the admission of the Gentiles into the church; therefore, both these he studied to clear and vindicate. II The practical part follows; wherein we find, 1. Several general exhortations proper for all Christians, ch. 12. 2. Directions for our behavior, as members of a civil society, ch. 13. 3. Rules for the conduct of Christians to one another, as members of the Christian church, ch. 14. and ch. 15, to v. 14. III. As he draws towards a conclusion, he apologises for writing; ch. 15: 14—16. gives an account of himself and his affairs; v. 17—21. promises a visit; v. 22—29. begs their prayers; v. 30—33. sends particular salutations to many friends; ch. 16:1—16. warns against those who caused divisions; v. 17—20. adds salutations of friends with him; v. 21—23. and ends with a benediction to them, and a doxology to God, 24—27. HENRY.

The Epistle to the Romans is addressed to the Christians who resided in the capital city of that great empire, which then lorded it over the whole known world; [note, end of Acts;] and the epistle itself is one of the longest, and most comprehensive of all that were written by the apostle. It is not known when, or by whom, the Gospel was first preached at Rome; but it is conjectured, that it was carried thither by some of those Jews who were converted at the day of Pentecost, Acts 2:10 † Paul, however, had not yet visited that city; but, as 'the apostle of the Gentiles,' he deemed it proper to use this method of establishing the believers in the faith; and of giving them such a comprehensive view of the Christian religion, as might put them on their guard against false teachers, of various descriptions.

This epistle [forming a beautiful and sublime summary of the Christian faith] is the only part of the Scripture, in which divine truth is delivered in a systematical method: and it is a proper model for any one, who intends to compile a body of divinity. After the introduction, [setting forth his authority,] the apostle opens his subject, (as it is reasonable to begin systematical treatises,) by showing man's relations and obligations to God his Creator, and his apostasy from his worship and service: he proceeds to prove the universal sinfulness of both Gentiles and Jews, and the impossibility of any man's justifying himself before God, by his own obedience. Having brought the whole world in guilty, deserving of wrath, and condemnation; he proceeds to state the method of salvation by the mercy of God, through the redemption of his Son, and the way of justification by faith in his blood, and the imputation of his righteousness, as 'the righteousness of God, which is unto and upon all that believe.' This he proves, illustrates, and exemplifies very fully: he next proceeds to show, that this way of justification is closely connected with sanctification, [or holiness,] and evangelical obedience: he then states the believer's experience and conflicts; and displays his character, hopes, and privileges: and at length he leads our reflections back to the source of these blessings, in the eternal election, and sovereign love and mercy of God. Having thus stated and proved doctrines, and answered objections to them, and discussed several questions respecting the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, he applies the whole discourse by a variety of practical exhortations, precepts, and instructions, enforced by evangelical motives and, having touched on some particulars, suited to the circumstances of those times, concludes with affectionate salutations, cautions, and prayers; and ascribing glory to God our Savior. SCOTT.

the speaker and the hearers, excite in their turn, and, in the same measure, justify a bolder and more vehement kind of oratory.

But Paul did not learn at Tarsus the general form only of his writings. He collected there, also, many of their minuter ornaments. In that city was one of the largest and most celebrated places of exercise then in Asia. And there is no matter from which the apostle borrows his words and images in greater abundance, than from the public exercises. He frequently considers the life of a Christian as a race, a wrestling, or a boxing; the rewards which good men expect hereafter, he calls the prize, the victor's crown; and, when he exhorts his disciples to the practice of virtue, he does it usually in the same terms in which he would have encouraged the combatants. But many of these allusions, which occur in every page of the original, can hardly be preserved in a transl.

From the apostle's country, we descend to his family, and here we find another source of his figurative expressions. His parents were Roman citizens; and words or sentiments derived from the laws of Rome, would easily creep into their conversation. No wonder, then, that their son, sometimes, uses forms of speech, peculiar to the Roman lawyers; and applies many of the rules of adoption, manumission, and testaments, to illustrate the counsels of God in our redemption.

Nor are there wanting in Paul's style, some marks of his occupation. To a man employed in making tents, the ideas of camps, arms, armor, warfare, military pny, would be familiar. And he introduces them and their concomitants so frequently, that his language seems to be such as might rather have been expected from a soldier, than from one who had lived in quiet times, and was a preacher of the Gospel of Peace.

When we observe further, that, being educated in the school of Gamaliel, and instructed in all the learning of the Jewish doctors, he not only uses the Heb. idiom, but has many references to the Heb. Scriptures, and their received interpretations; there will remain little that is peculiar, in his manner of writing, of which the origin may not be traced to one or another of the before-mentioned circumstances. DR. POWELL.

† It is [however] certain, from the universally prevalent method of propagating Christianity, first among the Jews, and then, by their means, among the Gentiles, that the Roman church consisted originally of Jews, to whom others of different extraction were gradually added; new branches, as it were, engrafted on the parent stock. The probability of this statement is evident from the vast number of Jews residing at Rome, and enjoying the favor of the emperors, and participating in the society and friendship of the people. See Jos. Ant. 18, 12. Dio Cass. 36. Phil. Leg. ad Calum, p. 568. ed. Mang.' Kop.—'Jos. relates, that their number amounted to 8000 (Ant. 17:12.), and Dion Cassius (37:17.) informs us, that they had obtained the privilege of living according to their own laws.' HORNE.

When Pompey overran Judea with a conquering army, (about 63 B. C.) he caused many captive Jews to be sent to Rome. There, as was usual with captives, they were sold into slavery. But their persevering and unconquerable determination to observe the Sabbath, and to practice many of the Levitical rites and customs, gave their Roman masters so much trouble, that they chose to liberate them, rather than to keep them. As there was a large body so liberated, the government assigned them a place opposite Rome, across the Tiber, where they built a town. Here Philo found them, just before Paul's time. (Leg. ad. C. p. 1014. ed. Frankf.) The reader who wishes for historical vouchers in respect to the number of Jews at Rome during the apostolic age, may consult Jos. Ant. 17:14, 18:5. ed. Colonn. Dio Cass. c. 36, p. 37. Suet. Vit. Tiberii, c. 36.

When the just impressions arising from the degradation of captivity and slavery began to wear away, the Roman citizens seemed to have looked at the Jewish community with some degree of respect, or, at least, with not a little of curiosity. Whether it arose from the disgust which delicate females among the Romans felt for the [foolish or] obscene rites of heathenism, which they were called to practice or witness, or whether it sprung from curiosity, the fact was, that in Ovid's time (ob. A. D. 17.) some of the most elegant and polished females thronged the Jewish assemblies. The poet, therefore, advises the young men of the city, if they wished to see a splendid collection of its beauty, to go to the sabbath-day solemnities of the Syrian Jew. It is not strange, moreover, that some of these should become sebomenai, or proselytes; as Jos. relates of Fulvia, a noble woman. By degrees, the men, also, as was natural, began to frequent the assemblies of those once despised foreigners. Juven. at the close of the 1st cent. pours out his contempt and indignation at this, in the bitter words, Quidam sortiti, &c.—Seneca, also, (fl. A. D. 64.) about the time when Paul wrote Rom., says, in a fragment preserved by August. (De Civ. Dei) that "so many Romans had received the Jewish [he means by this the Christian] religion, that now through all the earth it is received; the conquered have given laws to their conquerors." Tac. (Ann.) likewise represents the "exitiabilis superstitio," (Christian religion,) as breaking out again, after being repressed, and spreading, not only through Judea, but through the city, (Rome,) also.

From a comparison of Acts 19:21. 20:1—4. with Rom. 15:25—29. it follows, of course, that this epistle must have been written about A. D. 57; although some chronologists put it later. Prof. STUART.

CHAP. I. V. 1—7. In this paragraph we have,

I. The person who writes the epistle, described, v. 1. Paul; not a Rabbi, but a servant; called to be an apostle, on which call, Acts 9:15. he here builds his authority; called an apostle; as if this were the name he would be called by, though he acknowledges himself not meet to be called so, 1 Cor. 15:9. Separated to the Gospel of God. The Pharisees had their name from separation, because they separated themselves to the study of the law, and might be so called: such an one Paul had been; but now he had changed his studies, was a Gospel Pharisee, separated by the counsel of God, Gal. 1:15. from his birth, by an immediate direction of the Spirit, and a regular ordination according to that direction, Acts 13:2, 3. by a dedication of himself to this work; entirely devoted to the Gospel of God, of divine and heavenly original and extraction.

II. An encomium on the Gospel of God. 1. Its antiquity; it was promised before, v. 2. it was no novel doctrine, but of ancient standing in the promises and prophecies of the Old Test., which did all unanimously point at the Gospel, the morning beams that ushered in the Sun of righteousness; this not by word of mouth only, but in the Scriptures.

2. Its subject-matter; Christ, v. 3, 4. Observe, how he heaps up his names and titles, his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, as one that took a pleasure in speaking of Him; and having mentioned Him, he cannot go on in his discourse, without some expression of love and honor, as here, where in one person he shows us his two distinct natures. (1.) His human nature; made of the seed of David, v. 3. i. e. born of the virgin Mary, who was of the house of David, Luke 1:27. as was Joseph his supposed father, Luke 2:4. David is here mentioned, because of the special promises made to him concerning the Messiah, especially his kingly office; 2 S. 7:12. Ps. 132:11. comp. with Lu. 1:32, 33. (2.) His divine nature; declared to be the Son of God, v. 4. the Son of God by eternal generation, or, as it is here explained, according to the Spirit of holiness, as He is said to be quickened by the Spirit, 1 Pet. 3:18. comp. with 2 Cor. 13:4. He is the Son of God.

The great proof or demonstration of this, is, his resurrection from the dead; that proved it, effectually and undeniably. The sign of the prophet Jonas, Christ's resurrection, was intended for the last conviction, Mat. 12:39, 40. Those that would not be convinced by that, would be convinced by nothing.

3. Its fruit, obedience to the faith, v. 5. By whom, i. e. by Christ manifested and made known in the Gospel, we, Paul and the rest of the ministers, have received grace and apostleship, i. e. the favor to be made apostles, Eph. 3:8. It involved toil, trouble, and hazard, yet Paul reckons the apostleship a favor: it was received for obedience to the faith, i. e. to bring people to that obedience, as Paul was for this obedience, among all nations, for he was the apostle of the Gentiles, ch. 11:13. Observe the description here given of the Christian profession, it is obedience to the faith; not a notional knowledge, or a naked assent, much less perverse dispu-

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1—4. According to the custom of those times, the apostle began this epistle, by prefixing his name and distinguishing title. Acts 15:22—29, v. 23. 23:25—30, v. 26. [Also, to state the fact of the reality of his apostolic mission, because the authority of his epistle depended on this fact.] The expression, 'according to the Spirit of holiness,' has been generally interpreted to signify, 'according to his divine nature;' but it is not used in that sense in any other place, nor does it obviously convey that idea. Others, therefore, explain it of the conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit, on which account He was called 'the Son of God;' but this does nothing more than state, what He was 'according to the flesh,' or in his human nature; whereas the apostle clearly intended to show his divine nature, as the 'only begotten Son of the Father,' and the antithesis, as well as the context, evidently requires this. Our Lord indeed wrought all his miracles by the Spirit of God, which was 'given to Him without measure;' but the apostle plainly speaks of 'the Spirit of holiness,' in immediate connexion with the demonstration that Jesus was the Son of God, which arose from his resurrection from the dead. Now, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the witnesses of his resurrection, and all the stupendous effects which followed, both in respect of them, and of those on whom they laid their hand, were a divine attestation to their testimony: and thus Jesus, who was crucified for affirming that He was 'the Son of God,' was 'declared,' or 'determined' to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection,' according to the demonstration of that event, arising from the divers powers, signs, and miracles, which the Spirit of God enabled the apostles and primitive Christians to perform. Heb. 2:1—4, v. 4. It may also be observed, that the Holy Spirit had foretold, by the prophets, that the Messiah would be the Son of God, as well as the Son of David; and also, that He would be put to death, and rise again, and enter into his glory. When, therefore, the Lord Jesus, having been put to death as a deceiver and blasphemous, arose from the dead, 'ascended on high, . . . and gave gifts to men;' especially by pouring out the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, according to the predictions of holy men from the beginning, 'who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;' He, in both respects, was 'declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead, according to the Spirit of holiness.' Acts 2:22—36. Eph. 4:7—13.

(1.) Called, also v. 7, called.] 'Rather, chosen.' Pr. Stuart. Servant.] 'Doulos: from deō, to tie, bind [cut, Is. 10:4.], (i. e. deolos, contracted to doulos), by the same figure as that found in our adjective bond, (from bind), signifies properly, one who is bound for life to the service of a person, as his property: and, with allusion to the entire devotedness of the service, this term was applied to Moses, who is called abd yhv̄h, in Ex. 14:31. Num. 12:7. Josh. 1:1. and also to Joshua, Jud. 2:8. But as the dignity of the master raises the credit of the servant, and as the term servant, or minister, of a king, became at length a title of honor, and especially as it has been applied to the prophets, so it came to be applied to the apostles. When, however, Paul takes it to himself, as here, he must not be understood as arrogating any peculiar dignity; since in 2 Tim. 2:24. he extends it to any Gospel preacher.' Bl.

(2.) Promised afore.] 'Rather, formerly declared or published.' St. These promises were not wholly unknown to the heathen, for Tacitus says, 'Pluribus persuasione inerat, antiquis sacerdotum libris contineri, eo ipso tempore fore, ut valesceret Oriens, profectique Judea rerum potirentur;' and Suetonius, his contemporary, 'Percrebrerat Oriente toto, vetus et constans opinio, esse in fati ut eo tempore Judea profecti rerum potirentur.' See St., &c.

tings, but obedience : obedience to the faith answers the law of faith, mentioned ch. 3:27. The act of faith, is the obedience of the understanding to God revealing, and the product of that is the obedience of the will to God commanding. To anticipate the ill use which might be made of the doctrine of justification by faith, without the works of the law, which he was to explain in the following epistle, he here speaks of Christianity as an obedience. Christ has a yoke.

'Among whom are ye, v. 6. Ye Romans in this stand on the same level with other Gentile nations of less fame and wealth; ye are all one in Christ.' The gospel-salvation is a common salvation, Jude 3. No respect of persons with God.

(4.) Lord.] 'Kurios: a word of deep interest to Christians. Applied to Christ, it probably denotes Him as Supreme Ruler or Lord, especially of his church. Matthew and Mark do not apply this title absolutely to Christ, except after his resurrection, Mat. 28:6. Mark 16:19, 20. But Luke, John, and Paul, apply it to Him everywhere and often. With Paul the application seems to be in a manner exclusive. God the Father, or God absolutely considered, is named kurios, about 30 times in the O. T. passages which Paul cites; but elsewhere, with the exception of some 4 or 5 instances, Paul gives to Christ, exclusively, the title of kurios or ho kurios, in more than 250 instances; Bib. Repos. 1. 733, sq. The article makes no difference in the meaning; inasmuch as the word is a kind of proper name by usage, it is employed in like manner as one, and may therefore take or omit the article at the pleasure of the writer. V. 7. This apostolical salutation is most undeniably a prayer, or act of worship, in which Christ is addressed in union with God the Father. 14:13—18, v. 17. Jn. 14:27, 28. 1 Cor. 1:3. Eph. 1:1, 2. Phil. 2:5—8. Sc.

V. 8—12. The apostle's language is, for substance, a most solemn oath, or appeal to the heart-searching God, for the truth of what he said. Mat. 5:33—37. For he ardently desired to see and converse with them, that he might impart to them some of those spiritual gifts, which were generally conferred by imposition of the apostles' hands, in order to their establishment in the faith. Acts 8:14—17. And this he desired, in order that he might share the comfort bestowed on them, and rejoice in ministering to their joy; as well as in conferring with them, concerning the nature, object, and effects of that faith, which was held both by them and him. Paul doubtless meant to remind the Romans

The called of Jesus Christ; all those, and those only, are brought to an obedience of the faith, that are effectually called of Jesus Christ.

III. The persons to whom it is written, v. 7. all in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints; i. e. all professing Christians in Rome, whether Jews or Gentiles originally, high or low, bond or free, learned or unlearned, rich and poor, meet together in Christ Jesus. Here is, 1. The privilege of Christians; they are beloved of God, are members of that body which is beloved, which is God's Hephzi-bah, his delight. We speak of God's love, by his bounty and beneficence, and so He hath a common love to all mankind, and a peculiar love for true believers; and between these there is a love He hath for all the body of visible Christians. 2. The duty of Christians; to be holy, for hereunto are they called, called to be saints, called to salvation through sanctification; called saints, saints in profession; it were well if all who are called saints, were saints indeed: such should labor to answer to the name; else, the honor and privilege will little avail at the great day.

IV. The apostolical benediction, v. 7. Grace to you and peace, a token in every epistle, having not only the affection of a good wish, but the authority of a blessing: the priests under the law were to bless the people, and so are gospel ministers, in the name of the Lord. The O. T. salutation was, peace be to you; but now grace is prefixed, grace, i. e. the favor of God towards us, or the work of God in us; both are previously requisite to true peace. All gospel-blessings are included in these two, grace and peace. Peace, i. e. all good; peace with God, peace in your own consciences, peace with all about you; all these founded in grace. The fountain of those favors is, God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. All good comes from God, as a Father, and from Christ, as Mediator. He hath put Himself into the relation of a Father, to engage and encourage our desires and expectations; and Christ in that of a Mediator, for the conveying and securing of the blessing. We have peace from the fulness of his merit, and from the fulness of his Spirit, grace.

V. 8—15. We may here observe,

I. His thanksgiving for them, v. 8. It is good to begin everything with blessing God, and in all our thanksgivings, eye God as our God, through Jesus Christ, in whom only all our duties and performances are pleasing to God; praises as well as prayers.

We must also express our love to our friends, not only by praying for them, but by praising God for them. Many of these Romans, Paul had no personal acquaintance with, yet he could heartily rejoice in their gifts and graces. When some met him, Acts 28:15. he thanked God, and took courage; and here he thanks God for them all; not only those that were his helpers in Christ, and that bestowed much labor on him, ch. 16:3, 6. but for them all.

Wherever Paul travelled, he heard great commendations of the Christians at Rome, which he mentions, not to make them proud, but to quicken them to answer the general character people gave of them, and the general expectation people had from them. The greater reputation a man hath for religion, the more careful he should be to preserve it, because a little folly spoils him that is in reputation, Ecl. 10:1.

The whole world, here, means the Roman empire, into which the Roman Christians, upon Claudius' edict to banish all the Jews from Rome,* were scattered abroad, but were now returned, and, it seems, left a very good report behind them; and there was this good effect of their sufferings, their being persecuted made their faith famous; as the elders, of old, obtained a good report through faith, Heb. 11:2.

The faith of the Roman Christians came to be thus talked of, not only because excelling in itself, but because eminent and observable in its circumstances. Rome was a city on a hill, every one noticed what was done there. Thus they who have many eyes on them, have need to walk circumspectly, for what they do, good or bad, will be spoken of.

The church of Rome was then flourishing; but since, how is the gold become dim! The most fine gold changed! It is not what it was; then, espoused a chaste virgin to Christ, but since degenerated, so that (as that good old book, the Practice of Piety, makes appear in no less than 26 instances) even the Epistle to the Romans, is now an epistle against the Romans; little reason has she therefore to boast of her former credit.

II. His prayer for them, v. 9; an instance of his love. One of the greatest kindnesses we can do our friends, and sometimes the only kindness in our power, is, by prayer to recommend them to the loving kindness of God. From Paul's example, here, we may learn,

1. Constancy in prayer; always, without ceasing. He did himself observe the same rules he gave to others, Eph. 6:18. 1 Thess. 5:17. Not that Paul did nothing else but pray, but he kept [his mind always in a praying frame, kept] up stated times for the solemn performance of that duty, and those very frequent, and observed without fail.

2. Charity in prayer; I make mention of you. He had no particular acquaintance of his apostolical character and authority, as sanctioning his doctrine, by which he intended to guard them especially against the judaizing teachers; yet he aimed to do this, in the most unassuming and affectionate manner possible; that he might give no disgust to any person, or furnish false teachers with any handle against him.—Some think the Christians at Rome had received supernatural gifts; (12:6.) Yet it does not appear that any apostle had been there: Paul, however, expected that these gifts would be more abundantly imparted, when he should go among them; and that they would be thus fortified against such as attempted to pervert them, as well as against the fear of persecution.—It has been seen how his prayers for 'a prosperous journey' to Rome were answered by his being sent thither as a prisoner! 15:22—33. Acts 18:18—23. 25—28. Scott.

(9.) God is my witness.] 'The reason why he here makes the appeal to God, seems to be, that he being a stranger in person to the church of Rome, they might otherwise think his expressions to be merely those of common civility.' Stuart.

(10.) 'Always asking in my prayers, that at some time or other, if possible, before long, I may (God willing) make a prosperous journey, and come to you.' Id.

(11.) Gift.] 'Favor.' St. 'By enallage for gifts, i. c. supernatural ones. Nothing would so much tend to confirm the great multitude (who are here meant) in their religion, as the evidence of its divine origin, so unquestionably supplied by the communion of such gifts. Had no more been meant than Schleus, and other recent commentators tell us [viz. spiritual knowledge, edification, and peace], that would scarcely have required the presence of the apostle; nay, the epistle might have been expected to produce nearly the same effect.' Bloomf.

(12.) 'Chrys., Ecum., Theoph., Grot., Locke, Kypke, and Ros. here notice the exquisite delicacy with which the apostle softens down what with them, or interest in them, yet he prayed for them, for them expressly. It is not unfit sometimes to be express in our prayers for particular churches and places; not to inform God, but to affect ourselves. We are likely to have the most comfort in these friends we pray most for. Concerning this, he makes a solemn appeal to the Searcher of hearts; God is my witness. It was in a weighty matter, known only to God and his own heart, that he used this asseveration. It is very comfortable to be able to call God to witness our sincerity and constancy in the discharge of a duty. God is particularly a witness to our secret prayers, the matter of them, the manner of the performance, Mat. 6:6. Those that serve God with their spirits, v. 9. may, with a humble confidence, appeal to Him; hypocrites cannot, who rest in bodily exercise.

His particular prayer, among many other petitions, was, that he might have an opportunity to visit them, v. 10. The expressions used, intimate, that he was very desirous of such an opportunity, if by any means; that PRACT. OBS. V. 1—15. 'A servant of Jesus Christ' is the highest style of man; and the Christian slave is 'a servant of Christ,' as truly as the apostle.—All those who are thus distinguished, have been 'called' out of a state of darkness and alienation from God, and 'separated' from their sinful connexions, by divine grace; and thus taught to believe, love, adorn, and promote the Gospel of God.—In proportion as grace is communicated, peace may be expected; and when grace shall ripen into perfect holiness, peace will become complete fruition. These then are the great blessings, which we should seek for ourselves, our children, our friends, and all around us, in preference to all earthly possessions or prosperity: and they must be sought from the mercy of God, our Father, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and by reliance on his merits and

The apostle was exceedingly desirous to have some fruit among the Romans, as well as among the other Gentiles: for, as he had been converted in a most extraordinary manner, and entrusted with a dispensation of the Gospel; he thought himself bound to do everything which he possibly could, to promote the salvation of men in general, especially among the Gentiles.

(14.) 'I am bound by my calling, gifts, and spiritual office, as teacher of the Gentiles, to evangelize both Greeks and barbarians. Syr. and Chrys. The Gospel was so fitted to all men, that it despised not the stupid, nor ought to be despised by men of genius. Grot. As the Gospel was committed to his trust, he was a trustee, and so a debtor, to dispense it freely to all, as he should have opportunity. See 1 Tim. 1:11. 1 Thess. 2:4. Taylor. So Rox. and Schleus. Bl. Barbarians.] 'Ammonius explains this by non-Greek; and that this very early distinction continued to a late period, and that the Romans were also included in Barbaroi, is seen in Polyb. After the Romans had conquered them, the Greeks either (as Diod. Sic., Plut., and Appian) avoided the use of the invidious word, or, as Dion. Hal., meant the uncivilized, excluding the Romans, as of Greek extraction. So Strabo, Herodian, Dio Cnss. Jos. rarely uses the phrase, but takes care not to express in which class he reckoned the Romans. He evidently, however, means to consider the Jews as separate from both classes,—as, I think, the apostle does. So Col. 3:11.'

V. 16. While Jewish rabbies, and pagan philosophers, had tried in vain to reform men's lives; the despised Gospel of Christ, wherever it had been preached, had been rendered extensively successful for that purpose. 'It is the power of God unto salvation.' 'Now it is plain, that it is not merely the power of God manifested in outward miracles, that is there spoken of; for miracles were wrought upon and in the

he had long and often been disappointed, now at length; and yet submitted it to the Divine Providence. As in our purposes, so in our desires, we must still remember to insert this, if the Lord will, James 4:15. Our journeys are prosperous and comfortable, or otherwise, according to the will of God.

III. His great desire to see them, with the reasons of it, v. 11—15. He had often purposed to come, v. 13. but was hindered by other business; he was for doing that first, not which was most pleasant, (then he would have gone,) but which was most needful; a good example to ministers, not to consult their own inclinations so much, as the necessity of their people's souls.

Paul desired to visit these Romans, 1. That they might be edified, v. 11. He received, that he might communicate. A good sermon is a good gift, so much the better for being a spiritual gift. Having commended their flourishing, he expresses his desire that they may be established, that as they grew upward in the branches, they might grow downward in the root: in such a shaking world, the best saints need be more and more established; and for this spiritual gifts are of special use.

2. That he might be comforted, v. 12. What he heard of their flourishing in grace, was so much a joy to him, that it must needs be much more so to behold it. Mutual confidence between minister and people, is very comfortable. Or, it may mean the mutual work of faith, which is love; they rejoiced in the expressions of one another's love, or communicating their faith one to another. Their edification would be his advantage, fruit abounding to a good account, v. 13. Paul minded his work, as one that believed, the more good he did, the greater would his reward be.

3. That he might discharge his trust as the apostle of the Gentiles, v. 14. His receivings made him debtor; the great gifts and abilities he had, made him so; we should think of this when we covet great things; that all our receivings put us in debt; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. His office made him a debtor; he was a debtor as an apostle, he was called and sent to work, and had engaged to mind it. Paul had improved his talent, and done as much good as ever any man did, yet, in reflection on it, he still writes himself debtor; for when we have done all, we are but unprofitable servants. He was debtor both to the Greeks, and to the barbarians, i. e. as the following words explain it, to the wise and to the unwise. The Greeks fancied they had the monopoly of wisdom, and looked upon all the rest of the world as barbarians, comparatively so; not cultivated with learning and arts as they were. Now Paul thought himself obliged to do all the good he could to both. Accordingly, we find him doing so, both in his preaching and in his writing. You may observe a difference between his sermon at Lystra, among the plain Lycaonians, Acts 14:15, &c. and that at Athens, among the polite philosophers, Acts 17:22, &c.

For these reasons he was ready, if he had an opportunity, to preach the Gospel at Rome, v. 15. though it should be attended with peril. He was ready to run the risk; the word denotes he was very forward to it: not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind. It is an excellent thing to be ready to meet every opportunity of doing or getting good.

V. 16—18. Paul here enters on a large discourse of justification; in the latter part of this ch. laying down his thesis; and, in order to the proof of it, describing the deplorable condition of the Gentile world.

His transition is very handsome, and like an orator; he was ready to preach the Gospel at Rome, where it was run down by the wits, v. 16.

There is a great deal in the Gospel which such a man as Paul might be tempted to be ashamed of, especially that its Author was hanged on a tree; its doctrine had nothing to set it off among scholars, its professors were mean and despised, and everywhere spoken against; yet Paul was not ashamed to own it. I reckon him a Christian indeed, that is neither ashamed of the Gospel, nor a shame mediation. . . Yet alas! most of us must own, with shame, that we are not so earnest or particular, even in our narrow circles, as Paul was, in respect of his most extensive connexions, and with all his urgent and multiplied engagements. But we should endeavor to imitate him, even as he imitated Christ: and we ought to long for opportunities of usefulness, as worldly men do for a prosperous trade, or occasions of distinguishing themselves and acquiring celebrity: and count that the most successful journey or undertaking, in which most good has been done or attempted; though it have exposed us to hardship, loss, or peril. Nor ought we to deem such services any great thing; but merely our bounden duty, our debt of devoted obedience to God, of gratitude to Christ, and of love to our neighbors and our brethren. SCOTT.

presence both of them that believed not, and them that did believe. The power of God, there spoken of, is a power felt only by them that believe: so that whatever the enemies of the free grace of God may suggest; it cannot be meant of those extraordinary manifestations of power in healing men's bodies, &c. but of that inward teaching and drawing of the Father, of which the prophets foretold, that it would be bestowed in a large manner in gospel-times. Maclaurin. SCOTT.

(16.) Ashamed.] 'Chrysostom has, I think, alone suggested the true mode of considering the expression: and in this he has been followed (as usual) by Theoph., Oec., and Theod. "Since the Romans were great admirers of riches, pomp, and worldly glory, and Paul was about to preach to them a Savior in whom was the very reverse of all this, and doctrines very humbling to the pride of man, he takes care to assure them, that he is not ashamed of the Gospel; and thereby means to delicately admonish them not to be so." Koppe observes, that "this sentiment was suggested to the apostle by the association of ideas, on writing the words, those in Rome: q. d. I shall not be ashamed, no, not at Rome, where high literary endowments are combined with unrestrained licentiousness, and where, therefore, the doctrines of a crucified Savior would be likely to attract naught but derision both to themselves and their promulgator. By this sentiment the apostle glides, tanquam aliud agens, to the subject which he especially meant to treat; namely, to prove, that it is only by Christ Jesus that men could be delivered from those punishments to which all, both Jews and Gentiles, had, by their own fault, rendered themselves obnoxious." (16—18.) 'These 3 vs. contain 4 propositions, which lie at the basis of all that may be appropriately called the Gospel of Christ. (1.) To Gospel truth is imparted a divine energy in saving the souls of men. (2.) Those only can be saved by it, who believe in it, and put their confidence in it. (3.) The pardon of sin, or the justification which God will bestow only on sinners who believe in Christ, is revealed from heaven, and proposed to all men for their reception. (4.) to it. The reason of this bold profession, taken from the nature and excellency of the Gospel, introduces his dissertation.

I. The proposition, v. 16, 17. The excellency of the Gospel lies in this, that it reveals to us,

1. The salvation of believers as the end; it is the power of God unto salvation. Paul is not ashamed of it on this account, that it shows us the way of salvation, Acts 16: 17. and is the great charter by which salvation is conveyed and made over to us. But, (1.) It is through the power of God; without that it is but a dead letter; the revelation of the Gospel, is the revelation of the arm of the Lord, Is. 53: 1. (2.) It is to those, and those only, that believe; believing interests us in the gospel-salvation; to the Jew first, to whom the offer was first made, both by Christ and his apostles, Acts 3: 26. but on their refusal, to the Gentiles, Acts 13: 46. Such doctrine was surprising to the Jews, who had hitherto been the peculiar people, and looked with scorn on the Gentile world; but the long expected Messiah, proves a Light to lighten the Gentiles, as well as the Glory of his people Israel.

2. The justification of believers as the way, v. 17. For therein, i. e. in this Gospel, which Paul so much triumphs in, is the righteousness of God revealed. The Gospel makes known this righteousness. While God is just and holy, and we are guilty, it is necessary we have a righteousness wherein to appear before Him; and blessed be God, there is such a righteousness brought in by Messiah the Prince, Dan. 9: 24. and revealed in the Gospel; called here the righteousness of God, as being of God's appointing, approving, jects of divine indignation and punishment. [What, some ask, becomes of the 600,000,000 of the human race horn where there is no Gospel? Will Christ's death avail the best of them nothing? See 2:6-16. Ed.] The apostle does not proceed formally, and in order, to illustrate and establish these propositions separately and successively; but now one part and now another comes in view, as he proceeds, and the whole is fully developed by him in the course of the epistle.

V. 17. In the Gospel, God had revealed, not only the righteousness of his perfect character and government, and the righteousness required by his holy law, but that also which He had appointed, provided, and introduced, for the justification of sinners before Him. This might be called 'the righteousness of God,' for other reasons; but especially, because it consisted of the perfect obedience unto death of that glorious Person, who is 'God manifested in the flesh.' 'This phrase, in Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness of faith in Christ Jesus dying, or shedding his blood for us. . . . This righteousness consists not in our sanctification, but in our justification, or absolution from our sins past, through faith in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins.' Whitby.—'Therein is the righteousness, which is of the free grace of God, through Jesus Christ, revealed to be wholly of faith.' Locke. The texts referred to [see Scott's M. R. o.], if duly considered, will prepare the reader to expect something still more appropriate, in this most remarkable expression; and a far higher privilege to believers, than these concessions, which are of no small importance, point out to us. 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. Phil. 3:8—11, v. 9. 2 Pet. 1:1, 2. SCOTT.

(17.) Righteousness, &c.] Dikaionunē. 'Accepting and treating as righteous.' 3:21. St. 'Most explain, the doctrine of acceptance with God by faith. Called of God, says Locke, because a righteousness, a justification, "of his contrivance and bestowing." Koppe understands, "immunity from the punishment of sin; and, united with this, a sense of divine rewards." But this seems very vague and arbitrary. Storr tr. probitas et beatitas. Schoett. and Syr. benignity; Ros. favor, beneficium, and he says, there is a reason given why the Christian religion is to be acknowledged as the most effectual means of salvation. Amnon, Wahl, and Turner take it to mean, not the righteousness, or rather justification, itself, but the mode of justification, which God has exhibited in the Gospel; and this seems correct. From faith, &c.] Many, as Hamm., Mackn., and Storr, r. "for the righteousness of God by faith (i. e. produced by faith) is revealed in it (i. e. the Gospel) in order to faith (i. e. to produce faith in those to whom it is promulgated.) Ros., Doddr., and and accepting; so called, also, to cut off all pretensions to a righteousness resulting from the merit of our own works: said to be from faith to faith; from the faithfulness of God revealing, to the faith of man receiving, so some; from the faith of dependence on God, and dealing with Him immediately, as Adam before the fall, to the faith of dependence on a Mediator, and so dealing with God, so others; from the first faith, by which we are put into a justified state, to after faith, [successive acts of faith,] by which we live, and are continued in that state, both implied in the next words, The just shall live by faith, faith being all in all, both in the beginning and progress of a Christian life.

To show that this is no novel doctrine, he quotes for it that famous scripture in the O. T. so often mentioned in the New, Hab. 2: 4. The just shall live by faith. Being justified by faith, he shall live by it both the life of grace, and of glory. The discovery by the prophet was, of the certainty of the appearance of the promised Messiah, in the fulness of time, notwithstanding seeming delays, there called the vision, by way of eminence, as elsewhere the promise; and while that time is coming, as well as when it is come, the just shall live by faith. Thus is the evangelical righteousness from faith to faith: from O. T. faith in a Christ to come, to N. T. faith in a Christ already come.

II. The proof of this proposition, that both Jews and Gentiles stand in need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God, and that neither have any of their own. Justification must be either by faith or works; it cannot be by works, which he proves at large, by describing the works both of Jews and Gentiles; therefore he concludes it must be by faith, ch. 3: 20, 28. Like a skilful surgeon, before he applies the plaster, he searches the wound; endeavors first to convince of guilt and wrath, and then to show the way of salvation. This makes the Gospel the more welcome.

In general, v. 18. the wrath of God is revealed. The light of nature, and the light of the law, reveal the wrath of God from sin to sin. It is well for us, that the Gospel reveals the justifying righteousness of God from faith to faith. The antithesis is observable.

1. Here is the sinfulness of man described; he reduceth it to two heads, ungodliness against the laws of the first table, unrighteousness against those of the second.

2. The cause of that sinfulness, and that is, holding the truth in unrighteousness. Some ideas they had of the being of God, and of the difference of good and evil; but they held them in unrighteousness, i. e. they knew and professed them in a consistency with their wicked courses; they held the truth as a captive or prisoner, that it should not influence them, as otherwise it would.

3. The displeasure of God against it; the wrath of God is revealed from heaven; not only in the written Word, the Gentiles had not that, but in the providences of God, his judgments executed on sinners, which fall not out by chance, but are a revelation from heaven; or wrath from heaven is revealed; not the wrath of a man like ourselves, but wrath from heaven, therefore the more terrible, and the more unavoidable.

V. 19—32. In this last part of the ch. he applies what he had said particularly to the Gentile world: in which we may observe,

I. The means and helps they had to come to the knowledge of God; not such a knowledge of his law as Jacob and Israel had, Ps. 147: 20. yet among them He left not Himself without witness, Acts 14: 17. v. 19, 20. Observe,

1. What discoveries they had; That which may be known of God is manifest in them; some even among them were convinced of the existence of one supreme God. The philosophy of Pythagoras, Plato, and the Stoics, discovered a great deal of the knowledge of God, as appears by plenty of testimonies. That which may be known, implies a great deal may not be known. The being of God may be apprehended, but cannot be comprehended. We cannot by searching find Him out, Job 11: 7—9. but, blessed be God, there is enough which may be known, to lead us to our chief end, the glorifying and enjoying of Him: and these things belong to us and to our children, Deut. 29: 29.

2. Whence they had these discoveries; God hath showed it to them. Those common natural notions they had of God, were imprinted on their hearts by the God of nature Himself, who is the Father of lights. This sense of a Deity, and a regard to that Deity, is so connate with the human nature, that some think we are to distinguish men from brutes by it, rather than by reason.

3. By what way and means these discoveries and notices they had, were confirmed and improved,—by the work of creation,

Schleus. r. "to those who have faith." V. 18—20. 'In vain does the evangelical doctrine exhort men to seek righteousness and salvation in Christ alone, apprehended by faith, unless all men be previously convicted as guilty of unrighteousness; which the apostle now begins to prove, concluding at chap. 3:21.' Beza. The apostle here opens his main subject; and begins to show, that all men deeply need the salvation of the Gospel, because none can obtain the favor of God, or escape his wrath, by their own works. The ignorant and deluded indeed might imagine, that their supposed virtues would atone for their vices; but in fact, 'the wrath of God has been revealed from heaven,' against every kind and degree of 'ungodliness and unrighteousness of men;' not only against vice and immorality, in the conduct of men towards each other; but every failure of that reverence, love, gratitude, and honor, which are due [and ever were due in the highest degree, a perfect obedience] unto God: even of 'all those who hold the truth in unrighteousness.' This revelation had been especially made by the holy law of God, and the Old Test. dispensation; and had now been more generally published and fully explained by the Gospel. And though some extenuation might be admitted, in respect of those who had not been favored with 'the oracles of God;' yet all men were found guilty, and exposed to this 'revealed wrath,' for 'holding the truth in unrighteousness,' or acting in opposition to their knowledge, and the conviction of their own consciences. [The single fact, that all nations have had sacrifices, shows a sense in all of sin to be atoned for.] All were [endowed with a conscience, &c. and] acquainted with many leading truths, concerning moral duties; but their depravity imprisoned those truths, and, so, restrained them from duly influencing their conduct. 'All might have known far more than they did, had they not hated the light through love of sin. Indeed, to this day, no man, of any sect or nation, perfectly lives up to his own principles: all, at some times, and in some things, do what they know to be wrong, and omit what they know [by that perfection of conscience which would have resulted from perfect obedience] to be their duty. So that the plea

20 For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things <sup>e</sup> that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; <sup>f</sup> so that they are without excuse :

21 Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful, but became <sup>g</sup> vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened :

22 Professing themselves to be wise, they <sup>h</sup> became fools,

23 And changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image <sup>i</sup> made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things.

v. 20. the things that are made; they could not make themselves, nor fall into such an exact order and harmony by any casual hits; and therefore must have been produced by some first cause or intelligent agent; which could be no other than an eternal, powerful God. See Ps. 19:1. Is. 40:26. Acts 17:24. The workman is known by his work. The variety, multitude, order, beauty, harmony, different nature, and excellent contrivance, of the things made, the direction of them to certain ends, and the concurrence of all the parts to the good and beauty of the whole, do abundantly prove a Creator, and his eternal power and Godhead. Thus did the light shine in the darkness.

And this from the creation of the world. Understand either the work of creation, as a topic, and man in particular, so some; and so he is called creature, Mark 16:15; or, the date of the discovery; as old as the creation of the world, in which sense the phrase is most frequently used in Scripture. These notices concerning God, are not any modern discoveries, hit upon of late, but ancient truths, which were from the beginning.

II. Their gross idolatry, notwithstanding these discoveries that God made to them of Himself; described here, v. 21—23, 25. We shall the less wonder at the inefficacy of these natural discoveries, to prevent the idolatry of the Gentiles, if we remember how prone even the Jews, who had scripture-light to guide them, were to idolatry; so miserably are the degenerate sons of men plunged in the mire of sense! Observe,

1. The inward cause of their idolatry, v. 21, 22. They are therefore without excuse, in that they did know God, and from that their duty to worship Him, and Him only. But the mischief was, they glorified Him not as God; their affections toward Him, and their awe and adoration of Him, did not keep pace with their knowledge. To glorify Him as God, is to glorify Him only; for there can be but one infinite; but they did not so glorify Him, for they set up a multitude of other deities. To glorify Him as God, is to worship Him with spiritual worship; but they made images of Him. Not to glorify God as God, is in effect not to glorify Him at all; to respect Him as a creature, is not to glorify Him, but to dishonor Him.

Neither were thankful; not thankful for the favors in general they received from God; nor in particular for the discoveries God was pleased to make of Himself to them. Those that do not improve the means of knowledge and grace, are justly reckoned unthankful for them.

But became vain in their imaginations, in their reasonings, in their practical inferences. They had a great knowledge of general truths, v. 19. but no prudence to apply them to particular cases. Or, in their notions of God, and the creation of the world, and the origination of mankind, and the chief good; in these things, when they quitted the plain truth, they soon disputed themselves into a thousand vain and foolish fancies.

And their foolish heart was darkened. The foolishness and practical wickedness of the heart, eloud and darken the intellectual powers and faculties. Nothing tends more to the blinding and perverting of the understanding, than the corruption and depravedness of the will and affections.

V. 22. reflects on the philosophers; and it was the just punishment of their pride and self-conceit, that they fell into the most gross and absurd conceits; it has been observed, that the most refined nations, that made the greatest show of wisdom, were the arrantest fools in religion. The barbarians adored the sun and moon, the learned Egyptians, an ox and an onion; the Grecians, who excelled in wisdom, adored diseases and human passions: the Romans, the wisest of all, worshipped the furies: and at this day, the poor Americans worship the thunder; while the ingenious Chinese adore the devil. Thus the world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. 1:21. Hence few philosophers were converted to Christianity; and Paul's preaching was nowhere so laughed at, and ridiculed, as among the learned Athenians, Acts 17:18, 32.; conceiting themselves to be wise. The plain truth of the being of God would not content them; they thought themselves above that, and so fell into the greatest errors.

2. The outward acts of their idolatry, v. 23, 25. They owned a supreme Numen, but in effect disowned Him, by the worship they paid the creature: for God will be all or none. Or, served the creature above the Creator; paying more respect to their inferior deities, stars, heroes, demons, thinking the supreme God inaccessible, or above their worship. Worshipping the creature was the general wickedness of the Gentile world, and became twisted in with their laws and government; in compliance with which, even the wise men among them, who knew and owned a supreme God, and were convinced of the nonsense and absurdity of their polytheism and idolatry, yet did as the rest of their neighbors did. Thus Seneca de Superstitione, as it is quoted by Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 6. cap. 10. I mention this, because it explains the apostle here, v. 18. who hold the truth in unrighteousness.

It is observable, that, on mention of the dishonor done to God by the idolatry of the Gentiles, the apostle, in the midst of his discourse, expresses himself in an awful adoration of God, Who is blessed for ever. Amen. When we see or hear of any contempt cast on God or his name, we should thence take occasion to think and speak highly and honorably of Him. In this, as in other things, the worse others are, the better we should be. Blessed for ever, notwithstanding these dishonors done to his name: though there are those that do not glorify Him, yet He is glorified, and will be glorified to eternity.

III. The judgments of God on them for this idolatry: not many temporal judgments, but spiritual judgments, giving them up to the most brutish and unnatural lusts. He gave them up; it is thrice repeated here, v. 24, 26, 28. Spiritual judgments are the sorest of all, and to be most dreaded. Observe, of ignorance cannot be admitted, in its full latitude, in favor of any but idiots; for all rebel against that light, not only which they might have obtained, [and if there is but one omission, how can the reward of perfect obedience be claimed? and how can any merit over and above a perfect obedience, at every moment required, be laid up to atone for one failure even?] but which they actually possess. (M. R. u.)—This general principle the apostle proceeded to illustrate, by the state of the Gentile world. Thus, even idolaters and Gentiles are left without excuse; and their ungodliness and unrighteousness are proved to be the effect of their depraved dispositions, rather than of their want of information, or the means of obtaining it. All might have known more of God than they did, had they lived up to what knowledge they had. (18) Revealed. [How true is this of the rewards and penalties of God's natural laws; how striking the analogy between them and revelation!] 'The words of Paul to the Athenians give light to these here to the Romans. Acts 17:22—31.' Locke. (20) Being understood, &c. 'Or, "If they be minded, they are seen." Godhead.* 'Everything comprehended in the idea of God; all the divine attributes. "In this mundane system (says Mackn) everything is so formed, that to the pious among the [illiterate] God Himself appears to be the Author of all the operations of nature. But they who have attained a partial knowledge of what is called natural philosophy, have, from the discovery of some second causes, been led to fancy, that the whole system may be accounted for without the intervention of a Deity; [as if nature informed and perfected itself, struggling through matter towards perfection, as is blindly set forth by some 'philosophers' of W. Europe. See also a book called 'Nature, 1836.] This is what the apostle calls, v. 21. becoming fools by their own reasonings; [not content to confine their reason within the limits God has assigned it by our constitution.] Those, however, who have made the greatest advances in true philosophy, know that second causes, properly speaking, are no causes, because they have no efficiency in themselves, but are set in motion [arranged in the relation of antecedent and consequent] by God: [but are not (Gen. 1:1.) identical with God, part of the actual existence of God, part and particle of God, God Himself, as some heathen philosophers and idolaters, and professed Christians even, and atheists, have taught and do teach.] And thus, the most perfect philosophy always ends where the natural sense of mankind begins." The subject has been admirably treated by Paley, in his Nat. Theol.

BLOOMF.

V. 21—23. Idolatry was first introduced, and became general and perpetual in the world, through man's depraved aversion to the holy character, worship, and service of the true God. The posterity of Noah had some knowledge of Jehovan; but they revolted, and idolatry was become almost universal when God called Abraham. From that time, the same causes produced the same effects, in every part of the world. It is well known, that many of the ancients, especially the learned Egyptians, worshipped dogs, snakes, reptiles, nay, even vegetables! Thus mankind, having retained from original tradition, or having acquired by the exercise of reason, some general notions of a Deity; invented numerous species of idolatry, and universally forsook the worship of the true God, in all places where revelation was not actually vouchsafed.—Indeed, the fact is undeniably the same, even to this day; and if any nations seem to be sunk into so entire a stupidity, as to have no notions of a God remaining among them, this still more clearly proves, not man's want of rational powers, but his carnal enmity to God and religion, through which he becomes more and more the besotted and blinded slave of Satan. Cicero's books, 'On the nature of the gods,' contain many very striking illustrations of the apostle's meaning. [See Tholuck, on the moral influence of heathenism.] SCOTT.

(21.) 'The heathen did not (as observe Tolet, Paræus, and Wollius) recognise God as the Author of all good things, but referred them mostly to fortune, to the stars, to their own prudence; very rarely ascribing anything to the providence of God. Idolatry was the fruitful mother of obscenity and vice, of every kind.'

(22.) This is now as it has been: see note, v. 20. Ed. As to the fashionable philosophers, 'the world was far more successful in corrupting them, than they in reforming it; since it had many temptations with which to corrupt them; they had no allurements with which to entice the world, and what is more, no divine sanctions to give authority to their precepts.' BL.

24 Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonor their own bodies between themselves :

25 Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

26 For this cause God gave them up unto vile affections : for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature :

27 And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the women, burned in their lust one toward another ; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet.

28 And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient ;

1. By whom they were given up. God gave them up, in a way of righteous judgment, as the just punishment of their idolatry ; whether the act was positive, or only privative, we leave to the schools to dispute: but this we are sure of, that it is no new thing for God to give men up to their own hearts' lusts, nay, to lay stumbling-blocks before them. And yet God is not the author of sin, but herein infinitely just and holy ; for though the greatest wickednesses follow on this giving up, the fault of that is to be laid on the [choice of the] sinner's wicked heart.

2. To what they were given up.

(1.) To uncleanness and vile affections, v. 24, 26, 27. They that would not entertain the more pure and refined notices of natural light, which tend to preserve the honor of God, justly forfeited those more gross and palpable sentiments, which preserve the honor of human nature, Ps. 49:20. Thus one, by the divine permission, becomes the punishment of another ; but it is, as said here, through the lusts of their own hearts ; there all the fault is to be laid. Those who dishonored God, were given up to dishonor themselves. The particular instances of their uncleanness and vile affections, are, their unnatural lusts ; which many of the heathen, even of those among them who passed for wise men, as Solon and Zeno, were infamous for, against the plainest and most obvious dictates of natural light. Perhaps, the apostle especially refers to the abominations committed in the worship of their idol-gods, in which the worst of uncleannesses were prescribed to honor their gods.

In the church of Rome, where the pagan idolatries are revived, images worshipped, and saints only substituted in the room of demons, we hear of these same abominations going barefaced, licensed by the pope, (Fox's Acts and Monuments, vol. 1. p. 808,) and not only commonly perpetrated, but justified and pleaded for by some of their cardinals : the same spiritual plagues for the same spiritual wickednesses.

See what wickedness there is in the nature of man ! How abominable and filthy is man ! Lord, what is man ! says David ;

what a vile creature is he, when left to himself ! How much are we beholden to the restraining grace of God, for the preserving [of] anything of the honor and deceeuy of the human nature !

(2.) To a reprobate mind in these abominations, v. 28. They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. The blindness of their understandings was caused by the wilful aversion of their wills and affections. They did not retain God in their knowledge, because they did not like it. Many have God in their knowledge, they cannot help it, the light shines so fully ; but they do not retain Him there ; they say to the Almighty, Depart, Job 21:14. and they therefore do not retain God in their knowledge, because it thwarts and contradicts their lusts ; they do not like it. There is a difference, too, between knowledge and acknowledgment ; the pagans knew God, but did not, would not, acknowledge Him. Answerable to which wilfulness of theirs, in gainsaying the truth, God gave them over to a wilfulness in the grossest sins, here called a reprobate mind,—a mind void of all sense and judgment, to discern things that differ, so that they could not distinguish their right hand from their left, in spiritual things. This reprobate mind was a blind, seared conscience, past feeling, Eph. 4:19. When the judgment is once reconciled to sin, the man is in the suburbs of hell. At first Pharaoh hardened his heart, but afterward God hardened Pharaoh's heart. This wilful hardness is justly punished with judicial hardness. To do things not convenient. This phrase may seem to bespeak a diminutive evil, but, here, is expressive of the grossest enormities ; things not agreeable to men, that contradict the very light and law of nature. And here he subjoins a black list of those unbecoming things the Gentiles were guilty of, being delivered up to a reprobate

V. 24—27. Thus they disgraced their bodies, by using them to perpetrate with each other the most detestable pollutions: even those bodies, which the Creator had formed with most exquisite contrivance and good-will ; as might best render them accommodated to the purposes of their own comfort and usefulness to one another, and to be the instruments of the soul in his worship [obedience] and service : so they were left to practice such unnatural lusts, as are not fit to be mentioned, except as a stigma on human nature, and to enhance the grace of our redemption. Those unnatural crimes and vile affections, which are most scandalous at present, and carefully concealed, or most severely punished, were openly avowed among the Greeks and Romans, even in their politest ages : and their most elegant and celebrated poets have defiled their compositions by the mention of such detestable amours, without any expressions of abhorrence, or even of disapprobation ; nay, often in a way, which sanctions them, and almost wins the unwary reader to palliate, or even approve them ! SCOTT. And these are the very books often put by parents and teachers into the hands of a child, at the very age when all such stimulants should be especially and most conscientiously avoided ! What education ! Ed.

(24.) Gave them up.] God has so constituted man, that the indulgence or exercise of any sentiment or propensity, or faculty, strengthens it, and increases its power and readiness to act : and disuse has a contrary effect. Now the propensities may by indulgence become so strong, that the moral powers, weakened and deadened by disuse, may have little or no power to restrain, and the reckless brute dashes on from worse to worse. Then the heart is 'hardened,' and as this happens by God's laws in man's constitution, it is expressed by God's hardening or giving up to be hardened ; not interfering by miracle to stop the natural course He has ordained. Dishonor their own bodies.] We read this with horror, perhaps, but may not the married even, who are faithful to one another indeed, thus sin, forgetting that their bodies are temples of God ? Physiologists assert, that indulgence strengthens propensity, and that children inherit these strengthened and rampant propensities ; hence we may guess at the occasion of much of the abominable licentiousness (for the modern world is but little behind the ancient, in many parts) prevalent all over the world. Here then should 'moral reform' begin, calling on physicians, (who will attest the necessity of these remarks,) and moralists, to give a rule possible in the present predominance of the lower propensities in our race, and on married, as well as single, to keep it. Ed.

(25.) Worshipped and served.] 'The Gr. word for the former, means reverence, worship, adoration by words and postures ; that for the latter, the service rendered to those gods by ceremonial observances, especially sacrifices. See Steph. More than.] To the prejudice of. [Neglect of Doddr.] To this clause Paul applies a doxology, which was usual with the Jews (see Gen. 9:26. 14:20. 24:27 and 31.) on mentioning the name of God on any solemn occasion, especially when speaking in vindication of his honor. And, to express a still greater veneration, they used it (as in the present case) even in the middle of a discourse, or chain of reasoning. See Gal. 1:5. 2 Cor. 11:31.' Bloomf. 'The sense here is, that greater honor was paid to the work than to the Workman Himself, to whom, if indeed they in any manner acknowledged Him, as the Platonists, they yet appointed no sacrifices. They might say, as did the Pythagoreans, Platonists, and Stoics, that they did not believe with the people : and did not follow the civil theology, or the poetic, but the natural ; as Varro distinguishes ; saying, that by Jove, he understood ether ; by Juno, air ; by Neptune, the sea ; by Naiads, fountains ; by Cybele, the surface of the earth ; by Pluto and Proserpine, its bowels ; by Ceres, the fruit-producing force ; by Dryads, the lives of trees ; by Vulcan, fire ; by Bacchus, the moisture in bodies. Therefore Paul says, that these could not thus excuse themselves, who paid the greatest possible honor to the things themselves, but to their Artificer, little or none. But, in truth, as Jos. says of them, "They dared not promulgate truth before the people." As Plato remarks, in effect, it was impossible. See Chrys. Seneca, treating of the received rites, who says, "All these a wise man will observe because they are appointed by the laws, not as if they were grateful to the gods." This cloaking of a bad custom, the Gospel convicts of injustice, as does also the apostle here. Add to this, the customs now in Paul's time prevalent at Rome, of rendering divine honors to the dead Cesars, (see Lucan.) If any one perjured himself in swearing by Cesar, he was most severely punished, if by God, it went unpunished. GROT.

(27.) Meel recompensc.] 'Perhaps the theleia nosos of Herod. is meant, viz. a compound of the catamenia, hemorrhoids, impotence, [bodily and mental,] and those hysteric and nervous disorders which often accompany and terminate such abominations. The apostle, of course, does not accuse each individual heathen of all these, but his statements are true of the great multitude. As to the charges of sodomy, thrown out upon Socrates, Aristotle, and Plato, they rest only on scandals to be found in such gossiping writers as Diog. Laert., and Athenæus (both too far removed from the times to be of any authority), or, in the buffoon, Lucian, who has poured much of the same filth on Paul and the primitive Christians. As to the Fathers, Tertullian, Greg. Naz., and Theod., their accusations are only faint echoes of the charges above advanced. If we credit scandal, there was not one celebrated character of antiquity but was stained with vice and corruption. . . . Need enough there was of a divine revelation, to rouse men to a sense of the enormities into which they had fallen, to place religion on its true footing, and, on a pure and simple faith to erect the superstructure of an innocent and holy practice ! And this is all that is meant.' Bl.

V. 28—32. Men, in all ages and nations, had shown a disposition and decided purpose to discard from their minds the knowledge of the true God. This was an evident fact all over the Gentile world. In righteous judgment God gave them up to 'a reprobate mind ;' thus they were left to commit those crimes, which were utterly inconsistent with reason, nature, and their own and each other's welfare. Nay, they proceeded to such lengths in wickedness, that their whole hearts and lives were filled with every kind of fraud, oppression, extortion, and iniquity : they invented new species of cruelty, treachery, luxury, impiety, idolatry, sensual gratification, and magnificence. They cast off all regard to parental authority, and despised, injured, or even murdered their aged parents, as the emperor Nero his mother Agrippina. They sinned away natural

PRACT. OBS. V. 16—32. We ought not for a moment to allow of that absurd and hateful shame, which the enmity and contempt of the wicked against the Gospel often excite in our minds. On the contrary, we should glory in the doctrine of the cross; and be ready to profess or preach it in any place, or before any description of men, according to our ability and our call in Providence; as knowing, that it is 'the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth,' and that no sinner can be saved in any other way. It is indeed evident, to this day, that learned speculations, and supposed rational schemes, or the elegances of admired orators, are not attended in general with that power, which converts sinners from impiety and immorality, to the love and service of God: but this effect is produced, in some good measure, wherever the despised Gospel is preached, even though it be in a homely manner, and by persons of inferior abilities, erudition, and elocution. For by the Gospel is 'the righteousness of God revealed;' his way of justification and sanctification is opened; and sinners are taught to trust in Him, and to come before Him, by faith in his mercy, through the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of his beloved Son. He will therefore honor this doctrine, because it honors his perfections, law, and government, and because it is his own appointment: and they who devise other schemes may put forth their own power to make them successful, if they can; but God will not own or countenance them.—Whatever may be pleaded to the contrary, it is a certain fact, that atheism, infidelity, impiety, and idolatry spring from human depravity, not from unavoidable ignorance or mistake. Whatever speculators may assume, of the sufficiency of man's reason [in the present degenerated state of his faculties] to discover divine truth and moral obligation, or to regulate men's practice; stubborn facts confute the flattering hypothesis: and as far as God has in awful displeasure left men to themselves, they have dishonored Him by the most absurd idolatries and su-affection, and even exposed their new-born infants, leaving them to perish without remorse or censure.* They were implacable in their resentments, and unmerciful in their dispositions: so that their public diversions consisted in beholding gladiators fighting together, till hundreds were sometimes massacred before their eyes; or in seeing slaves and criminals fighting with wild beasts, and often devoured by them. Nor did the principal persons, whether men or women, of the highest rank, and most cultivated manners in other respects, absent themselves from these horrid spectacles! The history of the Greeks and Romans, especially of the latter, about the time when the apostle wrote, abundantly illustrates this horrid description of their general character, from which even their philosophers and moralists were by no means excepted. It might easily be shown, that the morals of idolatrous nations, if judged according to the immutable standard of the divine law, are at this day not at all better than the description here given of the Gentile world.—

(32) Have pleasure, &c. This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the hard doing of them: for a man may do them by the power of temptation; and by consideration become sensible of his folly, and repent of it: but when he is arrived at that height of wickedness, that he not only approves, but delights in seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates such a strong affection to them as is incurable. Whitby. The apostle, however, is showing what need the Gentiles, and all men, had of the grace of the Gospel; and not that they were incurable by it; and in fact multitudes who once had answered this description, afterwards embraced Christianity, and became a peculiar people, zealous of good works. [* As now in China, &c.] SCOTT.

ancient virtue of that commonwealth was so degenerated, it appears that these sins, here mentioned, were then and there reigning, national sins.

V. 29—31. Here are no less than 23 several sorts of sins and sinners specified. [1.] Sins against the first table; Haters of God. Could it be imagined, that rational creatures should hate the chiefest Good, and depending creatures abhor the Fountain of their being? Yet so it is. Every sin has in it a hatred of God; but some sinners are more open and avowed enemies to Him than others. Zech. 11:8. Proud and boasters cope with God Himself, and put those crowns on their own heads, which must be cast before his throne. [2.] Sins against the second table. These are especially mentioned, because in these they had a clearer light. In general, a charge of unrighteousness is put first, for every sin is unrighteousness, withholding that which is due, perverting that which is right; it is especially put for second-table-sins, doing as we would not be done by. Here, besides particulars against the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th commandments, are two generals not yet mentioned, inventors of evil things, and without understanding; wise to do evil, and yet having no knowledge to do good. The more deliberate and politic sinners are in inventing evil things, the greater is their sin: so quick of invention in sin, and yet without understanding, stark fools, in the thoughts of God.

Here is enough to humble us all, in the sense of our original corruptions; for every heart by nature has in it the seed and spawn of all these sins; [the same elementary propensities, to be used or abused.]

He closes with the aggravations of the sins, v. 32. 1st. They knew the judgment of God, the law of God and the penalty; so it is explained here, they knew that they who commit such things are worthy of death, eternal death; their own consciences could not but suggest this to them, and yet they ventured upon it. It argues the heart much hardened, and very resolutely set upon sin. 2dly. They not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them. To be pleased with other people's sins, is to love sin for sin's sake: our own sins are much aggravated by our concurrence with, and complacency in, the sins of others.

Now lay all this together, and then say, whether the Gentile world, lying under so much guilt and corruption, could be justified before God by any works of their own.

perstitions, and degraded themselves by 'vile affections,' and abominable lusts: nor is it generally expedient to mention enormities, to which they, who, 'liking not to retain God in their knowledge,' preferring their own inventions to his holy worship, have been given up; when, being left to 'a reprobate mind,' their deluded judgments, their perverse wills, and their depraved passions, have reciprocally helped to corrupt, and have been corrupted by, each other. A most horrid view of the moral character of the Greeks and Romans, even amidst all their prosperity, politeness, and erudition, is here set before us by the apostle: and the student who judges of characters and actions by the law of God, will perceive, that our own historians, orators, and poets, amidst all their flattery and false coloring, adduce such facts, and make such representations, as fully prove the apostle's picture to be a real and striking likeness, and no caricature. Nay, the most illustrious and celebrated persons among them may be produced, as most exactly answering to this horrid description!—It must indeed be thankfully acknowledged, that Christianity has had considerable effect on mankind in general, in giving them more just notions of excellence, and in humanizing their manners; yet, after all, what multitudes, even in this land, seem to be the original of the picture before us!—These are they, who would discard revelation, and who count 'the preaching of the cross foolishness.' But their conduct demonstrates their need of it, and that it is a remedy which they must avail themselves of, or perish.—Finally, we may here observe, that religion moderates and regulates natural affections, but excess of depravity extinguishes them: that it is a proof of more determined impiety, for men to take pleasure in the company of the enemies of God, than to commit many crimes, whilst the heart and conscience protest against them: and that it is a peculiar cause for gratitude, if we have been restrained from these enormities, to which by nature we are [each in a greater or less degree] prone. SCOTT.

(30.) Disobedient to parents. 'That the people of those times should have been so, is not strange, considering the horrible depravity of morals, which would extinguish all the natural affections, and loosen the natural connexion too, for few would know their own parents.' BL. The filial virtues include the exercise of all the higher impulsive sentiments of our nature, which, being overpowered by its lower impulses, no longer act as governors, and the undutiful child is thus like to be brutified, and to become stupidly insensible (so the Gr., for 'without understanding,' v. 31. see BL.) to right, or virtue, or love. It becomes a nation, especially ours, to listen to the remarks of Sir G. H. Rose, note, Eph. 6:2. ED.

(31.) Implacable, unmerciful. 'Of the truth of this, surely no one at all conversant with ancient literature, can doubt. The brutality of the Romans towards their slaves (see classical citations in Grot.) would of itself be proof enough; and the gladiatorial contests, in which multitudes of poor wretches, [slaves, &c.] were brought out to butcher each other, in order to amuse the people, stamp this odious vice in indelible characters: and indeed I cannot but think the apostle had such enormities in view.' BL. What would Paul have said to the instances of enormous violence, perpetrated unpunished in a Christian land, in our own land? Would he have excused them on the score of their being the necessary consequence of the institution of slavery? Let us hope, that violence is not becoming common among us, and pray, that the hateful principles of slavery may be changed by the Gospel, before they have spread through the length and breadth of our sinful land. ED.

(32.) Judgment. Dikaiōma: it corresponds to the Heb. hq and hgh, and denotes what is thought good, constituted and decreed by any ruler, a law; plainly, here, the natural law of conscience, written by God on the hearts of men. Its application to all the 'natural laws,' man's whole constitution in relation to the universe, is fertile in instruction, also. ID.

Concluding Note. On the phrase, Son of God, Gr. Huios Theou, v. 4. 'Any rational being may be called huios Theou, who is formed in the image of God, i. e. possesses by his gift a moral and intellectual nature like his own. The original idea of huios is that of derivation. The secondary one (which is often employed), is that of resemblance. The third gradation of meaning is, that of being regarded or treated as a son, occupying the place of a son, viz. having distinguished gifts, favors, or blessings bestowed on any one. To one or the other of these classes of meaning may all the instances be traced, of the phrase son, or sons of God, in the Bible.

* The phrase is applied (1) To Adam, as proceeding immediately from the hand of the Creator, Luke 3:38. (2) To those who are regenerated, or born of the Spirit of God, John 1:12, 13. Rom. 8:15, 17. 1 John 3:1, 2, and often elsewhere. Connected with this, is the usage of calling all true worshippers of God, his sons; e. g. Mat. 5: 9, 45. Luke 6:35. 25:36. Rom. 8:14, 19. 2 Cor. 6:18. Gal. 3:26. Heb. 12:6. Rev. 21:7.

CHAP. II.

1 They that sin, though they condemn it in others, cannot excuse themselves, 6 and much less escape the judgment of God, 9 whether they be Jews or Gentiles. 14 The Gentiles cannot escape, 17 nor yet the Jews, 25 whom their circumcision shall not profit, if they keep not the law.

THEREFORE thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things.

2 But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth, against them which commit such things.

3 And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?

5 But, after thy hardness and impenitent heart, treasurest<sup>f</sup> up unto thyself wrath against the day of<sup>g</sup> wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; and elsewhere. (3) The same appellation is sometimes given to such as are treated with special kindness; e. g. Rom. 9:26. Ho. 1:10. 11:1. De. 32:5, 19. Is. 1:2. 43:6. Je. 31:9. 2 Cor. 6:18. God, as the common Father and Benefactor of all men, good and bad, in relation to this relation, often calls Himself a Father, and styles them his children; if I be a Father, &c. I have n. and brought up children, hot, &c. Moreover, as all men are made in his image, i. e. have an intellectual, rational, and moral nature like his own; on this account also they may be styled his children; but more specially does this apply to those who are regenerated, and in whom the image of God, that had been in part defaced, is restored. (4) As bearing some resemblance to the Supreme Ruler of the universe in respect to authority, or as having office by his special favor, kings are sometimes named sons of God; e. g. Ps. 82:6. 2 S. 7:14. So in Homer, Diogenes basileus [god-born king, note, Rom. 13:1]. (5) Angels are called sons of God, for the like reason that men are, viz. because God is their Creator and Benefactor; and specially, because they bear a high resemblance to God; see Job 1:6. 21. 38:7. Dan. 3:25. Thus men and angels may be so called, also, for more than one reason; so one truly pious, for each or any of these reasons.

“We come now to the phrases, ho huios tou Theou, [The Son of God], as applied to Christ. (7) It designates Jesus as produced in the womb of the virgin Mary, by the miraculous influence of the H. S., Luke 1:32. (comp. 3:33.) Perhaps the same sense belongs to it in Mark 1:1. The words of the centurion in Mat. 27:54. and Mark 15:39. seem, in the mouth of a Roman, to have, perhaps not altogether, the same sense. (8) It means, Jesus, as the constituted King or Messiah. E. g. Mat. 16:16. 26:63. Mark 14:61. Luke 22:70. John 1:49. 11:27. and probably, in Mat. 3:29. 14:33. Mark 3:11. 5:7. Luke 4:41. 8:28. John 1:34. 6:59. 9:35. 10:36. Acts 9:20. 13:33. Heb. 5:5. In the like sense, the appellation, Son, is given to Him, in the way of anticipation, by the ancient prophets who foretold his appearance; Ps. 2:7. 89:37. On the like ground, kings, see No. 4, are called sons of God; Ps. 82:6. 2 S. 7:14. (c) The most common use of the phrase, Son of God, as applied to the Messiah, is, to designate the high and mysterious relation which subsisted between Him and God the Father, by virtue of which He was, in his complex person as Theanthropos [God-man], the brightness of the glory, and express image of the person of the Father. Heb. 1:3. The image of the invisible God, Col. 1:15. the image of God, 2 Cor. 4:4. In this respect ho huios tou Theou is rather a name of nature than of office, for it is predicated upon the high and glorious eikon [image], resemblance, similitude, which the Son exhibits of the Father, He being the radiance (apagasma), [tr. brightness] of his glory; so that what Jesus said to Philip is true, viz. “He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father,” John 14:9. “It hath pleased the Father that in Him all fulness should dwell,” Col. 1:19; even “all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,” Col. 2:9; and that high, yea, divine honor, should be paid to Him, Phil. 2:9—11. Rom. 14:11. (comp. v. 9.) Rev. 5:13. 14. John 5:23. Heb. 1:6. As Son, Christ is Lord and Heir of all things, Heb. 1:2, 3. In particular, it would seem to be one design of the N. T. writers, in using the appellation, Son of God, to convey the idea of a most intimate connexion, love, and fellowship (so to speak), between Him and the Father. Comp. to illustrate this idea, such texts as Mat. 11:27. Luke 10:22. John 1:14, 18. Heb. 1:5. &c. Mat. 3:17. Luke 3:22. 9:35. Col. 1:13. 2 Pet. 1:17. Mat. 17:5. Mark 1:11. 9:7. Comp. also with these last texts, the parables in Mat. 21:37. &c. 22:2. &c. Mark 12:6. Luke 20:13; also John 8:35. 35. 10:36. That God has given Christ the Spirit without measure, that He dwells in Him somatikos [bodily], that all counsels and secrets (so to speak) of the divine nature are perfectly known to Him, (John 1:18. Mat. 11:27. Luke 10:22. John 6:46. 7:29. 8:19. 14:9, 10, 11, 20. 10:15.) seems to be suggested by the appellation, Son of God, as frequently bestowed; for so the texts referred to, and other like texts, would imply. In a word, similitude, affection, confidence, and most intimate connexion, seem to be designated by the appellation of Son, as applied to Christ. In this sense it is most frequent in the N. T.; although with Paul, the idea of Messianic dignity or elevation is more commonly designated by Kurios [Lord, note, v. 4.]

“But while I am fully satisfied that the term, Son of God, is oftentimes applied to Christ as a name of nature, as well as office; yet I am as fully satisfied, that it is not applied to Him considered simply as divine, or simply as Logos. It designates the Theanthropos, the God-man, i. e. the complex person of the Messiah, in distinction from his divine nature, simply considered, in his Logos state or condition. The exceptions to this are only cases of such a nature, as show that the appellation, Son of God, became, by usage, a kind of proper name, which might be applied either to his human nature or to his divine one, as well as to his complex person. In just such a way proper names are commonly used; e. g. Abraham usually and properly means, the complex person of this individual, consisting of soul and body. But when I say: “Abraham is dead,” I mean the physical part only of Abraham is so; and when I say: “Abraham is alive,” I mean that his immortal part only is so. So when I say: “The Son of God was crucified,” I mean that his mortal part was so; when I say: “God sent his Son,” the Son came out from the Father, He had glory with the Father before the world was,” &c., I mean, that the divine nature of the Son became incarnate, that He emptied Himself . . . humbled Himself (Phil. 2:7, 8), taking upon Him the likeness of our nature. But when I say, with John, that “Jesus is the Son of God,” and that “Jesus Christ has come in the flesh,” I mean to designate his complex person, the theanthropos, the theos en sarri phanerotheis [God manifested in flesh], the logos sarx genomenos [Word become flesh], and this is the case with most of the examples in the New Testament.”

CHAP. II. Both Jews and Gentiles are all under sin, ch. 3:9. This he had proved on the Gentiles, ch. 1. now in this ch. he proves it on the Jews, as appears by v. 17.

V. 1—16. To prepare his way, he sets himself in this part of the ch. to show, that God would proceed on equal terms of justice with Jews and Gentiles; and not with such a partial hand as the Jews were apt to think He would use in their favor.

I. He arraigns them for their censoriousness and self-conceit, v. 1. He expresses himself in general terms, but he intends especially the Jews, and to them particularly he applies this general charge, v. 21.

The Jews were generally a proud sort of people, that looked with a great scorn and contempt on the poor Gentiles, as not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock; while, in the mean time, they were themselves as bad and immoral; and though not idolaters, as the Gentiles, yet sacrilegious, v. 22.

Therefore thou art inexcusable. If the Gentiles, who had but the light of nature, were inexcusable, ch. 1:20. much more the Jews, who had the revealed will of God.

II. He asserts the invariable justice of the divine government, v. 2, 3. To drive home the conviction, he here shows what a righteous God that is, with whom we have to do, and how just in his proceedings. It is usual with Paul, in his writings, on mention of some material point, to make large digressions on it; as here concerning the justice of God, v. 2.

But observe, how he puts it to the sinner's conscience, v. 3. The case is so plain, that we may venture to appeal to the sinner's own thoughts; ‘Canst thou, a man, a rational, dependent creature, think that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?’ Can the heart-searching God be imposed on by formal pretences, the righteous Judge of all so bribed and put off?

III. He draws up a charge against them, v. 4, 5. consisting of two branches.

1. Slighting the goodness of God, v. 4. the riches of his goodness. This is especially applicable to the Jews, who had singular tokens of the divine favor. Low and mean thoughts of the divine goodness are at the bottom of a great deal of sin; every wilful sin is an interpretative contempt of the goodness of God, spurning particularly at his patience, forbearance, and long-suffering, taking occasion thence to be so much the more bold in sin, Eccl. 8:11.

Not knowing, not considering, not knowing practically, and with application, that the goodness of God leadeth thee, the design of it is to lead thee, to repentance. It is not enough for us to know that God's goodness leads to repentance, but we must know that it leads us; thee in particular.

See here what method God takes to bring sinners to repentance; He does not drive them like beasts, but leads them like rational creatures, allures them, Hos. 2:14. and it is goodness that leads, bands of love, Hos. 11:4. Compare Jer. 31:3. The consideration of the goodness of God, should be effectual to bring us all to repentance; and the reason why so many continue in impenitency, is, because they do not know and consider this.

2. Provoking the wrath of God, v. 5. The rise of his provocation is a hard and im-

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The apostle is commonly supposed to have here passed from the state of the Gentiles, to animadvert on that of the Jews: though some think that the heathen philosophers and moralists were also included. He, however, seems to have expressed himself in a general manner, that he might include all those of every nation, sentiment, or description, ‘who hold the truth in unrighteousness,’ or object to ‘the righteousness of God by faith,’ 1:17—20. and who are ready to judge and condemn others, though guilty themselves. Of these, the Jews were the most notorious. Yet, while they would join with the apostle in showing the inexcusable wickedness of the Gentiles, they were equally or more ‘inexcusable:’ as they might be proved guilty of crimes, the very same, or of similar malignity. But they, and all other persons in the world who acted in this manner, must be reminded, that assuredly, ‘the judgment of God,’ according to the truth of his Word, and the real character and conduct of men, would be executed on them. For could any man suppose, that when he had committed the same crimes, which he judged deserving of punishment in others, he should himself escape the judgment of God? This intimated to the unbelieving Jews, that personal and national judgments awaited them, unless they fled for refuge to the grace of the Gospel. The outward wickedness of the Jews was enormous at this time, as Josephus has shown; in this sense they copied the worst crimes (gross idolatry excepted) of the despised Gentiles; and their superior advantages rendered their conduct still more atrocious.

V. 4—6. The Gentiles were without excuse, because they were unthankful to their Creator and Benefactor; 1:21—23. Did the Israelites then despise the exuberant riches of his kindness to them, whom He had so peculiarly favored? He had distinguished them, both by temporal and spiritual benefits, in every age; and at length sent his Son among them. Even after they had crucified Him, He had in infinite mercy ordered the first proposals of his Gospel to be made to them; and He still besought them, by his apostles and ministers, to accept of this salvation! And did they despise all this as a small favor? Did it embolden them to continue in sin? Or d'd the Lord's abundant mercy and patience towards them lead them to conclude, that He would always favor them, however ungratefully they rebelled against Him? Luke 21:44—49, v. 47. If they thus despised his rich goodness, they strangely mistook its design and tendency; as it ought to lead and induce them to repentance.—The more kindness God exercises, the greater aggravation is there in the sinner's disobedience, and the more deeply should he be humbled for his base ingratitude. The patience of God gives the sinner time and opportunity for repentance, and the discoveries of his mercy furnish him with motives and encouragements; and were it not for man's total depravity, the proposals of the Gospel must prevail with every one to repent of his departure from God, and to return to his worship and service. (Luke 15:11—24. 2 Pet. 3:9, 14—16.)—If the Jews presumed on the special kindness of God to them; and continued to reject the Gospel, and to disobey his commandments, according to the ‘hardness of their impenitent hearts,’ their condemnation would be proportionably severe; and the longer God had patience with them, the heavier vengeance would be executed on them. All others indeed, who thus employed the day of mercy in committing sin, and hardening their hearts in impenitence, because of the goodness of God, would find that they had accumulated wrath as a treasure ‘for themselves,’ which would be secured for them, till the day of wrath and final recompense. penitent heart ; and the ruin of sinners is their walking after such a heart, being led by it. To sin, is to walk in the way of the heart ; and when that is hard and impenitent, how desperate must the course needs be ! The provocation is expressed by treasuring up wrath.

Those that go on in a course of sin, are treasuring up unto themselves wrath. A treasure denotes abundance, it is a treasure that will be spending to eternity, and yet never exhausted ; sinners add to it as to a treasure. Every wilful sin will inflame the reckoning ; it brings a branch to their wrath, as some read, Ez. 8:17. A treasure denotes secrecy ; but, withal, reservation to some further occasion, Job 38:22, 23. Though the present day be a day of patience and forbearance toward sinners, yet a day of wrath is coming ; wrath, and nothing but wrath. Indeed, every day is to sinners a day of wrath, for God is angry with the wicked every day, Ps. 7:11. but there is the great day of wrath coming, Rev. 6:17.

And that will be the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. The wrath of God is not like our wrath, a heat and passion, Is. 27:4. but a righteous judgment, his will to punish sin, because He hates it, as contrary to his nature. This righteous judgment of God, is now many times concealed, in the prosperity and success of sinners, but shortly it will be manifested before all the world, these seeming disorders set to rights, and the heavens shall declare his righteousness, Ps. 50:6. Therefore judge nothing before the time.

IV. He describes the measures by which God proceeds in his judgment. Having mentioned the righteous judgment of God, in v. 5. he here illustrates it, and shows what we may expect from God, and by what rule He will judge the world. The equity of distributive justice, is the dispensing of frowns and favors with respect to deserts, and without respect of persons.

1. He will render to every man according to his deeds, v. 6. a truth often mentioned in Scripture, to prove that the Judge of all the earth doth right. Observe the objects of his favor. By this we may try our interest in the divine favor, and hence be directed what course to take to obtain it.

(1.) Such as fix to themselves the right end ; that seek for glory and honor and immortality ; the glory and honor which are immortal, acceptance with God here and for ever. This is seeking the kingdom of God, looking, in our desires and aims, as high as heaven, and resolved to take up with nothing short of it.

(2.) Such as, having fixed the right end, adhere to the right way ; a patient continuance in well doing. It is not enough to know well, and speak well, and profess well, and promise well, but we must do well. Not for a fit and a start, like the morning cloud and the early dew ; but to the end : perseverance wins the crown. Patient continuance respects not only the length of the work, but its difficulties, and the oppositions and hardships we may meet with in it.* Those that will do well and continue in it, must put on a deal of patience. Heaven, eternal life, is their reward, called, v. 10. glory, honor, and peace. Those that seek for the vain glory and honor of this world, often miss of it, and are disappointed ; but those that seek for immortal glory and honor, shall have it, v. 7. and not only glory and honor, but peace. Worldly glory and honor are commonly attended with trouble ; but heavenly glory and honor have peace with them, undisturbed, everlasting peace.

Observe, now, the objects of his frowns. In general, those that do evil ; more particularly described to be such as are contentious, and do not obey the truth. Every wilful sin is a quarrel with God, striving with our Maker, Is. 45:9. the most desperate contention. The Spirit of God strives with sinners, Gen. 6:3. and impenitent sinners strive against the Spirit, rebel against the light, Job 24:13. hold fast deceit, strive to retain that sin which the Spirit strives to part them from. The truths of religion are not only to be known, but to be obeyed ; they are directing, ruling, commanding truths ; truths relating to practice. Disobedience to the truth is a striving against it, and those that refuse to be the servants of truth, will soon be the slaves of unrighteousness. The wages of sin are, indignation and wrath, the causes ; tribulation and anguish, the necessary and unavoidable effects. And this upon the soul ; souls are the vessels of that wrath, the subjects of that tribulation and anguish. Sin qualifies the soul for this wrath. The soul is that in, or of, man, which alone is immediately capable of this indignation, and the impressions or effects of anguish therefrom. Hell is eternal tribulation and anguish, the product of infinite wrath and indignation. This comes of contending with God, Is. 27:4. Those that will not bow to his golden sceptre, will certainly be broken by his iron rod.

2. There is no respect of persons with God, v. 11. i. e. as to outward relation or condition. Jews and Gentiles stand on the same level before God. So Peter, Acts 10:34. and it is explained in the next words, that in every nation, he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of Him. God does not save men with respect to their external privileges, or their barren knowledge and profession of the truth, but according as their state and disposition really are.

V. He proves the equity of his proceedings with all, when He shall actually come to judge them, v. 12—16. on this principle, that that which is the rule of man's obedience, is the rule of God's judgment.

Three degrees of light are revealed to men.

1. The light of nature. That the Gentiles have, and by that they shall be judged ; they shall not be reckoned with for the transgression of the law they never had, nor come under the aggravation of the Jews' sin against, and judgment by, the written law ; but they shall be judged by, as they sin against, the law of nature, not only as it is in their hearts, corrupted, defaced, and imprisoned in unrighteousness, but as in the uncorrupt original the Judge keeps by Him.

Further to clear this, v. 14, 15. in a parenthesis, he evinces, that the light of nature was to the Gentiles instead of a written law. He had said, v. 12. they had sinned without law ; but, though they had not the written

BLOOMF.

V. 7—11. The apostle here gradually proceeds to a more explicit mention of the Jews, whom he especially intended to 'conclude under sin.' Gal. 3:22. According to the whole tenor of Scripture, as well as the dictates of common sense, no sinner can do well, till he repents, submits to God, and seeks mercy from Him. The Jew who did this, must have respect to the types and promises of a Savior, with which the law of Moses was replete, as well as to the preceptive part of it ; and he alone, who did this, would perform any spiritual obedience. Ez. 19:5. If then there was a man, anywhere, who embraced by faith the revelation of 'glory, honor, and immortality,' through the promised Messiah, made in the Word of God, and was earnestly desirous of obtaining this blessing ; if he sought the inheritance, by repenting, 'ceasing to do evil, learning to do well,' attending on the ordinances of God, obeying his commandments, and thus waiting patiently for the completion of his promises ; and if he proved his sincerity, by patience under trials, and perseverance in well doing, amidst temptations and difficulties ;—this man would surely be made partaker of eternal life, according to the constitution of the most gracious covenant of God in Jesus Christ ; whatever measure of explicit knowledge he might be favored with, or under whatever dispensation he might live. But as all transgressors of the law are under condemnation ; so those Jews, or others, who disputed against the Lord's method of saving sinners, and his sovereignty in dispensing unmerited favors ; and who refused to obey the truth, by embracing the Gospel and submitting to the promised Savior ; choosing rather to 'obey unrighteousness,' and continue the slaves of sin and Satan : all these persons would surely sink under the indignation and wrath of their offended Judge ; and the Jew will have the first and most severe lot in this condemnation ; though the unbelieving and disobedient Gentile will not be exempted. On the other hand, that 'glory, honor, and peace,' which God confers on the objects of his peculiar love, will certainly be given to 'every man that worketh good,' as one who 'obeyed the truth.'—It is evident the apostle did not mean, that either Jew or Gentile could be saved by his own works, without faith in Christ ; but that, 'by obeying the truth,' and by that 'patient continuance in well doing' which springs from faith, the Gentile would obtain eternal life ; and without this, the Jew must fall under wrath and condemnation. To suppose he meant, that any man, who heard the Gospel without believing it ; or who had any part of revelation sent to him, yet rejected it, could be saved ; would absurdly make the apostle advance principles subversive of his own grand argument throughout the whole epistle, and of his doctrine in all his epistles. He had many reasons, for his first proposing his doctrine in this covert and practical manner. He thus avoided giving immediate disgust to the Jewish reader, previous to the more explicit declaration of the Gospel, for which he was here only making way : he intimated, that those, who really best understood and obeyed the law, would most readily embrace the Gospel ; and that the Jews did not refuse to 'obey the truth' from love to the holiness of the law, but from 'obedience to unrighteousness.' SCOTT.

V. 12—16. If they would seek acceptance in this way, they must be 'doers' of the law : and if any thus perfectly performed its righteous demands, he might then indeed claim the reward of righteousness, but not otherwise. Luke 10:25—29. For even the Gentiles, who had not the written law, when from natural principles they performed any of those duties which the law required, were, in this respect 'a law unto themselves ;' and by obeying thus far their own rule, came nearer to righteousness, than the Jews who broke their rule. Their consciences law, Ps. 147: 20. they had what was equivalent, not to the ceremonial, but to the moral law. They had the work of the law. He does not mean, that work which the law commands, as if they could produce a perfect obedience ; but that work which the law does ; in directing us what to do, examining us what we have done. Now,

(1.) They had that which directed them what to do by the light of nature : by the force and tendency of their natural notions, and dictates, they apprehended a clear and vast difference between good and evil. They did, by nature, the things contained in the law. They had a sense of [ought, and ought not] justice and equity, honor and purity, love and charity ; the light of nature taught obedience to parents, pity to the miserable, conservation of public peace and order ; forbade murder, stealing, lying, perjury, &c. Thus they were a law unto themselves.

(2.) They had that which examined them what they had done ; Their conscience also bearing witness. They had that within them, which approved and commended what was well done, and which reproached them for what was done amiss. Conscience is a witness, and first or last will bear witness, though for a time it may be bribed or brow-beaten. It is instead of a thousand witnesses, testifying of that which is most secret ; and their thoughts accusing or excusing, passing a judgment on the testimony of con-also testified to the propriety of this part of their conduct, and produced an inward satisfaction : while, at the same time, their secret thoughts, or their reasonings one with another, served to accuse, or excuse themselves, or each other, according to the conformity of their conduct to their own sentiments of right and wrong, or the contrary. If, then, the very Gentiles could not but condemn themselves, when they acted against their own consciences ; how absurd and presumptuous must it be for a Jew, to expect justification before God, by a law which he was continually transgressing ! To 'perish without law' is widely different from 'justification unto life ;' of which the apostle gives not so much as any intimation. Mat. 11:20-24. The apostle's argument by no means implied, that the Gentiles performed any spiritual obedience ; or that any of them could be justified, on account of their partial and scanty compliance with the dictates of their own natural, and in very many things erroneous conscience. [If it be said, why should they not stand as well as those who live no nearer to their rule than they, and yet through grace are saved ?—no Christian lives up to his light, and no heathen does ; why should one be saved more than the other ? See 9:20. Ed.] As the apostle plainly says, that 'as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law ;' it is surprising, any expositors should have thought the case of Job and his friends, and Cornelius, to be referred to. Probably Job lived and died before the law ; and he had traditional revelation, as the patriarchs had : and Cornelius, though not observant of the ceremonial law, had the scriptures of the O. T., and by the grace of God had studied them to good purpose. Acts 10:1-8.—It was indisputably the apostle's object, to convince his readers, that neither revelation, nor the light of reason and conscience, could save those who failed of obeying them ; that all had in many things failed ; however, in particular instances, some had been obedient ; science, by applying the law to the fact. Conscience is that candle of the Lord, which was not quite put out, no, not in the Gentile world. The heathen (see Hor., Juv., &c.) have witnessed to the comfort of a good conscience, and to the terror of a bad one.

Their thoughts among themselves, or one with another. The same light and law of nature, that witnesses against sin in them, and in others, accused or excused one another, or by turns, so some ; according as they observed or broke these natural laws and dictates, their consciences did either acquit or condemn them. All which did evidence, that they had what was to them instead of a law, which they might have been governed by, and which will condemn them, because they were not so guided and governed by it. So that the guilty Gentiles are left without excuse. God is justified in condemning them. They cannot plead ignorance, and therefore are like to perish, if they have not something else to plead.

2. The light of the law ; that the Jews had, and by that they shall be judged, v. 12. They sinned, not only having the law, but in the law, in the midst of so much law, in the face and light of so pure and clear a law, the directions of which were so full and particular, and sanctions of it so very cogent and enforcing. These shall be judged by the law ; their punishment shall be, as their sin is, so much the greater for their having the law. The Jew first, v. 9. It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon. Thus Moses did accuse them, John 5: 45. and they fell under the many stripes of him that knew his Master's will, and did it not, Luke 12: 47.

The Jews prided themselves very much in the law ; but, to confirm what he had said, the apostle shows, v. 13. that their having, and hearing, and knowing the law, would not justify them, but their doing of it. The Jewish doctors bolstered up their followers with an opinion, that all that were Jews, how bad soever they lived, should have a place in the world to come. This the apostle here opposes : it was a great privilege that they had the law, but not a saving privilege, unless they lived up to the law they had ; which it is certain the Jews did not, and therefore they had need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. We may apply it to the Gospel : it is not hearing, but doing, that will save us, John 13: 17. James 1: 22.

3. The light of the Gospel : and according to that, those that enjoy the Gospel shall be judged, v. 16. According to my Gospel ; not meant of any fifth Gospel, written by Paul, as some conceit ; or of the Gospel written by Luke, as Paul's amanuensis, (Euseb. Hist. lib. 3. cap. 8.) but the Gospel in general, called Paul's, because he was a preacher of it. As many as are under that dispensation, shall be judged according to that dispensation, Mark 16: 16. Some refer it to what he says of the day of judgment : 'There will come a day of judgment, as I have often told you ; and that will be the day of the final judgment both of Jews and Gentiles.' (1.) There is a day set for a general judgment. The day, the great day, his day that is coming, Ps. 37: 13. (2.) The judgment of that day will be put into the hands of Jesus Christ. God shall judge by Jesus Christ, Acts 17: 31. It will be part of the reward of his humiliation. Nothing speaks more terror to sinners, and more comfort to saints, than this, that Christ shall be the Judge. (3.) The secrets of men shall then be judged : secret services rewarded, secret sins punished, hidden things brought to light.

V. 17-29. In the latter part of the ch. the apostle directs his discourse more closely to the Jews, and shows what sins they were guilty of, notwithstanding their profession and vain pretensions. He had said, v. 13. that not the hearers, but the doers of the law are justified ; and he here applies that great truth to the Jews. Observe,

I. He allows their profession, v. 17-20. and specifies their particular pretensions and privileges, which they prided themselves in ; that they might see he did not condemn them out of ignorance of what they had to say for themselves ; no, he knew the best of their cause.

1. They were a peculiar people ; separated and distinguished from all other by their having the written law, and the special presence of God. Jew was a very honorable title, yet many, so called, were the vilest of men. Many of the synagogues of Satan say they are Jews, Rev. 2: 9. and a generation of vipers boast they have Abraham to their father, Mat. 3: 7-9.

And retest in the law. I. e. they took a pride in this, that they had the law among them, had it in their books, read it in their synagogues. To rest in the law, with a rest of complacency and acquiescence, is good ; to rest in it with a rest of pride, and slothfulness, and carnal security, is the ruin of souls. They were mightily puffed up with this privilege, Jer. 7: 4. 48: 13. Haughty because of the holy mountain, Zeph. 3: 11. It is a dangerous thing to rest in external privileges, and not to improve them.

And makest thy boast of God. See how the best things may be perverted and abused ! A believing, loving, humble, thankful glorying in God, is the root and summary of all religion, Ps. 34: 2. Is. 45: 25. 1 Cor. 1: 31. But a proud, vainglorious boasting in God, and in the outward profession of his name, is the root and summary of all hypocrisy. Spiritual pride is of all kinds of pride the most dangerous.

and that all must perish, though with different degrees of aggravation, unless saved by the Gospel.—'Hell hath no power over sinners of Israel, because Abraham and Isaac descend thither to fetch them thence. . . No circumcised person goes to hell ; God having promised to deliver them from it, for the merit of circumcision. . . All Israelites have their portion in the world to come ; and that notwithstanding their sins ; yea, though they were condemned here for their wickedness.' Extracts from Jewish writers, in Whitby.—It would not be easy to produce any passage from modern writers, in which proud self-righteousness and rank anti-nomianism are so completely combined : but a considerable portion of the same leaven, may often be discerned both among papists and protestants.

(15.) Work.] 'Which the law requireth.' St. 'The effect or proof of the existence of that law, viz. in discovering the obligations to moral duties, which revelation, by its precepts, unfolds and enjoins. And so Taylor, and Mackn.'

V. 17-24. In order to understand this ch., it should constantly be kept in mind, that the apostle is combating the prejudices and presumption of the Jews, to whom he expected the epistle would be shown, and whose influence he knew would be employed, to unsettle the minds of the believers at Rome. The Gentiles are therefore introduced, by way of illustrating the argument, and not in order to show in what way they may be justified. 12-16.—The apostle here immediately addressed himself to any Jew, who was willing to take up the argument. He supposed him to rest his hope of acceptance on the law, and this with great quietness and satisfaction ; and to 'boast of God,' as standing in a covenant-relation to Him. He thought himself well acquainted with the will of God ; and, as an expert casuist, he could 'distinguish things which differed,' and give the preference to such as were more excellent, having

19 And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness,

20 An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law :

21 Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal?

22 Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?

23 Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God?

24 For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written.

25 For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law : but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision.

26 Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?

27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

2. They were a knowing people, v. 18. And knowest his will, lit. the will. God's will is the will, the sovereign, absolute, irresistible will. The world will then, and not till then, be set to rights, when God's will is the only will, and all other wills are [identified with it] melted into it. It is possible for a hypocrite to have a great deal of knowledge in the will of God.

And approvest the things that are more excellent. Paul prays for it for his friends, as a very great attainment, Phil. 1:10. Understand it, (1.) Of a good apprehension in the things of God, reading it thus, Thou discernest the things that differ, knowest how to distinguish between good and evil, the precious and the vile, Jer. 15:19. the unclean and the clean, Lev. 11:47. Good and bad lie sometimes so near together, that it is not easy to distinguish them; but the Jews, having the touchstone of the law ready at hand, were, or at least thought they were, able to distinguish, to cleave the hair in doubtful cases. A man may be a good casuist, and yet a bad Christian; accurate in the notion, but loose and careless in the application. Or we may, with De Dieu, understand controversies by the ta diopheronta, (tr. things that are more excellent.) A man may be well skilled in the controversies of religion, and yet a stranger to the power of godliness. (2.) Of a warm affection to the things of God, as we read it, Approvest the things that are excellent. There are excellencies in religion, which a hypocrite may approve of; there may be a consent of the practical judgment to the law, that it is good, and yet that consent overpowered by the lusts of the flesh, and of the mind; 'I see the better, but pursue the worse;' and it is common for sinners to make that approbation an excuse, which is really a very great aggravation of a sinful course.

They got this acquaintance with, and affection to, that which is good, by being instructed out of the law, katechoumenoi,—being catechised. The word signifies, an early instruction from childhood. It is a great privilege and advantage to be well catechised betimes. It was the custom of the Jews to take great pains in teaching their children, when they were young, [cut, Fam. Rec. Vol. III.] and all their lessons were out of the law; it were well, if Christians were but as industrious to teach their children out of the Gospel.

Now this is called, v. 20. The form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law, i. e. the show and appearance of it. Those whose knowledge rests in an empty notion, and does not make an impression on their hearts, have only the form of it, like a picture well drawn and in good colors, but which wants life. A form of knowledge, produces but a form of godliness, 2 Tim. 3:5. A form of knowledge may deceive men, but cannot impose on the piercing eye of the heart-searching God. A form may be the vehicle of the power; but he that takes up with that only, is like sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal.

3. They were a teaching people, or at least thought themselves so, v. 19, 20. And art confident that thou thyself—

(1.) To the Jews in general; they thought themselves guides to the poor blind Gentiles that sat in darkness, that whoever would have the knowledge of God, must be beholden to them for it; [pass to it through proselytism to their Law and rites;] all other nations must come to school to them, to learn what is good, and what the Lord requires; for they had the lively oracles.

(2.) To their rabbies and doctors, and leading men among them, who were especially those that judged others, v. 1. these prided themselves much in the possession they had of Moses' chair, and the deference the vulgar paid to their dictates; and the apostle expresses this in several terms, the better to set forth their proud conceit of themselves, and contempt of others. This was a string they loved to be harping upon, heaping up titles of honor upon themselves.

II. He aggravates their provocations, v. 21—24. from two things,

1. That they sinned against their knowledge and profession, did that themselves which they taught others to avoid. It was the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, That they did not do as they taught, Mat. 23:3. but pulled down with their lives what they built up with their preaching; for who will believe those who do not believe themselves? Example will govern more than rules. The greatest obstructors of the success of the Word, are those whose bad lives contradict their good doctrine; who in the pulpit preach so well, that it is pity they should ever come out; and out of the pulpit live so ill, that it is pity they should ever go in. He specifies three particular sins that abounded among the Jews. (1.) Stealing. This is charged on some that declared God's statutes, Ps. 50:16, 18. The Pharisees are charged with devouring widows' houses, Mat. 23:14. and that is the worst of robberies. (2.) Adultery, v. 22. This is likewise charged on that sinner, Ps. 50:18. Many of the Jewish rabbins are said to have been notorious for this sin. (3.) Sacrilege. Robbing in holy things, which were then by special laws dedicated and devoted to God. And this is charged on those that professed to abhor idols. So the Jews did remarkably, after their captivity in Babylon; but they dealt very treacherously in the worship of God. It was in the latter days of the O. T. church, that they were charged with robbing God in tithes and offerings, Mal. 3:8, 9. converting that to their own use, and to the service of their lusts, which was, in a special manner, set apart for God.

2. That they dishonored God by their sin, v. 23, 24. While God and his law were an honor to them, which they boasted of, and prided themselves in, they were a dishonor to God and his law, by giving occasion to those that were without, to reflect on their religion, as if that did countenance and allow of such things. And the apostle here refers to the same charge against their forefathers; as it is written, v. 24. He does not mention the place, because he wrote this to those that were instructed in the law, but he seems to point at Is. 52:5. Ez. 36:22, 23. and 2 S. 12:14. It is a lamentation, that those who were made to be to God for a name and for a praise, should be to Him a shame and dishonor. The great evil of the sins of professors, is, the dishonor done to God and religion by their profession. 'Blasphemed through you; you give the occasion for it, it is through your folly and carelessness. The reproaches you bring on yourselves, reflect on your God, and religion is wounded through your sides.' A good caution to professors to walk circumspectly. See 1 Tim. 6:1.

III. He asserts the utter insufficiency of their profession, to clear them from the guilt of these provocations, v. 25—29; obedient Jews shall not lose the reward of their obedience, but will gain this by their being Jews, that they have a clearer rule of obedience than the Gentiles have. This must be referred to the state of the Jews before the ceremonial polity was abolished, otherwise circumcision, to one that professed faith in Christ, was forbidden, Gal. 5:2. But he is here speaking to the Jews, whose Judaism would advantage them, if they would but live up to the rules and laws of it; but if not, from his youth been instructed out of the law. In this confidence he thought himself qualified to guide and enlighten the blind and benighted pagans; and to instruct such as became proselytes, whom he deemed foolish, and mere babes, compared with himself; as he had got a complete knowledge of the whole law, having the form of it in his memory and mind. This, however, was a mere semblance, and outside appearance of the spiritual knowledge, and true meaning of the law, which, rightly understood, would lead him to trust in the promised and typified Redeemer, and not in the law itself. In this form he rested, without even attempting to obey all the precepts of the law, according to his own exposition; as if his work had been to instruct others, and not himself! or as if he meant to insult the great Lawgiver, by studying his commandments in order to break them! It was notorious, that many of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, who appeared most zealous for the law, were guilty of these (21, 22) and similar crimes: and the rest, who rejected the Gospel, and made their boast in the law, would be found to dishonor God, by evidently breaking it.—The terms here used (21) concerning the Gentiles, aptly expose the arrogant self-wisdom of the Jews. (24) Blasphemed, &c.] 'Of this, Jos. doth frequently accuse them, saying, "What wickedness do you conceal or hide, which is not known to your enemies? You triumph in your wickedness, strive daily who shall be most vile, making a show of your wickedness, as if it were virtue." Whitby.

(18.) Approvest, &c.] 'Canst distinguish things which differ.' St. (20.) Form.] Morphōsis: 'Representation.' St. Morphōsis properly signifies the delineation of anything with chalk, or otherwise, an outline; a typos [type] is the delineation of anything by stamp. Now ns both are concerned to represent the true form of anything, so they are both metaphorically applied, (the latter in 6:17. the former here,) to an accurate knowledge of a thing.

V. 25—29. If a man cleaved to the law, he must perfectly obey it, in order to justification; circumcision made him a debtor to fulfil the whole law; and his transgressions [a single one] cast him out of the covenant of God, as if he had never been circumcised. Gal. 5:1—6. On the other hand, if an uncircumcised Gentile should regulate his conduct according to the righteousness prescribed by the law; ought he not to be deemed a true worshipper of God, notwithstanding his uncircumcision? Such Gentiles, as were taught by divine grace thus to love and serve God, would, like Cornelius, embrace the Gospel when proposed to them: and thus in uncircumcision, the external natural state of 28 For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh:

29 But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

CHAP. III.

1 The Jews' prerogative: 3 which they have not lost: 9 howbeit the law convinceth them also of sin: 20 therefore no flesh is justified by the law, 28 but all, without difference, by faith only: 31 and yet the law is not abolished.

WHAT advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?

2 Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God.

3 For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?

4 God forbid: yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

would do them no good. The uncircumcised are in Scripture branded as unclean, Is. 52:1. as out of the covenant, Eph. 2:11, 12. and wicked Jews will be dealt with as such. See Jer. 9:25, 26.

Further, to illustrate this,

1. He shows that the uncircumcised Gentiles, if they live up to the light they have, stand on the same level with the Jews; if they keep the righteousness of the law, v. 26. fulfil the law, v. 27. that is, by submitting sincerely to the conduct of natural light, perform the matter of your law. Some understand it, as putting the case of a perfect obedience to the law; but it seems rather to be meant of such an obedience as some of the Gentiles did attain to. The case of Cornelius will clear it. Doubtless, there were many such:

PRACT. OBS. The branches of man's disobedience are numerous, yet they all spring from the same root: nor can any one judge another to be deserving of divine wrath, without at the same time condemning himself: for, though he may not have committed exactly the same crimes; yet he has been guilty of the same apostasy from God, and rebellion against Him; and is equally chargeable with sinning against his better judgment, in various ways. We are very incompetent judges of the comparative heinousness of men's conduct: but it is certain, that 'the judgment of God is' and will be 'according to truth,' against all who break his law, and reject his grace. To Him we ought to leave others, and to be chiefly concerned to judge ourselves, and to seek mercy according to his blessed Gospel, that his truth in fulfilling his promises may secure our salvation.—The excuses, which numbers make for their misconduct, may very commonly be turned against them: nor would men in general be so daringly wicked, were it not for their experience of the Lord's forbearance, and their general notions of his mercy! (Ec. 8:11—13.)—The questions concerning justification, personal election, and efficacious grace, should be kept distinct from those, which relate to the character and conduct of the righteous and the wicked.—No man can be justified by his own obedience, because all men deviate from their rule: yet the nearer they act in conformity to their principles and convictions, the lighter will be their condemnation; and the greater the distance there is between their known rule, and their allowed practice, man, they, being made partakers of an inward spiritual change, would judge and condemn the Jew, who, having the letter of the law and the outward circumcision, had no inward disposition to obedience. SCOTT.

(27.) 'Yea, he who keepeth the law, in his natural, uncircumcised state, will condemn thee, who, in possession of the Scriptures, and a partaker of circumcision, art a transgressor of the law.' STUART.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. (1) What advantage, &c.] The stated ministry of the priests, the occasional messages of the prophets, the ordinances of the temple, the worship at the synagogues, their education in an acquaintance with the true God, and at a distance from gross idolatry, the many good examples which were set before them, and the dispensations of Providence respecting them, were means of grace, which probably were made effectual to the conversion and salvation of more persons in that one nation, from age to age, than were converted in all the rest of the world. (2) Oracles, &c.] Some think the Scriptures are thus called, with reference to the oracular answers, which the high priest delivered when he consulted the Lord by the breast-plate of judgand they were the uncircumcision, that kept the righteousness of the law; and of such he saith, (1.) That they were accepted with God, as if they had been circumcised; their uncircumcision was counted for circumcision: circumcision was indeed to the Jews a commanded duty, but it was not to all the world a necessary condition of justification and salvation. (2.) That their obedience was a great aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews, who had the letter of the law, v. 17. Judge thee, i. e. help to add to thy condemnation, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress. Observe, To carnal professors, the law is but the letter; they read it as a bare writing, but are not ruled by it as a law. They did transgress, not only notwithstanding the letter and circumcision, but by it, they thereby hardened themselves in sin. External privileges, if they do not do us good, do us hurt.

The obedience of those that enjoy less means, and make a less profession, will help to condemn those that enjoy greater means, and make a greater profession, but do not live up to it.

2. He describes the true circumcision, v. 28, 29. (1.) It is not that which is outward in the flesh and in the letter. This is not to drive us off from the observance of external institutions, but from trusting to them. He is not a Jew, i. e. shall not be accepted of God as the seed of believing Abraham, nor owned as having answered the intention of the law. To be Abraham's children, is to do the works of Abraham, Jn. 8:39:40. (2.) It is that which is inward, of the heart, and in the spirit. It is the heart, that God looks at, the circumcising of the heart that renders us acceptable to Him. See Deut. 30:6. This is the circumcision not made with hands, Col. 2:11, 12. Casting away the body of sin. So it is in the spirit, in our spirit as the subject, and wrought by God's Spirit as the Author of it. (3.) The praise thereof, though it be not of men, who judge according to outward appearance, yet it is of God, God Himself will own, and accept, and crown this sincerity; for He seeth not as man seeth. This is alike true of Christianity. He is not a Christian, that is one outwardly, nor is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Christian, that is one inwardly, and baptism is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

the more aggravated must be their guilt. Indeed, the sermons which many preach, and the books which they publish, will testify against them; and it behooves ministers especially, to be most awfully jealous over themselves in this respect: for it is far more congenial to the self-flattery of our hearts, and our worldly lusts, to instruct others, than to bear the yoke ourselves. In short, no forms, ordinances, or notions can profit us, without regeneration by the Holy Spirit; which will always eventually lead us to seek an interest in 'the righteousness of God by faith.' The distinction between truth and error, and between divine institutions and human inventions, is indeed immutable and most important: yet a man may be alive to God, who maintains some errors, cleaves to some superstitions, and forms improper conclusions in respect of some divine appointments: while another, who is very clear in his notions, and exact in externals, may be 'dead in sin,' 'uncircumcised in heart;' and, through the letter and the outward form, he may deceive himself, and be a scandal to the Gospel. He is the real Christian, who is inwardly a true believer, with an obedient faith; and the true baptism is that of the heart, by 'the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Ghost,' producing a spiritual mind, and a cordial subjection to the truth, in its holy import and tendency. A Christian of this character will seldom be much approved by zealots of any party, any more than by the world at large: but he will be accepted of God. SCOTT.

5 But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man.)

6 God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world?

9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin;

10 As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one:

some might object the unbelief of many of them.

Ans. It is very true, some, nay most, of the present Jews do not believe in Christ; but shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? The apostle startles at such a thought; God forbid! The infidelity and obstinacy of the Jews could not invalidate and overthrow those prophecies of the Messiah, contained in the oracles committed to them. Christ will be glorious, though Israel be not gathered, Is. 49:5. Let us abide by this principle, that God is true, and will let none of his oracles fall to the ground, though thereby we give the lie to man. All men are liars, compared with God.

For further proof, he quotes Ps. 51:4. That Thou mightest be justified. The design of which is to show, 1. That God doth and will preserve his own honor in the world, notwithstanding the sins of men. 2. That it is our duty, in all our conclusions concerning ourselves and others, to justify God, and to assert and maintain his justice, truth, and goodness, however it goes. David loads himself in his confession, that he might justify God, and acquit Him from any injustice. So here, Let the credit and reputation of man shift for itself, but let us hold fast this conclusion, that the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.

Obj. III. Carnal hearts might hence take occasion to encourage themselves in sin. He had said, that the universal guilt and corruption of mankind gave occasion to the manifestation of God's righteousness in Jesus Christ. Now it may be suggested, If all our sin be so far from overthrowing God's honor, that it commends it, and his ends are secured, so that there is no harm done, is it not unjust for God to punish our sin and unbelief so severely? If the unrighteousness of the Jews gave occasion to the calling in of the Gentiles, and so to God's greater glory, why are the Jews so much censured? v. 5. What inference may be drawn from thence?—Is not God unrighteous, (so it may be read, more in the form of an objection,) who taketh vengeance? Unbelieving hearts will gladly take any occasion to quarrel with the equity of God's proceedings, and so condemn Him that is most just, Job 34:17. I speak as a man, i. e., I object this as the language of carnal hearts; it is suggested like a man, a vain, foolish, proud creature.

Ans. God forbid. Far be it from us to imagine such a thing. Suggestions that reflect dishonor on God, and his justice and holiness, are rather to be startled at than parleyed with. Get thee behind me, Satan; never entertain such a thought.

For then how shall God judge the world? v. 6. The argument is much the same with that of Abraham, Gen. 18:25. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? No doubt He shall. If He was not infinitely just and righteous, He would be unfit to be the Judge of all the earth. Job 34:17. Comp. v. 18, 19. The sin has never the less of inalignity and demerit in it, though God bring glory to Himself out of it. It is only accidentally that sin commends God's righteousness. No thanks to the sinner for that, who intends no such thing. The consideration of God's judging the world, should for ever silence all our doubtings of, and reflections on, his justice and equity. It is not for us to arraign the proceedings of such an absolute Sovereign; the sentence of a court whence lies no appeal.

Obj. IV. The former objection is repeated and prosecuted, v. 7, 8. He supposes the sophisters to follow their objection thus, 'If my lie, my sin,' (something of a lie is in every sin, especially of professors,) 'have occasioned the glorifying of God's truth and faithfulness, why should I be condemned, and not rather thence take encouragement to go on in my sin, that grace may abound?' An inference which at first sight appears too black to be argued, and fit to be cast out with abhorrence. But, Let us do evil, that good may come, is oftener in the heart than in the mouth of sinners, so justifying themselves in their wicked ways. Mentioning this wicked thought, he observes, in a parenthesis, that there were those who charged such doctrines as this on Paul and his fellow-ministers; some affirm that we say so. It is an old artifice of Satan thus to cast dirt on Christ's ministers. Bp. Sanderson makes a further remark on this, as we are slanderously reported,—blasphemously. Blasphemy in Scripture usually signifies the highest degree of slander, speaking ill of God. The slander of a minister, and his regular doctrine, is a more than ordinary slander, a kind of blasphemy, not for his person's sake, but for his calling's sake, and his work's sake.

Ans. He says no more by way of confutation, but that, whatever they themselves may argue, the damnation of those is just. Some understand it of the slanderers; Or rather, it is to be applied to those who embolden themselves in sin, under a pretence of God's getting glory to Himself out of it. Those who deliberately do evil that good may come of it, will be so far from escaping, under the shelter of that excuse, that it will rather justify their damnation, and render them the more inexcusable; for sinning upon such a surmise, and in such a confidence, argues a great deal both of the wit and of the will in the sin.

Some think Paul herein refers to the approaching ruin of the Jewish church and nation, which their obstinacy and self-justification in their unbelief hastened on them apace.

Paul, having removed these objections, next revives his assertion of the general guilt and corruption of mankind in common, both of Jews and Gentiles, v. 9—18.

'Are we better than they, we Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God? Does that recommend us to God, or will that justify us? No, by no means.' Or, 'Are we Christians (Jews and Gentiles) so much better, antecedently, than the unbelieving part, as to have merited God's grace? Alas! no: before free grace made the difference, those of us that had been Jews, and those that had been Gentiles, were all alike corrupted.'

They are all under sin. 1. Under the guilt of sin: under it as a sentence, a bond, binding over to eternal ruin and damnation; under it as a burden, Ps. 38:4. that will sink them to the lowest hell: we are guilty before God, v. 19. 2. Under the government and dominion of sin, as a tyrant and cruel task-master; enslaved to it; under the power of it, sold to work wickedness.

And this he had proved, v. 9. It is a law term; we have charged them with it, and have made good our charge.

This charge and conviction he here further illustrates by several scriptures out of

V. 5. 'Is God unjust, who inflicteth punishment?' So St. tr. Mackn. here paraphrases: 'If no sin can be rightly punished which is attended with good consequences [see on v. 8], how shall God judge the world?' The Jews allowed the Gentiles were to be judged. Ed.

V. 7. 'Still, if God's faithfulness to his Word, has, on account of my deceitfulness, abounded more unto his glory, why am I any longer condemned as a sinner?' v. 8. Shall we then (say), (us), &c.' St. 'And why then may not we (as well as you) do evil, that good may come?' so Bl. takes the sense, adding 'the dangerous principle was acted on by priests, philosophers, and politicians, of ancient times, and is still by such religionists as have to maintain inveterate error, or support gross imposture.' What a balm to the conscience is this authoritative rule, 'Do not evil that good may come,' from One who alone knows the infinite consequences of every act. See Doddr. and Wayland. Id.

V. 8. Whose damnation is just. Some interpret it of the Jews and others who reject the Gospel: but this proposition, though true, seems not to rise out of the context, or belong to the argument. Others apply the awful sentence to the calumniators, who charged the Christians with saying, 'Let us do evil that good may come:' but the clause, 'as we be slanderously reported, &c.' is, I think properly, included in a parenthesis, that it may not interrupt the main subject. The apostle evidently intended to show, that God may justly, and will certainly, punish those sins, which yet eventually prove the occasion of more conspicuously manifesting his glory. Now, if this were not the case, it might be said, 'Let us do evil that good may come:' but on the contrary, whatever blasphemers may assert, this proposition is so contrary to the real nature and genius of the Gospel, that every intelligent minister or Christian will be forward to allow the condemnation of those, who thus encourage themselves in sin, under a vain imagination that good will follow, to be undeniably righteous. (6:1, 2.) The floodgates of licentiousness are opened by such a view of the Gospel.—Yet even apparently religious persons often tolerate, nay zealously promote, practices which cannot be denied to be deviations from truth and integrity, and vindicate them, because good is thus done. In this way, however, the standard of integrity is (dreadful to say!) fixed lower, in some particulars, among numbers who are zealous for the Gospel, than among respectable worldly people; who are, by noticing these things, exceedingly prejudiced against evangelical truth.—Nay, the same false principle is brought forward, in another and more fashionable form, when utility, and not 'the law of God,' [as if they were really separable,] is made the standard of morality, and a main principle of reasonings on moral obligation. Scott.

(8.) Before proved. 'Already made the accusation against.' St. V. 9—18. The apostle here resumes his subject from v. 2. . . To the indictment, on which the Gentiles had been convicted, the Jews pleaded, 'Not guilty:' therefore, besides the evidence already brought against them from notorious facts, and the nature of the case, the apostle produced several passages of the Scriptures against them. In these, it was not intimated that circumcision, the written law, the ceremonial observances, or the national covenant, would excuse their crimes, or entitle the O. T., which describe the corrupt, depraved state of all men, till grace restrain or change them : so that herein as in a glass we may all of us behold our natural face. The 10th, 11th, and 12th verses are taken from Ps. 14:1—3. repeated as very weighty, Ps. 53: 1—3. The rest is found in the Sept. tr. of the 14th Ps., which some think the apostle chooses to follow, as better known : but I rather think he took these passages from other places of Scripture here referred to ; but in later copies of the LXX. they were all added in Ps. 14. from this discourse of Paul. It is observable, that to prove the general corruption of nature, he quotes some scriptures which speak of the particular corruptions of particular persons, as Doeg, Ps. 140:3. of the Jews, Is. 59:7, 8. which shows, that the same sins that are committed by one, are in the nature of all. What is said, Ps. 14. is expressly spoken of all men, and that, on a particular view and inspection made by God Himself ; the Lord looked down, as on the old world, Gen. 6:5. Even in those actions of sinners that have some goodness in them, there is a fundamental error in the principle and end ; so that it may be said, There is none that doeth good. God made man in the way, set him in right, but he hath forsaken it. The corruption of mankind is an apostasy.

The root of all their wickedness we have, v. 18. The fear of God, is here put for all practical religion, which consists in an awful and serious regard to the Word and will of God as our rule, to the honor and glory of God as our end. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected.

So that we have here a short account of the general depravedness and corruption of mankind ; and may say, O Adam ! what hast thou done ? God made man upright, but thus he hath sought out many inventions.

V. 19—31. From all this Paul infers, that it is in vain to look for justification by the works of the law, and that it is to be had only by faith ; (the point he hath been all along proving, from ch. 1:17. and lays down, v. 28. as the summary of his discourse ;) a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law ; neither the deeds of the first law of pure innocence, which left no room for repentance ; nor the deeds of the law of nature, how highly soever improved ; nor the deeds of the ceremonial law ; (the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sin ;) nor the deeds of the moral law, which are included ; for he speaks of that law by which is the knowledge of sin, and those works which might be matter of boasting. Man, [could never make up for the least deficiency, as perfect obedience was his duty, at every moment, and,] in his depraved state, could never, by any works of his own, gain acceptance with God ; but it must be resolved purely into the free grace of God, given through Jesus Christ to all true believers that receive it as a free gift.

If we had never sinned, our obedience to the law would have been our righteousness [to life] ; 'Do this and live : ' but having sinned, and being corrupted, nothing we can do will atone for our former guilt. [For we could at no moment do more than our duty, and lay up this surplus as a fund to balance against sin.] It was by their obedience to the moral law that the Pharisees looked for justification, Luke 18:11.

Two things the apostle here argues from, the guiltiness of man, to prove that we cannot be justified by the works of the law ; and the glory of God, to prove that we must be justified by faith.

I. Man's guiltiness. 'May become guilty,' may be proved guilty, liable to punishment, Eph. 2:3. Guilty before God, is a dreadful word, before an all-seeing God, that is not, nor can be, deceived in his judgment ; before a just and righteous Judge, who will by no means clear the guilty. All are guilty, and therefore all have need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. For all have sinned, v. 23. Man was placed in the top of the visible creation, actively to glorify [by obedience to every law] that great Creator, whom the inferior creatures could glorify only objectively : but by sin he comes short of this. Therefore he must give up all hopes and expectations of being glorified with God in heaven, by any righteousness of his own. It is impossible now to get to heaven in the way of spotless innocency ; that passage is blocked up ; there is a cherub and a flaming sword set to keep that way to the tree of life.

Further, by the law is the knowledge of sin, v. 20. That law which convicts and condemns, can never justify us. As the conscience stands in relation to God, in his sight, we cannot be justified by the deeds of the law. He refers to Ps. 143:2.

II. He argues from God's glory, to prove that justification must be expected only by faith in Christ's righteousness. There is no justification by the works of the law. Must guilty man then remain eternally under wrath ? Is there no hope ? Is the wound become incurable because of transgression ? No, blessed be God, it is not, v. 21, 22. there is another way laid open for us, the righteousness of God, without the law, is manifested now under the Gospel. Justification may be obtained without the keeping of Moses' law : and this is called the righteousness of God, righteousness of his ordaining, and providing, and accepting ; righteousness them to the favor of God ; as the unbelieving Jews vainly imagined. And if these charges were true of the greater part of the nation in former times ; could it be supposed, that the Jews, when the apostle wrote, were better by nature, or merely as circumcised, or as having the law, than their forefathers had been ?—A few exceptions, by the mercy and grace of God, there doubtless were to these general rules ; and the apostle intended very soon to show how these persons were made to differ : but these quotations were full to the point, to show the Jews, that they were as unable to justify themselves before God as the Gentiles.

SCOTT. V. 19, 20. Every attentive reader must observe, that the apostle uses the word 'law' in various meanings ; which is rather to be considered as the defect of human language, than the result of ambiguity in his style. But the context generally shows how the word is to be understood : and common sense, united with a teachable spirit, will usually determine this far better than critical learning ; which is too often employed to perplex what is plain, rather than to clear up what is obscure. The nature of the argument requires us to suppose, that the apostle means the sacred Scriptures in general, when he says, 'Whatsoever the law saith : ' for the quotations are not from the law of Moses, and it is evident the whole O. T. was thus spoken of. John 10:32—33, v. 34. When he spoke of the Jews, as 'under the law,' he evidently meant the whole legal dispensation, by which they were distinguished from the Gentiles. But when he says, 'by the law is the knowledge of sin,' he must be understood of the moral law especially, the extent, spirituality, and excellency of which shows what things are sinful, and how evil sin is : whereas the ceremonial law rather gave the knowledge of salvation, by prefiguring the shedding of that atoning blood, and the communication of that sanctifying grace, by which sin is taken away. 7:7—12. John 1:17. 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 13. Indeed, this subject seems capable of an easy solution. If there be any law, which a man has perfectly kept, he may doubtless be justified by it : and surely no man can be justified by a law, which condemns him for breaking it ! But, there is no law of God, which any man has kept ; therefore no law by the deeds of which a man can be justified. The Gentile broke the law of his reason and conscience ; the Jew broke the moral law ; and even the attempt to justify himself by observing the ceremonial law, contradicted the very nature and intent of it. And as to that 'new law,' which requires sincere obedience as the condition of justification ; those who dream of it, should show us when it was promulgated, where it may be found, what it requires, whom it can condemn, or whom it can justify. When this is done, it may be worth while to prove that it 'makes void' both the law and the gospel ; that it introduces a new, vague, and unintelligible rule of duty, which every man may interpret according to his own inclinations ; that it introduces boasting, and unites together pharisaical pride and antinomian licentiousness. 29—31. Yet this vague, unscriptural notion, which is replete with such complicated absurdities, so well suits men's natural indolence of thought in matters of religion ; serves so conveniently to reconcile a quiet conscience with a worldly life ; and so coincides with their enmity against both the holiness of the law, and the humiliating doctrines of the gospel ; that perhaps it deceives more souls, than all other false systems of religion put together, in this superficial, dissipated age.—'By law, which is the publishing of the rule with a penalty, we are not delivered from the power of sin, nor can it help men to righteousness ; but by law we come experimentally to know sin, in the power and force of it, since we find it prevail on us, notwithstanding the punishment of death is annexed to it.' Locke.—'The knowledge of sin being chiefly by the moral law, (7:7.) shows, that the apostle excludes that, as well as the ceremonial law, from justification : and evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along, not between moral and ceremonial works, but between works in general, and faith. 20, 22, 27. 4:2, 6. 9:32. 10:5, 6. Whitby.—'No flesh,' means none born of fallen Adam's race. 1—4, 9. *John 3:6. STUART. (20.) The law..the law. 'Law..law.' V. 21—26. The apostle, having 'shut up all men under sin,' Gal. 3:19—22, v. 22. proceeds more explicitly to exhibit 'the righteousness of God by faith,' 1:17. which had been manifestly declared by the preaching of the Gospel. This is the righteousness, which God had appointed, provided, and introduced, in the Person of his Son. It was 'without the law ;' having no dependence on any man's personal obedience to the law, being entirely a distinct thing : no past obedience being in the least taken notice of, as having any influence in the sinner's justification ; and his subsequent obedience being intended for other purposes. It had nothing to do with the ceremonial law, except as it was the substance of some of its shadows : for the Jew, who accepted of this righteousness, would place no dependence on these externals ; and the Gentile convert was not required to be circumcised, or to keep that law. Yet it had been 'witnessed by the law and the prophets : ' the ceremonies typified it ; the very strictness of the moral law, and its awful curses, being compared with the promises of mercy to sinners, implied it ; the promises and predictions of the Messiah bore witness to it ; the faith and hope of ancient believers recognised it ; and the whole O. T., rightly understood, taught men to expect and depend on it. This 'righteousness of God by faith in Jesus' is accounted, or imputed, to all believers without exception : yea, it is 'put on them' as a robe : for the words 'unto all and upon all,' seem incapable of any other consistent construction. 4:4—8. Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 23:5, 6. Dan. 9:24. 1 Cor. 1:26

22 Even the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference;

23 For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God;

24 Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus:

25 Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God;

26 To declare, I say, at this time, his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

which He confers on us; as the Christian armor is called the armor of God, Eph. 6:11. Now concerning the righteousness of God, Observe, 1. That it is manifested; made plain, laid open: the brazen serpent is lifted up on the pole. 2. It is without the law. Here he obviates the method of the judaizing Christians, who would needs join Christ and Moses together; the righteousness Christ hath brought in, is a complete righteousness. 3. Yet it is witnessed by the law and the prophets; there were types, and prophecies, and promises, in the O. T. that pointed at this. The law, so far from justifying us, directs us to another way of justification; points at Christ as our righteousness, to whom bear all the prophets witness. See Acts 10:43. This might recommend it to the Jews, who were so fond of the law and the prophets. 4. It is by the faith of Jesus Christ, that faith which hath Jesus Christ for its object; an anointed Savior, so Jesus Christ signifies. Justifying faith respects Christ as a Savior, in all three anointed offices, as Prophet, Priest, and King; trusting to Him, accepting of Him, and adhering to Him, in all these. 5. It is to all, and upon all, them that believe. Therefore, as he had often said, Jews and Gentiles, if they believe, stand on the same level, and are alike welcome to God through Christ; for there is no difference. Or, it is to all, offered to all in general; the Gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves; but it is upon all that believe; not only tendered to them, but put on them as a crown, as a robe; they are, on their believing, interested in it, and entitled to all the benefits and privileges of it. But now, how is this for God's glory?

(1.) It is for the glory of his grace, v. 24. It is by his grace, not by the grace wrought in us, as the papists say, confounding justification and sanctification; but by the gracious favor of God to us, without any merit in us so much as foreseen. And to make it the more emphatical, he says, it is freely by his grace, to show that it must be understood of grace in the most proper and genuine sense. It is said, that Joseph found grace in the sight of his master, Gen. 39:4. but there was a reason; he saw that what he did prospered; there was something in Joseph to invite that grace: but the grace of God communicated to us, comes freely, freely; it is free grace, mere mercy; nothing in us to deserve such favors; no, it is all through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. It comes freely to us, but Christ bought it, and paid dear for it; which yet is so ordered, as not to derogate from the honor of free grace. Christ's purchase is no bar to the freeness of God's grace; for grace provided and accepted this vicarious satisfaction.

(2.) It is for the glory of his justice and righteousness, v. 25, 26. Note, [1.] Jesus Christ is the great propitiation, or propitiatory Sacrifice, typified by the mercy-seat under the law. He is our throne of grace, in and through whom atonement is made for sin, and our persons and performances are accepted of God, 1 John, 2:2. God was in Christ, as in his mercy-seat, reconciling the world unto Himself. [2.] God hath set Him forth to be so. God, the party offended, makes the first overtures towards a reconciliation, appoints the Days-man; foreordained Him to this, in the counsels of his love from eternity, appointed, anointed Him to it, qualified Him for it, and has exhibited Him to a guilty world as their propitiation. See Mat. 3:17. and 17:5. [3.] By faith in his blood we become interested in this propitiation. Faith, in the business of justification, hath a special regard to the blood of Christ, as that which made the atonement; for such was the divine appointment, that without blood there should be no remission, and no blood but his would do it effectually. Here may be an allusion to Ex. 24:8. [4.] All who by faith are interested in this propitiation, have the remission of their sins that

Ps. 73:23—28, v. 24. 1 Pet. 5:10, 11. Whatever the nature or degree of men's crimes may have been, or whatever their nation, rank, or capacities, the way in which they must be justified before God is the same. 4:6—8. 2:32—34. This is by the free gift of God, which He bestows on the believer, wholly from his own infinite grace and mercy; not only without his deserving it, but directly contrary to his deserts, which the apparent tautology, 'freely by his grace,' seems to denote. This grace is honorably exercised, 'through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ,' or through the ransom, and meritorious obedience unto death, of the incarnate Son of God, as our Surety: for God the Father had before set Him forth to be a propitiatory sacrifice; He had appointed Him to be Mediator, as 'God manifested in the flesh,' for that purpose; He had openly 'laid on Him the iniquities of us all,' and exacted the punishment from Him; and He had exhibited this transaction to the world by the Gospel, that through Him sinners of every nation might approach God, on a propitiatory, or mercy-seat, and find acceptance by faith in the Savior's atoning blood. This method was taken in order 'to declare' and manifest the perfect righteousness of God; even in the very act of pardoning the innumerable sins of believers, remitting the punishment due to them, and accounting those righteous who in themselves were not so. Indeed, whatever the Jews might suppose, this was as necessary in respect of their believing progenitors as any other sinners. For, in remitting the punishment, justly merited by the sins committed in times past 'through his forbearance,' God was not propitiated in any degree by the repentance or subsequent good works of his servants, which could not satisfy his justice; nor did He ultimately regard the legal sacrifices, which 'could not take away sin;' but He had dealt with them as looking forward to the engagements of the divine Surety of the new covenant, and the atonement which He was at length to make. In the fulness of time, therefore, this sacrifice was offered, this righteousness introduced, and this method of justification published to mankind; that God might be clearly known to be a just and righteous Governor, and yet 'the Justifier' of every one 'who believed in Jesus,' which He could not otherwise have been. Prov. 17:15. 24:24, 25. For justice in a governor requires, that every man be dealt with according to his real character and actions; except some expedient can be adopted, for maintaining the authority of the law, and the credit of the administration; and to indemnify individuals: while mercy is exercised to those who deserve punishment. So that ancient believers had been admitted to the reward of righteousness, as well as exempted from the punishment deserved by their sins, for the sake of that promised Redeemer, who had engaged to pay their ransom, and bring in an infinitely valuable and everlasting righteousness for their justification: nor would it otherwise have consisted with the infinite justice of God, to have dealt with them in a manner, so very different from their real deservings, nay, contrary to them. Heb. 11:1—16, 39, 40. This is evidently the apostle's argument; and the concluding vs. might be thus tr.: 'Whom God hath before appointed to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, for a demonstration of his justice, on account of the passing by of sins that had been committed in former times, through the forbearance of God: I say, for a demonstration of his justice in this present time, in order that He might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.' — Dr. Hammond saith, the word dikaios is here to be tr. clement and merciful, and that it is commonly taken in that notion, and seldom in that of vindictive justice: but in opposition to this I assert, that the word is used about 80 times in the N. T., and not once in that sense of clemency and mercy. . . He himself produces but one place, Mat. 1:19.

where, says Lightfoot, men torment the word to make it signify clement and merciful, when it bears clearly the ordinary sense. Joseph being a just man, would not cohabit with an adulteress: and yet not being willing to make her a public example, and no necessity . . . lying upon him so to do, he was minded to put her away privily. . . That He might appear to be just, in requiring this satisfaction for our sins.' Whitby.—Too strong a protest cannot be entered against this practice of giving a new meaning to words, in Scripture, in order to get rid of a conclusion, against which the writer happens to be prejudiced: it is absolutely adding to, or taking from, or changing the Word of God, Rev. 22:18—21. and it perplexes the minds of ordinary readers to such a degree, that the plainest passages seem to them obscure, and of doubtful meaning.

(21, &c.) 'But now, the justification which is of God, without law, is revealed; to which testimony is given by the law and the prophets; a justification, moreover, which is of God by faith in Jesus Christ, (offered) to all, and (bestowed) on all who believe; for there is no distinction. For all have sinned, and come short of the glory which God bestows, &c.' St. Turner thus neatly connects the two clauses: "It need not surprise you, that justification cannot be thus obtained, since the law had quite a different design, viz. to bring us (21) to the knowledge of sin; nunti de, &c., but now under the Gospel a method of justification is revealed, of which God is the Author (dikaïosunē Theou), and to which all your Scriptures bear testimony, that method, which, rejecting obedience as the ground of (22) justification (chōris nomou), makes faith in Christ and his merits, the only cause, and which extends its benefits to all believers, Gentiles as well as Jews." BLOOMF.

(25, &c.) Propitiation.] 'Propitiatory sacrifice. So the Fathers and Greek commentators, and Erasm., Grot., Ham., Le Cl., Bois, Elsu., Kyp., Kop., Storr, Schl., and St.' *Ed. STUART. (25, 26.) 'Justice, in a ruler, is that virtue, whose exercise demonstrates that he best consults the good of his subjects. All had rebelled. Were all to be destroyed? this would not have been to consult their good. Were some? but a common Father should not be swayed by a partial solicitude. Were they to be left to themselves? thus also would they plunge into ruin. Finally, were the same to be imposed on the Jews by themselves, and on the Gentiles? but they would not have had greater force to amend them, than at first. Was impunity, outright, to be promised? This would have opened a wide door to licentiousness and crime. Nothing then was left, but that all without distinction should be invited to the same society and worship, pardon of the past and amnesty being promised, and the condition prescribed of an obedience, new, evangelical, and adapted to the human condition. 1 John 1:9. 2:2.' West.—'Now as the apostle here assures us, that Christ's death is a proof of God's righteousness, both when He passed by the sins of mankind before Christ came, and when, in the present time, He passes them by, we are led therefrom to conclude, that Christ's death hath rendered these exercises of God's mercy consistent with his character, as the righteous moral Governor of the universe. But in what manner this joyful event hath been accomplished by Christ's death, is nowhere in Scripture, so far as I know, declared to us. It is sufficient to all the purposes of our salvation, that the fact is revealed; and our duty is, to believe the fact upon the testimony of God who hath revealed it, and to rest our hope of salvation thereon, although the manner in which it hath been accomplished is not made known to us.' Mackn. Rom. 5:9. 27 Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay; but by the law of faith.

28 Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.

29 Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also:

30 Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.

31 Do we then make void the law through a faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law.

1 Abraham's faith was imputed to him for righteousness, 10 before he was circumcised. 13 By faith only he and his seed received the promise. 16 Abraham is the father of all that believe. 24 Our faith also shall be imputed to us for righteousness.

WHAT shall we say then that Abraham, our father a as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?

are past. It was for this, Christ was set forth to be a propitiation, in order to remission, to which the reprieves of his patience and forbearance were a very encouraging preface. Through the forbearance of God. Divine patience hath kept us out of hell, that we might have space to repent, and get to heaven. Some refer the sins that are past, to the sins of the O. T. saints, which were pardoned for the sake of the atonement which Christ in the fulness of time was to make, which looked backward as well as forward. Several Greek copies make through the forbearance of God to begin v. 26. and they denote two precious fruits of Christ's merit and God's grace, remission, and forbearance: it is owing to Christ, that there is ever a sinner on this side of hell. [5.]

PRACT. OBS. We ought always to distinguish between our advantages, and our deservings; and between the means of becoming accepted and holy, and that grace which teaches to profit by those means.—The nature and desert of sin, and the motives and purposes of the sinner, remain precisely the same; when the only wise God has taken occasion from them to manifest more conspicuously his own glory: and his justice also will be glorified in punishing the transgressors.—Let us remember, that many and great as our advantages are, we are no better in the sight of God than the heighthed heathens, if not worse; except grace have made us to differ; and then to grace the whole praise is due: for it is proved, beyond contradiction, that we are all, in ourselves, 'under sin.' Eph. 2:1, 2. Tit. 3:4—7.—The Scriptures adduced in these vs.

V. 27, 28. The apostle decides, that all boasting by any of the human race is excluded, and can have no admission, in consistency with truth and justice. It was indeed the avowed purpose of God, that boasting should be shut out, by justifying believers, entirely by the grace of God, through the righteousness and redemption of Christ, without any respect to their works, by faith alone, of his own gift and operation, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Eph. 2:4—10. not considered, in this matter, as an act of obedience, or a good work, or as the principle of subsequent obedience, Gal. 5:1—6. but as forming the relation between Christ and the sinner; which renders it proper, that the believer should be pardoned and justified for the sake of the Savior; and that the unbeliever, who is not thus united or related to Him, should remain under condemnation. This is 'the law of faith,' or the rule of the divine conduct towards believers and unbelievers; and as God has determined, that 'no flesh shall glory in his presence;' so on this ground, also, the apostle concluded, that 'a man is justified by faith, and not by the deeds of the law.' Sc.

V. 29—31. The doctrine of faith indeed honors and fulfils the ceremonial law; and showed the proper intent of it, and of the legal dispensation: but then, this was only in order to the final abrogation of them. But the moral law was fully established in honor and authority, both in respect of its precepts and sanction, by the perfect obedience and propitiatory sufferings of the incarnate Son of God: so that its immutable obligation, excellency, and equity, could not have been so fully shown, either by the perfect obedience of the whole human species, or by the destruction of every transgressor. Nor is any man justified by faith in Christ, who does not condemn himself, as justly deserving the wrath of God, for breaking his holy law. Moreover, it is given into the hands of every believer, as his rule of grateful obedience, by which he is to regulate his temper and conduct, and examine all his actions; that in everything, in which he deviates from this perfect standard, he may repent, and seek forgiveness through the blood of Christ. Yea, it is written in his heart, by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit. Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13. and the believer's love to it, and delight in obeying it, are the evidences of his justification. Jam. 2:14—26. So that the doctrine

God does in all this declare his righteousness, (he insists on it with great emphasis,) 1st. In the propitiation itself. Never was there such a demonstration of the justice and holiness of God, as there was in the death of Christ. 2dly. In the pardon on that propitiation; so it follows, by way of explication, that He might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth. It would not stand with his justice to demand the debt of the principal, when the Surety has paid it, and He has accepted that payment in full satisfaction. See 1 Jn. 1:9. He is just, faithful to his Word.

(3.) It is for God's glory; for boasting is thus excluded, v. 27. God will have the great work of the justification and salvation of sinners carried on from first to last, in such a way as might exclude boasting, that no flesh might glory in his presence, 1 Cor. 1:29—31. Justification by works would not exclude it: if saved by our own works, we might put the crown on our own heads. But faith for ever excludes, for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne. Believers are not left lawless; faith is a law, a working grace, wherever it is in truth; and yet, because it acts in a strict and close dependence on Jesus Christ, it excludes boasting.

From all this he draws this conclusion, v. 28. That a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law.

Lastly, In the close of the ch. he shows the extent of this privilege of justification by faith, that it is not the peculiar privilege of the Jews, but pertains to the Gentiles also; for he had said, v. 22. that there is no difference: and as to this, 1. he asserts and proves it, v. 29, 30. Is He the God of the Jews only? He argues from the absurdity of such a supposition. Can it be imagined that a God of infinite love and mercy, should limit and confine his favors to that little, perverse people, the Jews, leaving all the rest of men in a condition eternally desperate? * too exactly describe the bulk of nominal Christians: and he who examines the state of society, even in this Christian country; nay, he who inquires seriously into the disposition of his own heart, and the tenor of his past and present life, comparing them with the holy law of God; will easily perceive, that his mouth, and 'every mouth must be stopped, and all the world must be brought in guilty before God.' How plain then is it to common sense, that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified before God!' And whatever Pharisees, Sadducees, or Infidels may object; whatever antinomians, or enthusiasts may plead, or profess; the doctrine of faith establishes the law in its real honor, and lays the true foundation for all holy obedience; and this doctrine alone 'establishes the law.' SCOTT.

of faith, in every way magnifies and establishes the just, holy, good, and spiritual law of God, in all its honor and authority; while all other schemes of justification disgrace it, or weaken its authority and obligation, as if its precepts were unreasonably strict, and its penalty unrighteously severe; so that God would not be just, if He dealt with men according to it. We therefore know what the apostle's doctrine was: because we know what doctrine is objected to, as 'making void the law;' what doctrine is perverted by hypocrites and antinomians, as loosening man's obligation to holy practice; and what doctrine, when duly understood and truly believed, 'establishes the law' in the completest manner, and gives the most efficacious motives to all holy obedience. Sc.

(30.) Through. 'By.' St. 'It is plain, however, that the apostle [in using ek and dia, tr. by and through] meant to make some distinction.' BLOOMER.

(31.) 'Finally, it is evident that, by the faith to which he attributes justification, the apostle means not an idle faith, but a working faith, attended with works of love both toward God and our neighbor; and consequently, that the works which he excludes from justification are not evangelical works, or such as are done in, and proceed from, faith in Christ; but only, 1. works of perfect obedience, or sinless works, there being none such to be found among the sons of fallen man; or, 2. works done in the strength of the Mosaic law, without the grace of the Gospel; or, 3. the works of the ceremonial law, such as circumcision, sacrifice, and the like; or, 4. and lastly, all manner of works whatsoever, as far as they are relied on as meritorious causes of our justification or salvation; there being but one only cause of that kind, namely, the meritorious obedience and sufferings of our dear Redeemer and Savior.' Ep. BULL.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. 'From this example of Abraham the apostle intended to draw a conclusion, which would necessarily take in all believers. And that he might do this fairly, he intimates, at the very entrance of the question, that he did not propose Abraham merely as one of the number of believers, but as the father of the church; that he might properly reason from the father to his children, [189]

2 For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not <sup>b</sup> before God.

3 For what saith the <sup>c</sup> Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.

4 Now to him that worketh <sup>d</sup> is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.

5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith <sup>e</sup> is counted for righteousness.

6 Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works,

7 Saying, <sup>f</sup> Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.

8 Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

9 Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

b c. 3:27. 1 Co. c Ge. 15:6. e Hab. 2:4. 1:29. d c. 11:6. f Ps. 32:1, 2.

—from an equal case, as they say, but a fortiori,—from a stronger case. If Abraham, a man so famous for works, so eminent in holiness and obedience, was nevertheless justified by faith only, and not by those works; how much less can any other, especially any of those that spring from him, and come so far short of him in works, set up for a justification by their own works? And it proves likewise, ex-abundanti,—the more abundantly, as some observe, that we are not justified; no, not by those good works which flow from faith, as the matter of our righteousness; for such were Abraham's works, and are we better than he?

V. 1—8. Here the apostle recognises his kindred to Abraham, and asks, What has he found,—as pertaining to the flesh, i. e. by circumcision and his external privileges and performances? Those the apostle calls flesh, Phil. 3:3. Now what did he get by these? Was he justified by them? Was it the merit of his works that recommended him to God's acceptance? No, by no means; which he proves by several arguments.

I. If he was justified by works, room would be left for boasting, which must for ever be excluded. He might deserve well of men, but could never merit of God, v. 2. Paul himself had whereof to glory before men, and we have him sometimes glorying in it, yet with humility; but nothing to glory in before God, 1 Cor. 4:4. Phil. 3:8, 9. So Abraham.

II. It is expressly said, that Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness. In all controversies in religion, this must be our question, What saith the Scripture? v. 3. Is. 8:20. thither is the last appeal. Now the Scripture saith, that Abraham believed, and that was counted to him for righteousness, Gen. 15:6. therefore he had not whereof to glory before God, it being purely of free grace that it was so imputed, and having not in itself anything of the formal nature of a righteousness, further than as God Himself was graciously pleased to count it to him.

III. If he were justified by works, the reward would have been of debt, and not of grace; which is not to be imagined. This is his argument, v. 4, 5. Abraham's reward was God Himself; so He had told him but just before, Gen. 15:1. I am thy exceeding great reward. Now if Abraham had merited this by the perfection of his obedience, it had not been an act of grace in God, but Abraham might have demanded it, [and so had power over God Himself!] But it is impossible for man, much more guilty man, to make God a debtor to him, Rom. 11:35. Therefore to him that worketh not, that can pretend to no such merit, nor show any worth or value in his work, which may answer such a reward, but, disclaiming any such pretension, casts himself wholly on the free grace of God in Christ, by a lively, active, obedient faith; to such an one faith is counted for righteousness, is accepted of God as the qualification required in all those that shall be pardoned and saved.

Him that justifieth the ungodly, i. e. him that was before ungodly. His former ungodliness was no bar to his justification on his believing; that ungodly one, i. e. Abraham, who, before his conversion, it should seem, [but for this there is little authority,] was carried down the stream of the Chaldean idolatry, Josh. 24:2. No room therefore is left for despair; though God clears not the impenitent guilty, yet through Christ He justifies the ungodly.

IV. He further illustrates this, by a passage out of Pss. where David speaks of the remission of sins, the prime branch of justification, as constituting the happiness and blessedness of a man; pronouncing him blessed, not that has no sin, or none which deserved death, but the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin; who, though he cannot plead Not guilty, pleads the act of indemnity, and his plea is allowed. It is quoted from Ps. 32:1, 2. not entering into judgment, not marking iniquities: being purely acts of grace, the acceptance and the reward cannot be expected as due debts; therefore Paul infers, v. 6. that it is the imputing of righteousness without works. Blessed are they. Pardoned people are the only blessed people. The sentiments of the world are, Those are happy, that have a clear estate, and are out of debt to man; but the sentence of the Word is, Those are happy, that have their debts to God discharged. Oh, how much therefore is it our interest to make it sure to ourselves that our sins are pardoned! For that is the foundation of all other benefits. Heb. 8:12.

V. 9—17. Paul observes in this paragraph, when and why Abraham was thus justified; it was before he was circumcised, and before the giving of the law; and there was a reason for both.

I. It was before he was circumcised, v. 10. It was imputed, Gen. 15:6. and he was not circumcised till ch. 17. Abraham is expressly said to be justified by faith, 14 years, some say 25 years, before he was circumcised: which, as it might silence the fears of the poor uncircumcised Gentiles, might lower the pride and conceitedness of the Jews, who gloried in their circumcision, as if they had the monopoly of all happiness.

the foundation of which he lays in v. 13. . . In whatever way Abraham, the father of believers, was justified, in the same must all his children (i. e. all believers) be justified: but Abraham was not justified, and made the father of the faithful, by any of his own works, either preceding or following his faith in Christ, as promised to him; but merely by faith in Christ, or the merit of Christ by faith imputed to him for righteousness. Therefore all his children become his children, and are justified, not by their works, either preceding or following their faith; but by faith alone in the same Christ, who was at length to come; . . . and thus they are at present justified, and shall be to the end of the world.' Beza.—Thus the apostle, by this single example, struck at the very root of their national vain confidence, in Abraham as their father, in circumcision, and in the law of Moses. V. 4, 5. This imputation of faith is not because of its own excellency, or worthiness as a good work; but as it refers the Sovereign Judge for payment to the accepted righteousness and atonement of his Son; even as the receipt of a scrap of paper, intrinsically not worth a farthing, in the form of a draft on a creditable banker, is entered in the merchant's book, for a considerable sum of money, as if it had been paid in cash. The man 'who worketh not,' will indeed diligently use appointed means of grace, earnestly and perseveringly repent, forsake sin with decision, and conscientiously perform his several duties, and even become 'zealous of good works:' yet he 'worketh not' at all, with an aim or expectation of obtaining righteousness in this way, which he knows to be absolutely impossible. He comes to God, as 'the Justifier of the ungodly,' that he may obtain 'the gift of righteousness by faith,' of free grace, through the merits of the divine Surety. He is not indeed absolutely 'ungodly' at the time of his justification; for his humiliation, submission, and faith, are effects of regeneration; which is the source of all 'godliness' in a fallen creature. Yet he is justified, as 'ungodly' in himself, in strict justice, and according to the law: he comes for the blessing as 'ungodly'; God makes no account of anything in justifying him, except his faith as forming his relation to Christ; and the man has no respect to anything else himself, in expecting that blessing. Nay, the justified believer, whatever his holiness or diligence may be, never works for this purpose; and he still comes before God as 'ungodly,' in this respect, still depending on 'the righteousness of God by faith in Christ,' as his only hope; though his good works are evidences of the sincerity of his faith. Phil. 3:8—11.—Abraham seven-ral years before, 'by faith, obeyed' the call and command of God: and therefore could not be, strictly speaking, altogether 'ungodly,' when it was said, 'He believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness:' so that the example of Abraham is a full and clear refutation of the construction, which some put on this text, that men are, altogether and in every sense, ungodly and unregenerate, at the time when God justifies them; a most obnoxious sentiment, and of most dangerous tendency. Heb. 11:8—10. "He that worketh," i. e. who hath deserved anything by his work, to whom is opposed "he that worketh not;" i. e. who brings no work, for which he claims a reward; but depends on the gratuitous promise of God. But this indeed is spoken, by concession, in a similitude taken from the commerce and contracts of men: for otherwise, "who hath first given? and it shall be rendered to him again." Beza. 11:1—6, vv. 5, 6, 33—36. SCOTT.

(5.) 'To him that worketh reward is not counted as a matter of grace, but as a debt.' St. 'The sentiment is here illustrated by an example deduced from common life, and the affairs of men. (Grot. and Koppe.) The words may be r.: "Now to the laborer, (one who fully performs his engagements, and fulfils his stipulated task,) his wages are not reckoned as a favor, but are regarded as a debt (being what he has earned)." The words contain both the illustration and the application. In the application, "him that worketh" must denote, him who has exerted his full powers, and exactly performed his duty.' BLOOMF.

V. 6—8. Not that forgiveness of sins is equivalent to justification; for this implies also treating a man as righteous, and entitled to the reward of eternal life; as it is evident, in all human transactions, that the pardon of a criminal is very distinct from giving him the title to an estate. But God always imputes righteousness, where He does not impute sin: for none are pardoned, except in virtue of their relation to Christ by faith; and if his atoning blood cover their sins, his righteousness also justifies their persons. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. As their Surety, He suffered for their sins, which were imputed to Him; and they are rewarded and made heirs of eternal life, because his righteousness is imputed to them. 'From hence the expression of blotting out iniquity, so frequently used in Scripture, may be understood; that is, the striking it out of the account.' Locke.—It should be remembered, that the inspired apostle, under a clearer dispensation, expounds the words of the prophet; not the prophet the words of the apostle. We must therefore understand David, according to Paul's interpretation; and not the reverse. If Paul meant forgiveness exclusively; why should he add the clause, 'imputeth righteousness without works?' 9—12.—(7, 8) Blessed, &c. Exactly from the LXX. Ps. 32:1, 2. SCOTT.

V. 9—12. This language fully proves, that circumcision sealed spiritual blessings to Abraham personally, as the outward seal of the cove-

10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

11 And he received the sign of circumcision; a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had, yet being uncircumcised; that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also:

12 And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had, being yet uncircumcised.

13 For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith.

14 For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect:

15 Because the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression.

16 Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all,

17 (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were.

18 Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be.

Two reasons there are why Abraham was justified by faith in uncircumcision:

1. That circumcision might be a seal of the righteousness of faith, v. 11. The tenor of the covenants must first be settled, before the seal can be annexed. Sealing supposes a bargain-precedent, which is confirmed and ratified by that ceremony. After Abraham's justification by faith had continued several years, for the confirmation of his faith, God was pleased to appoint a sealing ordinance; and Abraham received it, though a bloody ordinance, even as a special favor, the sign of, &c. Now we may hence observe, (1.) The nature of the sacraments in general; they are signs, and seals; signs to represent and instruct; seals to ratify and confirm; signs of absolute grace and favor; seals of the conditional promises: nay, mutual seals; God seals us to be to us a God, and we seal to Him to be to Him a people. (2.) The nature of circumcision in particular; it was the initiating sacrament of the O. T. and it is here said to be, [1.] A sign; a sign of that original corruption all are born with, and which is cut off by spiritual circumcision; a commemorating sign of God's covenant with Abraham; a distinguishing sign between Jews and Gentiles; a sign of admission into the visible church; a sign prefiguring baptism, which comes in the room of circumcision, now under the Gospel, when (the blood of Christ being shed) all bloody ordinances are abolished; it was on outward and sensible sign of an inward and spiritual grace signified thereby. [2.] A seal of the righteousness of the faith. In general, it was a seal of the covenant of grace, particularly of justification by faith; the covenant of grace, called the righteousness which is of faith, ch. 10:6. and it refers to an O. T. promise, Deut. 30:12.

Now if infants were then capable of receiving a seal of the covenant of grace, which proves that they then were within the verge of that covenant, how they come to be now cast out of the covenant, and incapable of the seal, and by what severe sentence they were thus rejected and incapacitated, those are concerned to make out, that not only reject, but nullify and reproach, the baptism of the seed of believers.

2. That he might be the father of all them that believe. Not but that there were those that were justified by faith before Abraham; but of Abraham first it is particularly observed, and in him commenced a much clearer and fuller dispensation of the covenant of grace, than any that had been before extant; therefore he is called the father of all that believe, because he was so eminent a believer, and so eminently justified by faith; as Jabbal was the father of shepherds, and Jubal of musicians, Gen. 4:20, 21. The father of all them that believe, a standing pattern of faith; as parents are examples to their children: and a standing precedent of justification by faith; as the liberties, privileges, honors, and estates of the fathers descend to their children. Abraham was the father of believers, because to him particularly the magna charta was renewed. Thus were [unbelievers, even if Jews, excluded, and] the doubts and fears of the poor Gentiles anticipated, and no room left to question but that righteousness might be imputed to them also, Col. 3:11. Gal. 5:6.

II. It was before the giving of the law, v. 13—16. The former observation was levelled against those that confined justification to the circumcision, this to those that expected it by the law; now the promise was made to Abraham long before the law. Comp. Gal. 3:17, 18. Observe,

1. What that promise was,—that he should be the heir of the world, i. e. of the land of Canaan, the choicest spot of ground in the world; or the father of many nations of the world, who sprang from him, beside the Israelites; or the heir of the comforts of the life which now is. Or rather, it points at Christ, the Seed here mentioned; comp. Gal. 3:16. Now Christ is the Heir of the world, the ends of the earth are his possession, and it is in Him that Abraham was so. And it refers to that promise, Gen. 12:3. In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.

2. How it was made to him, not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith; not through the law, for that was not yet given; but on that believing which was counted to him for righteousness; on his trusting God, in leaving his country when God bid him, Heb. 11:8. Now being by faith, it could not be by the law; which he proves by the opposition that is between them, v. 14, 15. for then faith would be made void. Besides, The law worketh wrath, v. 15. wrath in us to God; it irritates and provokes that carnal mind which is enmity to God, as the damming up of a stream makes it swell,—wrath in God against us; it works this, it discovers it; or our breach of the law works it. How the law works wrath, he shows very concisely in the latter part of the v.; Where no law is, there is no transgression; an acknowledged maxim, which implies, Where there is a law, there is transgression, and [of course, punishment or] wrath.

3. Why the promise was made to him by faith; for three reasons, v. 16. (1.) That it might be by grace, that grace might have the honor of it; faith hath particular reference to grace granting, as grace hath to faith receiving. By grace, and therefore through faith, Eph. 2:8. (2.) That the promise might be sure. The first covenant, being a covenant of works, was not sure; but, through man's failure, the benefits designed by it [might be and] were cut off; therefore, the more effectually to ascertain and ensure the conveyance of the new covenant, there is another way found out, not by works, (were it so, the promise would not be sure, because of the continual frailty and infirmity of the flesh,) but by faith, which receives all from Christ, and acts in a continual dependence on Him, as the great Trustee of our salvation, and in whose keeping it is safe. (3.) That it might be sure to all the seed. If it had been by the law, it had been limited to the Jews, but therefore it was by faith, [that it might produce a more extensive happiness,] Gentiles as well as Jews becoming interested in it; the spiritual as well as the natural seed of faithful Abraham. Gen. 17:5. where the reason of the change of his name from Abram,—a high father, to Abraham,—the high father of a multitude, is thus rendered; For a father of many nations have I made thee; i. e. all believers, both before and since the coming of Christ in the flesh, should take Abraham for their pattern, and call him father.

V. 17—22. Having observed when Abraham was justified by faith, and why, the apostle here describes, magnifies, and commends the faith of Abraham; where observe,

I. Whom he believed; God. Observe what in God his faith eyed:

1. God, who quickeneth the dead. It was promised that he should be the father of many nations, when he and his wife were now as good as dead; Heb. 11:11, 12. therefore he looks on God as a God that could breathe life into dry bones. He that quickeneth the dead, can do anything, can give a child to Abraham when he is old; can bring the Gentiles, who are dead in trespass-nant of grace, and the emblem of sanctification, however it might otherwise be applied or misunderstood. 'This seems an incontestable proof, that circumcision was the seal of the covenant of grace, and not merely of temporal promises; and consequently obviates the most considerable objection, that hath ever been urged against infant-baptism.' Doddr. Heb. 6:13—20.

(11.) 'As a seal of the righteousness by faith which (he possessed) in a state of uncircumcision.'

V. 13. Through the law.] 'By law.'

V. 14. 'Faith is rendered of none effect, and the promise is made void.'

V. 15. No law is.] 13:2:12. 'Nomos is used, by Paul, of every rule of life, of every revelation, especially of the Mosaic law. The various senses then of this word, are calculated to produce perplexity. . . . Our English version, by having almost constantly said "the law," whatever be the meaning of nomos in the original, has made this most difficult epistle still more obscure.' Bp. Middleton.—When without the article, it is commonly used for law in general, or rule of conduct, whatever it be: when with the article, of the Mosaic law. Yet this rule has several exceptions, which the context alone can fully decide.

V. 16. 'Not only to him who is under the law, but to him who is of the faith of Abraham;—who is, &c. in the sight of God, in whom he believed, &c.'

V. 18—22. He confidently hoped to become the father of many nations, naturally in his posterity, and spiritually through Christ, who was to descend from him; because God had said, that his seed should be innumerable as the stars of heaven. Gen. 15:5, 6. 'His faith was imputed to him for righteousness.' That is, his faith was thus approved

19 And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb :

20 He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God;

21 And being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform.

22 And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness.

23 Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him;

24 But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead;

25 Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.

ses and sins, to a divine and spiritual life, Eph. 2:1. Comp. Eph. 1:19, 20.

2. Who calleth things which are not, as though they were; i. e. creates all things by the word of his power, as in the beginning, Gen. 1:3. 2 Cor. 4:6. The justification and salvation of sinners, the espousing of the Gentiles that had not been a people, were a gracious calling of things which are not, as though they were, giving being to things that were not. This expresses the sovereignty of God, and his absolute power and dominion; a mighty stay to faith, when all other props sink and totter.

II. How he believed.

1. Against hope, he believed in hope, v. 18. There was no natural hope; all the arguments of sense, and reason, and experience, which in such cases usually beget and support hope, were against him; but, against all those inducements to the contrary, he believed; for he had a hope, which arose, as his faith did, from the consideration of God's all-sufficiency. Therefore God enabled him thus to believe against hope, that he might pass for a pattern of great and strong faith to all generations. Or, his being the father of the faithful is mentioned as the matter of the promise that he believed; and he refers to Gen. 15:5. So shall thy seed be, as the stars of heaven, so innumerable, so illustrious. This was that he believed, when it was counted to him for righteousness, v. 6. And it is observable, that that particular instance of his faith was against hope, against the surmises and suggestions of his unbelief. He had just before been concluding hardly that he should go childless, that one born in his house was his heir, v. 2, 3. and that unbelief was a foil to his faith, and bespeaks it a believing against hope.

2. Being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body, now dead, v. 19. utterly unlikely to beget a child; he did not dwell in his thoughts upon it. He said, indeed, Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old? Gen. 17:17. But that was the language of his admiration, and his desire to be further satisfied, not of his doubting and distrust; his faith passed by that consideration, and thought of nothing but the faithfulness of the promise, with the contemplation whereof he was swallowed up, and this kept up his faith. Being not weak in faith, he considered not. It is mere weakness of faith, that makes a man lie poring on the difficulties and seeming impossibilities that [are] in the way of a [clear] promise.

3. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, v. 20. and therefore, because he considered not the frowns and discouragements of second causes;—he disputed not, did not hesitate or stumble at it, but, by a resolute and peremptory act of his soul, with a holy boldness, ventured all on the promise. Unbelief is at the bottom of all our staggerings at God's promises.

4. He was strong in faith, giving glory to God,—he was strengthened in faith, his faith got ground by exercise. Though weak faith shall not be rejected, yet strong faith shall be commended and honored. The strength of his faith appeared in the victory it won over his fears. And hereby he gave glory to God; for as unbelief dishonors God, by making Him a liar, 1 John 5:10. so faith honors God, by setting to its seal that He is true, John 3:33. Abraham's faith gave God the glory of his wisdom, power, holiness, goodness, and especially of his faithfulness, resting on the word that He had spoken. We never hear our Lord Jesus commending anything so much as great faith, Mat. 8:10. and 15:28. therefore God gives honor to faith, great faith, because faith, great faith, gives honor to God.

5. He was fully persuaded,—was carried on with the greatest confidence and assurance; it is a metaphor taken from ships that come into the harbor with full sail. Abraham saw the storms of doubts, and fears, and temptations, likely to rise against the promise; but trusts to the strength of his bottom, and the wisdom and faithfulness of his pilot, and bravely makes to the harbor, and comes home an unspeakable gainer. Such was his full persuasion, and it was built on the omnipotence of God: He was able, for our waverings rise mainly from our distrust.

And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness, v. 22. faith being chosen to be the prime condition of our justification, because it is a grace that of all others gives glory to God.

V. 23—25. In the close of the ch. he applies all to us; and having abundantly proved that Abraham was justified by faith, he here concludes that his justification was to be the pattern or sampler of ours.

It was not written for his sake alone. It was not intended only for an historical commendation of Abraham, or a relation of something peculiar to him: no, the Scripture did not intend hereby to describe some singular way of justification that belonged to Abraham as his prerogative. The accounts of the O. T. saints were not intended for histories only, barely to inform and divert us, but for precedents, to direct us, for ensamples, 1 Cor. 10:11. for our learning, ch. 15:4. and this particularly of Abraham was, to assure us what that righteousness is, which God requireth and accepteth to our salvation; for us also, that are mean and vile, us Gentiles as well as Jews, for us on whom the ends of the world are come, as well as for the patriarchs; for the grace of God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

His application of it is but short. Only, observe, 1. Our common privilege; it shall be imputed to us, that is, righteousness shall; the gospel-way of justification is by an imputed righteousness; he uses a future verb, to signify the continuation of this mercy in the church, while there are any to be justified; for there is a fountain opened that is inexhaustible. 2. Our common duty, the condition of this privilege, and that is believing. The proper object of this believing is a divine revelation: the revelation to Abraham was concerning a Christ to PRACT. OBS. No mere man, since the fall of Adam, could ever 'find' anything but death by his own works; and the history contained in the Scriptures, with the confessions of the best of men, proves that all who have been saved, escaped condemnation and obtained heaven by 'faith being imputed to them for righteousness.'—None can sincerely pray for this blessing, till he cease from working in order to justify himself: and indeed, no man performs good works from pure principles, till he learns to believe 'in Him who justifieth the ungodly.' Yet at the same time, no true believer will neglect 'working,' in order to glorify God, to do good to men, and to make his own calling and election sure; because he delights in the commandments of God, and 'hungers and thirsts after righteousness.'—This distinction [of believing and not believing] extends to all nations, sects, or forms of worship; some are justified, and some are not, in all countries, where the great truths of the Gospel are known: and this method of 'justifying the ungodly' is equally suited to preclude the most eminent saints from glorying, and the most atrocious sinners from despairing.—The seal of the Holy Spirit, in sanctification, is the inward evidence 'of the righteousness of faith: when the old nature is crucified, and the heart is circumcised to love God, it is evident that we are 'the children of Abraham,' and walk in his steps: and sacraments will in this case be really seals and pledges of the same blessing.—Blessed be God, that we are not left under the covenant of works! SCOTT.

to be genuine, meet to form the relation between him and the predicted Redeemer; and thus it marked him out as a proper person, to be justified by the everlasting righteousness which the Messiah would introduce. Gen. 17:17. Heb. 11:11, 12.—It is evident from the whole context, that Abraham's faith did not justify him, by its own merit or value, but as interesting him in Christ: for, though the sincerity of his faith was manifested on this occasion, he had actually been justified long before; and his example would not in any way aptly illustrate the Christian's justification by the righteousness of Christ, and not by that of his own faith, if we do not thus understand it.—A very common perversion of this passage must not pass unnoticed. Many speak of 'hoping against hope;' not that God will fulfil his promises to believers, notwithstanding all difficulties and improbabilities; but that themselves are believers, and shall be saved, contrary to the evidence of their tempers and lives: and this is often the grossest presumption and fanaticism imaginable, though sometimes in a measure countenanced by those who are not aware of its tendency.—(18) So shall, &c.] From the LXX, but it accords to the Heb. Gen. 15:5.

(22.) Imputed.] 'Counted.' St. : as also in v. 22. and 25. where he tr.; 'but also for our sake to whom it will be counted, to us who believe on Him who,' &c. Ed. 'The nature of the subject [here, and v. 4, &c.] which has been involved by dogmatists in far too much mystery, is thus popularly illustrated by Mackn.: "In judging Abraham, God will [192] place on the one side of the account his duties, on the other his performances. And on the side of his performances he will place his faith, and by mere favor will value it as equal to a complete performance of his duties, and reward him as if he were a righteous person. But neither here, nor in Gal. 3:6. is it said, that Christ's righteousness was counted to Abraham. In both passages the expression is, Abraham believed God, and it, viz. his believing God, was counted to him for righteousness. and v. 9. of this ch. We affirm faith was counted to Abraham for righteousness. Also Gen. 15:6. And he believed the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness. See Rom. 4:22, 23, 24. Farther, as it is nowhere said in Scripture, that Christ's righteousness was imputed to Abraham, so neither is it said anywhere, that Christ's righteousness is imputed to believers. In short, the uniform doctrine of Scripture is, that the believer's faith is counted to him for righteousness, by the mere grace or favor of God through Jesus Christ; i. e. on account of what Christ hath done to procure that favor for them. This is very different from the doctrine of those who hold, that by having faith imputed or counted for righteousness, the believer becomes perfectly righteous; whether they mean thereby that faith is itself a perfect righteousness, or that it is the instrument of conveying to the believer the perfect righteousness of another. With respect to the first, it is not true that faith is a perfect righteousness, for if it were, justification would not be a free gift, but a debt. And with respect to the

CHAP. V.

1 Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, 2 and joy in our hope, 3 that since we were reconciled by his blood, when we were enemies, 10 we shall much more be saved, being reconciled. 12 As sin and death came by Adam, 17 so much more righteousness and life by Jesus Christ. 20 Where sin abounded, grace did superabound.

THEREFORE <sup>a</sup>being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2 By whom <sup>b</sup>also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice <sup>c</sup>in hope of the glory of God.

3 And not only so, but we glory <sup>d</sup>in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience; come, the revelation to us is concerning a Christ already come, which difference in the revelation does not alter the case.

4 And patience, experience; and experience, hope;

Abraham believed the power of God, in raising up an Isaac from the dead womb of Sarah; we are to believe the same power exerted in a higher instance, in the resurrection of Christ from the dead. The resurrection of Isaac was in a figure, Heb. 11:19. that of Christ, real. Now we are to believe on Him that raised up Christ; not only believe his power, that He could do it, but depend on his grace in raising up Christ as our Surety; so he explains it, v. 25. where we have a brief account of the meaning of Christ's death and resurrection, which are the two main hinges on which the door of salvation turns. (1.) He was delivered for our offences. God the Father delivered Him, He delivered up Himself as a sacrifice for sin, not his own sin, but of the people; He died to make atonement for our sins, to expiate our guilt, to satisfy divine justice. (2.) He was raised again for our justification, for the perfecting and completing of our justification. Therefore, the apostle puts a special emphasis on Christ's resurrection, because it was the greatest assurance possible that divine justice was satisfied; it is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, ch. 8:34.

So that upon the whole it is very evident, we are not justified by the merit of our own works, but by a fiducial, obediential dependence on Jesus Christ, and his righteousness, as the condition on our part of our right to impunity and salvation; which was the truth Paul in this and the foregoing ch. had been fixing, as the great spring and foundation of all our comfort.

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. The apostle, having fully proved justification by faith, in this ch. proceeds in the explication, illustration, and application, of that truth. And the fruits of this tree of life are exceeding precious.

I. We have peace with God, v. 1. Sin breeds the quarrel between us and God, creates not only a strangeness, but an enmity; the holy, righteous God cannot in honor be at peace with a sinner, while he continues under the guilt of sin. Justification takes away the guilt, and so makes way for peace. There is more in this peace than barely a cessation of enmity, there is friendship and loving-kindness, for God is either the worst enemy or the best friend.

But this is through our Lord Jesus Christ; through Him as the great Peace-maker, the Mediator between God and man, that blessed Day's-man that has laid his hand on us both. Adam, in innocency, had peace with God immediately; there needed no such mediator; but to guilty, sinful man it is a very dreadful thing to think of God out of Christ; for He is our peace, Eph. 2:14. not only the Maker, but the matter and maintainer of our peace, Col. 1:20.

II. We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, v. 2. Observe,

1. The saints' happy state; it is a state of grace, God's loving kindness to us, and our conformity to God; he that hath God's love and God's likeness, is in a state of grace. We have access,—an introduction; which implies that we were not born in this state; we are by nature children of wrath, and the carnal mind is enmity against God; but we are brought into it. We have had access. He speaks of persons already brought out of a state of nature into a state of grace. By whom we have access by faith; by Christ, as the Author and principal agent; by faith, as the means of this access. Not by Christ, in consideration of any merit or desert of ours; but in consideration of our believing dependence on Him, and resignation of ourselves to Him.

2. Their happy standing in this state; wherein we stand. Not only wherein we are, but wherein we stand: a posture that denotes our discharge from guilt, Ps. 1:5. also our progress and perseverance; we stand firm and safe, upheld by the power of God; stand as soldiers stand, that keep their ground, not borne down by the power of the enemy, but pressing on. It denotes, not only our admission to, but our confirmation in, the favor of God. It is not in the court of heaven as in earthly courts, where high places are slippery places: but we stand in a humble confidence of this very thing, that He who has begun the good work, will perform it, Phil. 1:6.

III. We rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Beside the happiness in hand, there is a happiness in hope, the glory of God, which God will put on the saints in heaven; glory which will consist in the vision, [obedience,] and fruition of God. 1. Those, and those only, that have access by faith into the grace of God now, may hope for the glory of God hereafter. There is no good hope of glory but what is founded in grace; grace is glory begun, the earnest and assurance of glory. He will give grace and glory, Ps. 84:11. 2. Those who hope for the glory of God hereafter, have enough to rejoice in now. It is the duty of those that hope for heaven to rejoice in those hopes.

IV. We glory in tribulations also; not only notwithstanding our tribulations, (those do not hinder our rejoicing in hope of the glory of God,) but even in our tribulations, as those are working for us the weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4:17.

Observe, What a growing, increasing happiness, the happiness of the saints is; not only so:—one would think, such peace, such grace, such glory, and such a joy in hope of it, were more than such poor, undeserving creatures as we are could pretend to; and yet it is not only so, there are more instances of our happiness; we glory in tribulations also; especially tribulation for righteousness' sake; which seemed the greatest objection against the saints' happiness; whereas really their happiness did not only consist with, but take rise from, those tribulations. Acts 5:41. This being the hardest point, he sets himself to show the grounds and reasons of it. For tribulations, by a chain of causes, greatly befriend hope; which he shows in the method of its influence.

1. Tribulation worketh patience, not in and of itself, but the powerful grace of God working in and with the tribulation. It is not the efficient cause, but yields the occasion, as steel is hardened by the fire. That which worketh patience, is matter of joy; for patience does us more good than tribulations can do us hurt. Tribulation in itself worketh impatience; but, as it is sanctified to the saints, it worketh patience.

2. Patience, experience, v. 4. It works an second supposition, although the perfect righteousness of another were conveyed to a sinner by faith, it would not make him perfectly righteous, because it is beyond the power of Omnipotence itself, by any means whatever, to make a person not to have sinned, who actually hath sinned. And yet, unless this is done, no believer can be perfectly righteous. On account of the perfect righteousness of another, God indeed may treat one as if he were perfectly righteous. But that is all. Nor does the Scripture carry the matter farther."

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. The expressions here used may also allude to the free access of sinners, from different nations, into the full enjoyment of the privileges of God's people, without any respect to the legal ceremonies and restrictions, in approaching his mercy-seat. (2.) Access.] 'Often applied [by the classics] specially to access, or the power of access (i. e. introduction) to great personages, nay, sometimes, gods.'

V. 3—5. The hope of the tried and experienced believer is not only warranted by the Word of God, but 'sealed' upon his heart by the gift of the Holy Spirit; through whose sacred influences the excellency and loving-kindness of God, especially in the work of redemption, are so discovered to him, and poured out through all the faculties of his soul, as to produce a similarity of disposition, a reciprocal love of the divine perfections, a longing desire of the favor of God, a delight in communing with Him and serving Him, a lively gratitude for his benefits, and zeal for his glory: these, being both full proofs of regeneration, the inward 'sent of the righteousness of faith,' and earnest of heavenly felicity, ensure the Christian's hope from the shame of disappointment. Is. 45:15—17. 1 Pet. 4:12—16. Many, both writers and preachers, interpret this clause, 'the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts,' almost exclusively of the perception and sense of the love of God to us, which is vouchsafed by the Holy Spirit. Yet our love to God, as 'the fruit of the Spirit,' writing his law in our hearts, is in fact the only indisputable proof that our hope will never make us ashamed. The seal and consolations of the Spirit are distinguished from all enthusiastical delusions, and false affections, by their permanently sanctifying effects: 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Eph. 1:13, 14. 4:30—32. no supposed sense of God's love to us, except as attended with the consciousness of loving Him, can warrant a scriptural assurance; and the Spirit of adoption is doubtless a Spirit of love to God, as well as confidence in Him. 8:14—17, 28—31. 1 John 4:19. It must, therefore, be evident, that the work of the Holy Spirit, in changing our natural enmity against God into supreme love of Him, must be intended, either as the primary meaning of the clause, or as the inseparable effect of a genuine sense and perception of the love of God to us.—It cannot be supposed, that the apostle mentioned this triumphant confidence as the habitual attainment of all justified persons: but rather as an invaluable privilege, consequent on justification; which must be sought with diligence and earnestness, and actually enjoyed nearly in proportion as it is thus sought. The sufferings of believers, especially from persecution, form a grand objection to what is spoken in Scripture concerning their happiness, in the opinion of men in general. To select, therefore, these very trials, as a special ground of the Christian's glorying and rejoicing, was peculiarly suited to meet that objection, and to produce a great effect on the reader's mind and heart.

(3.) Glory in tribulations.] 'Rejoice in our afflictions.' St. 'The Christians gloried not in any external privileges, but in the hope of happiness to come, and in those adverse events which tended to confirm and purify their principles, and so to make them fitter for that happiness. The apostle dwells on this subject, because the Jews thought adversity a mark of God's displeasure, and that it ill suited the kingdom of Messiah.' Doddr. and Mackn.

(4.) Experience.] 'Approbation.' St. 'Proof, as we sometimes use the word.' Bl. Hope.] 'For he who knows he is suffering evils, however severe, in the cause of God, feels himself more and more cheered with hope, as well from the goodness of God, (with which it would be inconsistent not to reward such pious endurance,) as also from the promise of Christ. Mat. 5:8. Johu 16:20.'

6 For when we were yet without strength, <sup>g</sup> in due <sup>h</sup> time Christ died for the ungodly.

7 For scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.

8 But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while <sup>i</sup> we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

9 Much more then, being now justified by his <sup>j</sup> blood, we shall be saved <sup>k</sup> from wrath through him.

experience of God; patient sufferers have the greatest experience of the divine consolations, which abound as afflictions abound. It works an experience of ourselves, an experiment of our own sincerity, therefore such tribulations are called trials. It works an approbation, as he is approved, that has passed the test. Thus Job's tribulation wrought patience, and that patience produced an approbation, that still he holds fast his integrity, Job 2:3.

3. Experience, hope. He who, being thus tried, comes forth as gold, will thereby be encouraged to hope. This experiment, or approbation, is not so much the ground, as the evidence, of our hope, and a special friend to it. Experience of God is a prop to our hope; He that hath delivered, doth and will. Experience of ourselves, helps to evidence our sincerity.

4. This hope maketh not ashamed, it is a hope that will not deceive us. Nothing confounds more than disappointment. Or, It maketh not ashamed of our sufferings, we having hopes of glory. It is in a good cause, for a good Master, and in good hope: therefore we are not ashamed. We will never think ourselves disparaged, by sufferings that are likely to end so well.

V. 6. It might perhaps be objected to the words, 'hope maketh not ashamed,' that, after all, it was not impossible, nor even highly improbable, the believer's hope should terminate in disappointment and shame, through the prevalence of sinful [abused] propensities, and the power of temptation; and that Satan might, at length, induce him to apostatize. The apostle therefore digresses in order to obviate this objection: and at the same time shows, what abundant reason believers have to love their God and Savior; and to adore with admiring complacency the glory of his grace. 'Without strength' to resist their offended Sovereign, or to deliver themselves; had neither natural power for so arduous a work, if they had been inclined to it; nor moral ability or inclination to attempt it: 'ungodly,' without any proper disposition of heart towards Him, nay, every way contrary to his nature, will, and worship.

(6.) For.] Huper: Raphael has abundantly demonstrated, that huper hēmōn apethane [died for us] signifies, that He died in our room and stead: nor does it appear, that the phrase to die for (huper) any one has any other signification than that of a person rescuing the life of another at the expense of his own; and the very next-v. shows, independent of any other authority, how evidently it bears that sense here; for it can hardly be imagined that any one would die for a good man, unless it were to redeem his life by giving up his own.' Doddr. Whitby, too, proves, that the whole passage plainly denotes the vicarious sacrifice of Christ. Comp. John 11:50. 2 Cor. 5:14. 1 Tim. 2:6. BL.

V. 7—10. To illustrate the immensity of this love of God, the apostle shows . . . how this most rare instance, the very summit of human affection, falls immensely beneath the love of God to us.—There could be no danger of a reconciled believer falling under the wrath of God, except on the supposition of his committing sin, and dying without repentance; but had Christ suffered, and humbled Himself even to death on the cross, that He might bring him into this state of reconciliation? and would He, after all, so leave him to himself, and in the hands of the wicked one, as thus finally to perish, when his living power could prevent it, without any suffering or self-denial whatever?—Some expositors insert, 'If we be not wanting to ourselves.' But first, Is not this undeniably add-

Because the love of God is shed abroad. This hope will not disappoint us, because it is sealed with the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of love. It is the gracious work of the blessed Spirit, to shed abroad the love of God in the hearts of all the saints. The love of God, i. e. the sense of God's love to us, drawing out love in us to Him again. Or, the great effects of his love, special grace, and the pleasant gust or sense of it. It is shed abroad, as sweet ointment, perfuming the soul; as rain watering it, and making it fruitful: the ground of all our comfort and holiness, and perseverance in both, is laid in the shedding abroad of the love of God in our hearts; it is that which constrains us, 2 Cor. 5:14. Thus are we drawn and held by the bonds of love. Sense of God's love to us, will make us not ashamed, either of our hope in Him, or our sufferings for Him.

V. 6—21. The apostle here describes the fountain and foundation of justification, laid in the death of the Lord Jesus: it is in the precious stream of Christ's blood, that all these privileges come flowing to us: therefore he enlarges on the instance of that love of God, which is shed abroad.

Three things he notices for the explication and illustration of this doctrine.

1. The persons He died for, v. 6—8.
2. The precious fruits of his death, v. 9—11.

3. The parallel between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam, and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, v. 12. to the end.

I. The character we were under when Christ died for us: 1. We were without strength, v. 6. altogether unable to help ourselves out of our sad condition; lost, and no visible way open for our recovery; our condition deplorable, and in a manner desperate; therefore our salvation is here said to come in due time. 2. He died for the ungodly: not only helpless, and therefore likely to perish, but guilty, and therefore deserving to perish; not only mean and worthless, but vile and obnoxious; unworthy of such favor with the holy God. Being ungodly, they had need of one to die for them, to satisfy for guilt, and to bring in a righteousness. This he illustrates, v. 7, 8. as an unparalleled instance of love; herein God's thoughts and ways were above ours. Comp. Jn. 15:13, 14. Greater love has no man. The carnal mind is not only an enemy to God, but enmity itself, ch. 8:7. Col. 1:21. This enmity is a mutual enmity; God loathing the sinner, and the sinner loathing God, Zech. 11:8. And that for such as these Christ should die, is such a mystery, such a paradox, such an unprecedented instance of love, that it may well be our business, to eternity, to adore and wonder at it! This is a commendation of love indeed! Justly might He who had thus loved us, make it one of the laws of his kingdom, that we should love our enemies.

II. The precious fruits of his death:

1. Justification and reconciliation are the first and primary, v. 9, 10. Sin is pardoned, the sinner accepted as righteous, the quarrel [made] up, the enmity slain, an end made of iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in: i. e. Christ has done all that was requisite on his part in order hereunto, and immediately on our believing, we are actually put into a state of justification and reconciliation. Our justification is ascribed to the blood of Christ, because without blood there is no remission, Heb. 9:22. The blood is the life, and that must go to make atonement. In all the propitiatory sacrifices, the sprinkling of the blood was of the essence of the sacrifice. It was the blood that made an atonement for the soul, Lev. 17:11.

2. Hence results salvation from wrath, v. 9, 10. When that which hinders our salvation is taken away, the salvation must needs follow. Nay, the argument holds very strongly; if God justified and reconciled us when we were enemies, at so great expense, as it were, much more will He save us when we are justified and reconciled. He that has done the greater, which is, of enemies to make us friends, will certainly do the less, which is, when we are friends to use us friendly, and to be kind to us. Therefore the apostle, once and again, speaks of it with a much more. The final justification and absolution of believers at the great day, together with the fitting and preparing of them for it, are the salvation from wrath here spoken of; it is the perfecting of the work of grace.

Reconciled by his death, saved by his life. His life, here spoken of, is not to be understood of his life in the flesh, but his life in heaven, that life which ensued after his death. Comp. ch. 14:9. Rev. 1:18. We are reconciled by Christ humbled, we are saved by Christ exalted: it is the living Jesus that perfects the work, He lives to make intercession, Heb. 7:25. It is Christ in his exaltation, that by his Word and Spirit effectually calls and changes, and reconciles us to God, is our Advocate with the Father, and so completes and consummates our salvation. Comp. ch. 4:25. 8:34. The arguing is very strong: He that puts Himself to the charge of purchasing our salvation, will not decline the trouble of applying it.

ing to the Scripture? Rev. 22:18—21, vv. 18, 19. And, secondly, does not this inevitably lead us to trust in our own hearts, instead of trusting in God, to 'hold us up that we may be safe?' Prov. 28:26. Jer. 17:9, 10. 2 Cor. 7:1. Phil. 2:12, 13. 2 Pet. 1:5—10. SCOTT.

(7.) Righteous . . . good.] Dikaios . . . agathos: some take both of things not persons, but this would require the article to dikaion also; and, moreover, the force of the antithesis would be destroyed. Others, as Godwin, Estius, De Dieu, Wetst., Ham., Whit., Kop., Carp., and Doddr., suppose here a distinction sometimes found in the classics, especially the philosophers, by which dikaios denotes one strictly just, agathos one who is generous, benevolent, christos: nay (so Vatablus and Kop.) a benefactor. Wetst., too, adverts to the well-known distinction of Cic., between justus and bonus. And this interpretation is ably maintained by Carpz. But such a refined, philosophical distinction was not likely to have been known to the apostle. Schoett., indeed, adduces an curious passage from Pirke Aboth, which, however, does not seem quite satisfactory, viz. "There are 4 kinds of men. One says: what is mine, is mine; and what is thine, is thine; he is a middling sort of man. Another says: what is mine, is thine, and what is thine is mine; he is a worldly-minded man. Now he who says: what is mine, is thine; and what is thine, is thine; he is a good and pious man (chasid). But he who says, what is thine is mine, and what is mine is my own, is a wicked man." Considering that the whole v. is meant to be a popular illustration, it seems safer, with Chrys., Eecm., Casaub., Pisc., Socinus, Paræus, Gat., Polet., Calv., and Beza, to take both to mean the same, yet as the latter has the article, a higher degree of goodness seems meant, by climax. The good man, has more force than, a good man.' BL.

T. the phrase thus occurs, as in 2 Cor. 5:18, 19, 21. This v. 10. is (and so Bp. Barlington) parenthetical.' ID.

11 And not only so, but we also joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement.

12 Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned:

13 (For until the law, sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law.)

14 Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come:

3. All this produces, as a further privilege, our joy in God, v. 11. God is now far from being a terror: He is our joy, and our hope in the day of evil, Jer. 17:17. We are reconciled and saved from wrath. Iniquity, blessed be God, shall not be our ruin. And not only so, there is more in it yet, a constant stream of favors; we not only go to heaven, but go triumphantly; are not only saved from God's wrath, but solace ourselves in his love, and this through Jesus Christ, by virtue of the atonement; for by Him we Christians, we believers, have now, now in gospel-times, or now in this life, received the atonement, which was typified by the sacrifices under the law, and is an earnest of our happiness in heaven. Receiving, the atonement is our actual reconciliation to God in justification, grounded on Christ's satisfaction. To receive the atonement, is, (1.) To give our consent to the atonement, approving of, and agreeing to, those methods which infinite wisdom hath taken, of saving a guilty world by the blood of a crucified Jesus; being willing and glad to be saved in a gospel-way, and on gospel-terms. (2.) To take the comfort of the atonement, which is the fountain and foundation of our joy in God. God hath received the atonement, Mat. 3:17. 17:5. 28:2. if we but receive it, the work is done.

III. The parallel the apostle runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam, and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, v. 12. to the end, not only illustrates the truth he is discoursing of, but tends very much to commend the love of God, and comfort the hearts of true believers; in showing a correspondence between our fall and our recovery; and not only a like, but a much greater, power in the second Adam to make us happy, than there was in the first to make us miserable.

Now for the opening of this, observe,

1. A general truth laid down as the foundation of his discourse,—That Adam was a type of Christ, v. 14. Christ is therefore called the last Adam, 1 Cor. 15:45. Comp. v. 22. In this, Adam was a type of Christ, that in the covenant-transactions between God and him, and in the consequent events of those transactions, Adam was a public person; as a common father and factor, root and representative, of and for all his posterity; so that what he did in that station, as agent for us, we may be said to have done in him; and what was done to him, may be said to have been done to us in him. Thus Jesus Christ, the Mediator, acted as a public person, the head of all the elect; dealt with God for them, as their father, factor, root, and representative; died for them, rose for them, entered within the veil for them, did all for them. When Adam failed, we failed with him; when Christ performed, He performed for us. Thus was Adam—the figure of Him that was to come, to come to repair that breach which Adam had made.

2. A more particular explication of the parallel.

(1.) Adam, as a public person, communicated sin and death to all his posterity, v. 12. We see the world under a deluge of sin and death, full of iniquities, and full of calamities. Now, it is worth while to inquire what is the spring that feeds it, and you will find that to be the general corruption of nature; and at what gap it entered, and you will find that to have been Adam's first sin. It was by one man, and he the first man; for if any had been before him, they would have been free; that one man from whom, as from the root, we all spring.

[1.] By him sin entered. When God pronounced all very good, Gen. 1:31. there was no sin in the world; it was when Adam ate forbidden fruit, that sin made its entry. Sin had before entered into the world of angels, but never the world of mankind, till Adam sinned; then entered the guilt of Adam's sin, imputed to [and affecting] posterity, and a general corruption and depravedness of nature. For that, so we read it; rather in whom all have sinned. Sin entered into the world by Adam, for in him we all sinned. As 1 Cor. 15:22. in Adam all die; so here, in him all have sinned: for it is agreeable to the law of all nations, that the acts of a public person are accounted theirs whom they represent; and what a whole body does, every member of the same body may be said to do. Now Adam acted thus as a public person, by the sovereign ordination and appointment of God, and yet that founded on a natural necessity; for God, as the Author of nature, had made this the law of nature,

V. 11. Had now 'received reconciliation.' This is the proper tr., referring to the whole of the pacification, between God and the believing sinner, through the mediation of Christ; and not merely to the atonement, which is the ground of it.—To explain all this of the Gentiles exclusively, as some do, as if the Jews did not want a reconciliation, makes the apostle speak of himself as a Gentile: and indeed it is so unscriptural, and so irrational, that one cannot but be astonished to find men of great learning and talents contend for it.

(11.) Atonement.] I. e. putting, setting at one: at-one-ment; 'obtained reconciliation.' St. 'If the Scripture has, as surely it has, left this matter of the satisfaction of Christ mysterious, left somewhat in it unrevealed, all conjectures about it must be, if not evidently absurd, yet, at least, uncertain. Nor has any one reason to complain for want of farther information, unless he can show his claims to it. . . And it is our wisdom thankfully to accept the benefit, by performing the conditions upon which it is offered, on our part, without disputing how it was procured on his.'

Bp. BUTLER.

V. 12—14. In order more fully to illustrate the important subject, the apostle calls the reader's attention to the state of the whole human race, from the fall of Adam. He was the federal head, surety, and representative of all his posterity; nor did sin enter, save to the personal condemnation of Eve, till he also ate the forbidden fruit. Gen. 3:6. . . In Adam, as being in his loins when he thus apostatized, we all sinned and fell under condemnation; his blood was attained for rebellion; and thence that evil nature originated, from which all our personal transgressions proceed. Gen. 2:16, 17. 3:17—19. In proof of this our union with Adam, and our concern in his first transgression, which the proud heart of man is prone to deny, or object to, even with blasphemous enmity, it should be observed, that for 2500 years before the giving of the law, sin prevailed in the world, and was punished with death: but sin cannot be imputed, where no law is, of which it is a transgression, 4:14—17. None of the immense multitudes, who died between the fall of Adam, and the promulgation of the law, could personally violate the prohibition, to which the penalty of death had been originally annexed; yet they were included in the sentence denounced against Adam, and, after much toil and suffering, 'returned to the dust whence they were taken.' And, though adults might be thought to die for their personal violation of the law of tradition, or of their own reason and conscience; yet, during this long interval, an innumerable multitude had been subjected to death, who had never broken any law, 'after the similitude of Adam's transgression;' i. e., wilfully and deliberately. For the number of infants, who had been cut off, with great pain and agony, previously to their commission of actual sin, had been immensely great. They were involved in the destruction of the whole world by the deluge, and in that of Sodom and Gomorrah; and according to the ordinary course of things, 'death reigned over them,' before they were capable of actual and wilful transgression. Nor could this fact be accounted for, consistently with the divine perfections; otherwise than by allowing, that they, as one with Adam, had fallen in him under condemnation, through his violation of that covenant, in which he acted as surety for all his offspring.* There may indeed be a comfortable hope; that as infants die in Adam, without their own personal transgressions, so they will be saved in Christ, without their own personal faith in Him, as never living to be capable of it: yet that change must be wrought in them by the regenerating Spirit, which would have produced faith, had they lived longer. Indeed, the sufferings and death of infants, in every age, forms an irrefragable proof of 'original sin:' but it was more peculiarly so, from Adam to Moses; as that law was not then in being, which in some instances, entailed the guilt of the parents on their children, to the third and fourth generation. Ex. 20:5. Yet these laws were deduced from the same principle of the oneness between the root and the branches; though only applied in some special cases, while that of Adam reached in general to all his posterity. For he was 'a figure,' or type, 'of Him, who was to come,' as the Surety of a new covenant, in behalf of all related to Him. 1 Cor. 15:45—49. In many respects Adam might be considered as the contrast of Christ; but he resembled Him, and was his type, in the divine prescience, by acting as the surety of all related and united to him: for thus Christ acted as the Surety of all his people, who are one with Him, and deemed his spiritual progeny; Ps. 22:30, 31. Is. 53:11, 12. and they are interested in his obedience, sufferings, victories, and exaltation.—Adam is compared with Christ, both in what is similar, and what is contrary. They are alike in this; that each of them shares what he has with his: they are clearly unlike in this, that Adam by nature communicates sin unto death to his posterity; but Christ by grace communicates his righteousness to his people, unto life. Beza.—Many learned men explain what is said of 'death,' as meaning only mortality: but, do we not all derive a depraved, as well as a mortal nature from Adam? And does not Christ save his people from guilt and depravity, and eternal punishment, and not from mortality? And would immortality, without justification and sanctification, be a blessing? John 5:28, 29. 2 Tim. 1:10. If we are depraved, or 'dead in sin,' and mortal, as Adam's descendants; we must not only die, but be miserable and unholy for ever, without the salvation of Christ, 6:21—23. Gen. 2:16, 17.—(14) Death reigned.] 'Sin reigned unto death,' 20, 21, v. 21. What a grand, sublime, tremendous idea! Sin and death personified, as two united conquerors and tyrants reigning over all mankind; and, without mercy, consigning, by various tortures, their bodies to the grave, and their souls to hell! (12) Sin . . . death.] The article seems definitely to point out 'the sin,' and 'the death,' which by Adam's transgression entered into the world.—For that.] 'In whom.' BLOOMF.

* On this subject, which Henry above has treated at large, (note, * p. 637, Vol. II.) was necessitated to use a language his auditors could best understand: covenant and surety are terms applicable here only by comparison, and arguments are not to be too closely drawn from similes, which are used from defect of language. Ed.

V. 12—19. St. considers this one of the most difficult passages in the New Test.; and concludes from it, (see his Exc. V.), that 'the fall of Adam brought our race into a new state of probation, one exceedingly different, in several respects, from that in which he himself first was. The whole race are now heirs by nature of a frail and dying state; they are no longer in that state and condition in which they are inclined to holiness. And this comes on all, without any concurrence of their own. But all this, too, may still be regarded in another light than that of simple punishment. It is trial; it is discipline; it is probation, sui generis. Adam has brought us into this state I freely concede. But Christ has more than made good all its apparent or real disadvantages: grace su-

15 But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one man be dead; much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

16 And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation; but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.

17 For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ:)

18 Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.

19 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

that man should beget in his own likeness, and so the other creatures. In Adam, therefore, as in a common receptacle, the whole nature of man was repositied, from him to flow down in a channel to his posterity; for all mankind is made of one blood, Acts 17: 26. so that according as this nature proves, through his standing or falling, before he puts it out of his hands, accordingly it is propagated from him.* Adam therefore sinning and falling, the nature became guilty and corrupted, and is so derived. Thus in him all have sinned.

* Especially if we believe that the intellectual faculties, animal propensities, and moral sentiments in man have material organs through which they manifest themselves; and that these may, like a muscle or nerve, be weakened or strengthened by habitual disuse or use, and so descend to posterity: principles at the foundation of all education. perabounds. If evils come on our race because of Adam's sin, more, far more, than an equivalent is rendered for them, by the grace of the Gospel.—'The theory [of Edwards and the Reformers] I am opposing, makes all our race heirs also of the endless miseries of a future world, antecedent to any voluntary exercise of their own, and merely on the ground of Adam's offence. If this were true, then it would follow that 12—19. establishes a redemption from future misery as wide as the mischief of Adam's sin has spread; and this without any act on the part of the sinner. But such a redemption would contradict the first principles of the N. T.—'Others, understand these vs. to assert, that Adam's example led us to sin, and is the cause of sin; but some of his posterity, who sin, know nothing of his example, and, if example is the original cause of sin, whose example did Adam follow? And then, to make out the antithesis, we must understand that Christ's example is the cause of obedience and life to all men: a doctrine taught by some, but clearly not by Paul, nor any of his colleagues.—'Paul, then, neither asserts that Adam's sin is propagated; nor that it is imputed to us without any act of our own; nor that it is ours merely by the force of example. Nor does he say, that hereditary depravity is the ground and cause of all sin, (how could he say this when Adam sinned without it?) nor that we are condemned without being actual sinners. All this has been often said for him and in his name; but he does not once say this for himself. Why now should we attribute to him our own theories, and then insist on their being a part of Scripture?'—St., in whose Comm. see these theories detailed and examined. Also, Hodge on the Ep. Ed.

Yea, not as (the condemnation) by one who sinned, is the free gift; for sentence was by one (offence) unto condemnation, but the free gift is unto justification from many offences. For if by the offence of one, death reigned on account of one (offence), much more shall they who receive abundance of grace and of the gift

[2.] Death by sin; for death is the wages of sin. Sin, when it is finished, brings forth death. [Perhaps by perfect obedience, man would have passed to heaven without death, by the law of his original nature: for] when sin came, of course death came along with it. Death is here put for all that misery, which is the due desert of sin, temporal, spiritual, eternal death. If Adam had not sinned, he had not died: the threatening was, In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die, Gen. 2: 17. So death passed, a sentence of death, as on a criminal,—passed through all men, as an infectious disease passes through a town, so that none escape it; death passes on all without exception. Common calamities, incident to human life, do abundantly prove this. Death reigned, v. 14. He speaks of death as a mighty prince, and his monarchy the most absolute, universal, and lasting. None are exempted from its sceptre; it is a monarchy that will survive all other earthly rule, authority, and power, for it is the last enemy, 1 Cor. 15: 26. Now all this we may thank Adam for; from him sin and death descend. Well may we say, as that good man, observing the change a fit of sickness had made in his countenance, O Adam! what hast thou done?

Further, to clear this, he shows, that sin did not commence with the law of Moses, but was in the world until, or before, that law; therefore that law of Moses is not the only rule of life; for there was a rule, and that rule transgressed, before the law was given. It likewise intimates, that we cannot be justified by our obedience to the law of Moses, any more than we were condemned by and for our disobedience to it. Sin was in the world, before the law; witness Cain's murder, the apostasy of the old world, the wickedness of Sodom. 1st. His inference from hence, is, Therefore there was a law; for sin is not imputed where there is no law. Original sin is a want of conformity to, and actual sin is a transgression of, the law of God: therefore all were under some law. 2dly. His proof of it, is, Death reigned from Adam to Moses, v. 14. It is certain death could not have reigned, if sin had not set up the throne for him. This proves, that sin was in the world before the law, and original sin, for death reigned over those that had not sinned any actual sin, after the simi-litude of Adam's transgression, in their own persons, as Adam did; which is to be understood of infants, that were never guilty of actual sin, and yet died, because Adam's sin was imputed to them.

This reign of death, seems especially to refer to those violent and extraordinary judgments which were long before Moses, as the deluge, and the destruction of Sodom, which involved infants. It is a great proof of original sin, that little children, who were never guilty of any actual transgression, are yet liable to very terrible diseases, casualties, and deaths; which could by no means be reconciled with the justice and righteousness of God, if they were not chargeable with guilt.*

(2.) How, in correspondence to this, Christ, as a public person, communicates righteousness and life to all true believers that are his spiritual seed. And, in this, he shows not only wherein the resemblance holds, but ex abundantia, wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ, goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam.

[1.] Wherein the resemblance holds; that is laid down most fully, v. 18, 19. 1st. By the offence and disobedience of one, many were made sinners, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Where observe,

Adam's sin was, disobedience, disobedience to a plain, express command, and a command of trial. The thing he did was therefore evil, because forbidden, and not otherwise; but that opened the door to other sins, though itself seemingly small. The malignity and poison of sin are very strong and spreading, else the guilt of Adam's sin would not have reached so far, nor have been so deep and long a stream. By Adam's sin many are made sinners: many, i. e. all his posterity; said to be many, in opposition to the one that offended. Made sinners; it denotes the making of us such, by a judicial act: we were cast as sinners by due course of law. Judgment is come to

* Are then beasts guilty, for they suffer! Existence is a boon which infinitely outpays suffering. What claim has a creature to a single joy? It is enough for us, that God willed that evil should exist; and the very faculties which pretend to judge of his 'righteousness' and 'justice' in the abstract, are the effects of that will: exist but as God wills! When will the creature cease to pretend to be as the Creator? When will the finite acknowledge that it cannot comprehend the infinite? Ed.

of justification reign in life by one (Jesus Christ); therefore, as by one offence (sentence came) upon all men unto condemnation, so by the righteousness of one (sentence came) upon all men unto justification of life; for as by the disobedience of one man the many were constituted sinners, so by the obedience of one, the many will be constituted righteous. The law, moreover, was introduced, so that offence would abound; but where sin abounded, grace superabounded: so that, as sin reigned by death, in like manner grace also will reign by justification unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. (19.) As in Adam all die, so in Christ all can be saved if they will. Sec St. 'All, quantum in Christo.' Bloomf. We must not be too much afraid of the bugbear, materialism, to deny (what the observation of 'God's facts' teaches), that the soul or spirit in this present condition of our being manifests itself through a material organization, a plurality of cerebral organs. Note, end ch. 7. As these are affected by God's laws of hereditary descent, we do not expect (grapes of thorns or figs of thistles) a child to be born with the germs of an organization favorable to perfect virtue from parents, the organizations of both of whom (as well as their ancestors) are known to be, perhaps, extremely unfavorable to mental or spiritual excellence. (Perfection of organization and obedience, is, at this time of the world, out of the question.) Had Adam continued perfect, his children would doubtless have been in a condition for perfect obedience: but as he did not, his race have become more and more imperfectly organized, more and more unfit for communion with God, angels, and spirits, and identification of will with God, all which Adam enjoyed before his fall. Now, reasoning from analogy, as Paul here does, is there anything more or less 'mysterious' or 'incomprehensible' in the fact that our reception to God's favor, (notes, v. 11. and 3:25, 26.) should depend on another, even Christ, than that we should, by the accident of birth, be more or less liable to, and were in a manner necessitated (at least most strongly tempted), to sin, in consequence of the organization, era, place, education, and condition of our ancestors, and of Adam? Some, also, even ridicule the idea of vicarious suffering at all; but look at the analogy of the same Creator's universe; do such never, by the 'social law,' get evil from another's act and state, or good through another's suffering and obedience? the mother who bore, the father who toiled for them; the sister, or wife, or daughter, who wearily watched their sick bed? Why then arraign, or expect to fathom God's atonement laws, any more than his 'social law,' or 'law of hereditary descent?' Be content that all are his will, and conform to them without expecting to comprehend the infinite. Ed.

condemnation on all those that by Adam's disobedience were made sinners. All the race of mankind, lie under a sentence, like an attainder on a family. There is judgment given and recorded against us in the court of heaven; and if the judgment be not reversed, we are likely to sink under it to eternity. 2dly. In like manner, by the righteousness and obedience of one, (and that one is Jesus Christ, the second Adam,) are many made righteous, and so the free gift comes upon all. It is observable, how the apostle inculcates this truth, and repeats it again and again, as a truth of very great consequence. Here observe, The nature of Christ's righteousness, how it is brought in; it is by his obedience. The disobedience of the first Adam ruined us, the obedience of the second Adam, saves us: his obedience to the law of mediation, which was, that He should fulfil all righteousness, [observe every law of God,] and then make his soul an offering for sin. The fruit of it. There is a free gift upon all men, it is made and offered promiscuously to all. The salvation is common, the proposals general, the tender free; whoever will, may come, and take of these waters of life. This free gift is to all believers, on their believing, unto justification of life. It is not only a justification that frees from death, but that entitles to life. Many shall be made righteous; many, compared with one, or as many as belong to the election of grace. They shall be constituted righteous, as by letters patent: the antithesis between these two, our ruin by Adam and our recovery by Christ, is obvious.

[2.] Wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ, goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam; and this he shows v. 15-17. It is designed to magnify the riches of Christ's love, and to comfort and encourage believers, who, considering what a wound Adam's sin has made, might begin to despair of a proportionable remedy. His expressions are a little intricate, but this he seems to intend.

1st. If guilt and wrath be communicated, much more shall grace and love: for it is agreeable to the idea we have of the divine goodness, to suppose that God should be more ready to save on an imputed righteousness, than to condemn on an imputed guilt: Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace. God's goodness is, of all his attributes, in a special manner his glory, and it is that grace that is the root, his favor to us in Christ, and the gift is by grace. We know that God is rather inclined to show mercy; punishing is his strange work.

2dly. If there were so much power and efficacy, as it seems there were, in the sin of a man, who was of the earth, earthy, to condemn us; much more are there power and efficacy in the righteousness and grace of Christ, who is the Lord from heaven, to justify and save us. The one man that saves us, is Jesus Christ. Surely Adam could not propagate so strong a poison, but Jesus Christ could propagate as strong an antidote, and much stronger.

3dly. It is but the guilt of one single offence of Adam's that is laid to our charge; the judgment was by one, i. e. by one offence, v. 16, 17. Margin. But from Jesus Christ we receive and derive an abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness. The stream of grace and righteousness, is deeper and broader than the stream of guilt; for this righteousness doth not only take away the guilt of that one offence, but of many other offences, even of all. God, in Christ, forgives all trespasses, Col. 2. 13.

4thly. By Adam's sin death reigned; but by Christ's righteousness, there is not only a period put to the reign of death, but believers are preferred to reign in life, v. 17. See this observed, Rev. 1:5, 6. 5:9, 10. We are, by Christ and his righteousness, entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges, than we lost by the offence of Adam.

Lastly, In the last two vs. he seems to anticipate an objection, expressed Gal. 3: 19. Wherefore then serveth the law? Answer,

1. The law entered, that the offence might abound. Not to make sin to abound the more in itself, otherwise than as sin takes occasion by the commandment; but to discover the abounding sinfulness of it, as the letting in of a clearer light into a room discovers the dust and filth which were there before, but were not seen. The offence, that offence, the sin of Adam, the extending of the guilt of it to us, and the effect of the corruption in us, are the abounding of that offence which appeared on the entry of the law.

2. That grace might much more abound; that the terrors of the law might make gospel-comforts so much the sweeter. Sin abounded among the Jews; and to those of them that were converted to the faith of Christ, did not grace much more abound, in the remitting of so much guilt and the subduing of so much corruption? This abounding of grace he illustrates, v. 21. just as the reign of a tyrant and oppressor is a foil, to set off the succeeding reign of a just and gentle prince.

PRACT. OBS. A most blessed change takes place in the sinner's state, however guilty and depraved he has been, when he becomes a true believer. He has free access to the mercy-seat; he is established in the grace and favor of God; and he may now rejoice and triumphantly exult in the hope of everlasting glory; though he perhaps just before trembled, from well-grounded apprehensions of deserved vengeance. How immense then are our obligations to Him, who has made 'all things ready' by his agonizing death on the cross; and has made our hearts willing by his regenerating grace! Surely He is worthy of all this devotedness from every one of us! And it is inconceivable, that even God Himself could more have 'commended his love to us,' or have given us more powerful motives and encouragements to humble submission and grateful obedience. At the same time, we shall learn not to disdain or despair of any other sinners; for we shall be conscious, that they are not worse in themselves, or further from God, than we once were; and that they are equally capable of being reconciled in the same way, whatever their character and crimes may heretofore have been.—Let us from this portion of the sacred Scriptures learn habitually to look on ourselves, and the whole human race, as lying in the ruins of the fall, exposed to condemnation, and no more able to save our own souls from hell, than to rescue our bodies from the grave. Instead of perplexing ourselves about the awfully deep and incomprehensible, but most righteous dispensation of God, in permitting the entrance of sin and death; let us learn to adore his grace for providing so adequate a remedy for that awful catastrophe, which we are sure was consistent with all his glorious perfections. Gen. 2:16, 17.—As our children have evidently, through us, received a sinful, suffering, and dying nature from the first Adam; we should be stirred up, even by their pains and sorrows in helpless infancy, to seek for them the blessings of the second Adam's righteousness and salvation. 1 Cor. 15:45-49. SCOTT.

V. 20. Entered.] 'Entered in privily.' Impr. Vers., 1809. So the Vulg. 'If the scruple be raised, what was the law doing so many years? It was given for a time, not primarily, or principally; its purpose was to destroy sin, but the event turned out the contrary, through the sloth of men, not through the nature of the law. Chrys., Theoph. Bloomf. Abound.] 'For this law prohibited many things in themselves lawful; it commanded many rites. These were often transgressed, and punishment ensued to the Jews.' Ros. 'Paraptōma [offence] should be carefully distinguished from hē hamartia in the next cl., and referred (as in v. 15.) to the transgression of Adam, which incurred the penalty of death. Now unless there had subsequently been a divine revelation, containing precepts and threatenings, the punishment of death inflicted on mankind, would have been due, not for their own sin, but that of Adam. The law, therefore, making every man personally answerable for all the consequences of his own guilt, may justly be described in its effects, as a multiplication of the original transgression; every sinner thereby becoming, on his own account, guilty of death, as much as Adam was for the first offence. Rom. 7:9-11. 2 Cor. 3:6-8. Gal. 3:10. Deut. 27:15. end.' Taylor. 'The superabounding of grace has no respect to the number of persons (how can this be the case, since the evils of Adam's transgression extend to all without exception?) but to the number of offences; see v. 16. So this passage cannot be used to prove the doctrine of universal salvation.' STUART.

Concluding Note. V. 15-19. The principal thing, which renders the expositions, generally given of these vs., perplexed and unsatisfactory, arises from an evident misconception of the apostle's reasoning, in supposing that Adam and Christ represented exactly the same company: whereas Adam was the surety of the whole human species as his posterity; Christ only of that chosen remnant, which has been, or shall be, one with Him by faith, who alone 'are counted to Him for a generation.' Ps. 22: 30, 31. Indeed all men, in consequence of the undertaking of Christ, are under a dispensation of mercy, and are 'endured with much long-suffering'; they are not left desperate, they have many temporal mercies, and they shall all arise to judgment. There is likewise such an infinite sufficiency in the atonement of Christ, and it is proposed to sinners in so general a manner, as a common salvation for all who will accept of it, that a foundation is laid for the most unreserved invitations, exhortations, and exhortations; and no one will be rejected, who sincerely seeks this salvation. Yet these important truths perfectly harmonize with the foreknowledge and predetermined purpose of God, in respect of the persons, who actually will embrace and obtain the proffered blessings. If we omit the consideration of the number, who perish in 'the first Adam,' or are saved in 'the second Adam,' if we wholly leave this to the wise, righteous, and merciful Creator and Judge of all men, as one of those 'secret things which belong to Him,' and not to us; and if we exclusively consider the benefits which believers derive from Christ, as compared with the loss sustained in Adam, by the human race: we shall then see the passage open, most perspicuously and gloriously, to our view. For the thoughts of the supposed immense majority of those, who shall eventually perish, is not to encumber the mind in these contemplations: I say, supposed; for possibly we shall find our conjectures erroneous, when the doom of men, [in all worlds, and] through all ages and nations, shall be finally determined. Let us then advert to the apostle's words.—'The offence' of Adam, and its consequences, do not in all things coincide with the 'free gift,' or the grace of redemption. Through that one man's single offence, 'the many,' or the multitude, of mankind are dead; under condemnation, dead in sin, and exposed to death temporal and eternal. But the infinite grace and mercy of God, and the free gift of righteousness and salvation, through that 'one man Jesus Christ,' 'the second Adam,' who is also 'the Lord from heaven,' much more abound to 'the many,' even to all the multitude of believers; by bringing them into a far safer, happier, and more exalted state, than that from which they fell in Adam. For this gift, not merely answers to the loss sustained by Adam's sin, but far exceeds it in this respect: 'the judgment of God' came through Adam's single offence 'on all men to condemnation; but the free gift' not only delivers believers from that 'condemnation,' but from the punishment due to their own numerous, or rather innumerable transgressions; nor does it place them anew in a state of probation, at all resembling that of Adam before he sinned; but it fixes them in a state of justification, even as Adam would have been, if he had stood his time of trial. For if, by 'one offence of one man,' death acquired a complete dominion over the whole human race, without a personal trial, in that respect, whether they would be obedient or not; much more will they, who by faith 'receive the abundance of grace,' and of the gift of 'righteousness,' be assuredly preserved in that state of acceptance, and so 'reign in life' by the perfect obedience of their one Surety, Jesus Christ; without the infinite peril, or inevitably fatal consequences, of being put upon a personal trial of their perfect obedience, like that in which Adam had failed, and in which Christ had persevered.

Man is, indeed, in some respects, in a probationary state on earth; but no man is put on the trial, whether he can obtain exemption from the general condemnation of Adam and his seed, by his own personal obedience. A trial is made of him, tending to discover the wickedness of his heart by manifold experiments; the trial is made by the Gospel, whether the sinner will repent and believe; professed Christians are tried, whether they are sincere or not; and believers are proved in respect of the strength of their faith and grace; yet they are not put on any probation, with reference to their justification and eternal life; but 'are accounted righteous,' and appointed heirs by faith alone, through the righteousness of their one Divine Surety; which consisted not, like Adam's offence, in one action, but in a continued and perfect conformity to the whole divine law, through life, and unto his death on the cross.—Yet, notwithstanding these differences, the similarity is striking and instructive; for, 'as by the one offence of one man, sin entered,' and prevailed to the condemnation of all men; so, by 'the righteousness of One,' even Christ, grace entered and prevailed to the complete justification of all men, throughout the earth, and during all ages, who are related to Christ by grace and faith, or by regeneration, and partaking of the life-giving Spirit of Christ; as all men were related to Adam by natural gen-

CHAP. VI.

1 We may not live in sin, 2 for we are dead unto it, 3 as appeareth by our baptism. 12 Let not sin reign any more, 18 because we have yielded ourselves to the service of righteousness, 23 and for that death is the wages of sin.

WHAT shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?

2 God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?

3 Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death?

4 Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.

CHAP. VI. The apostle having at large asserted, opened, and proved, the great doctrine of justification by faith, for fear lest any should suck poison out of that sweet flower, and turn that grace of God into wantonness and licentiousness, he, with a like zeal, copiousness of expression, and cogency of argument, presses the absolute necessity of sanctification and a holy life, as the inseparable fruit and companion of justification; for wherever Jesus Christ is made of God unto any soul righteousness, He is made of God unto that soul sanctification, 1 Cor. 1:30. The water and the blood came streaming together out of the pierced side of the dying Jesus. And what God hath thus joined together, let not us dare to put asunder.

V. 1-23. The transition, here, is observable, v. 1. What use shall we make of this sweet and comfortable doctrine? Shall we hence take encouragement to sin, because the more sin we commit, the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? No, it is an abuse, and the apostle startles at the thought of it, v. 2. He entertains the objection as Christ did the devil's blackest temptation, Mat. 4:10. Get thee hence, Satan. Those opinions that countenance sin, or open a door to practical immoralities, how specious and plausible soever, through pretence of advancing free grace, are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence; for the truth as it is in Jesus, is a truth according to godliness, Tit. 1:1.

He is very full in pressing the necessity of holiness in this ch., which may be reduced to two heads.

I. His exhortations to holiness, which show the nature of it; what it is, and wherein it consists: in general, in mortification, and vivification; dying to sin, and living to righteousness; elsewhere expressed by putting off the old man, and putting on the new; ceasing to do evil, and learning to do well.

1. Mortification, putting off the old man, several ways expressed. (1.) We must live no longer in sin, v. 2. not be as we have been, nor do as we have done. 1 Pet. 4:3. Though none live without sin, yet, blessed be God, some do not live in sin; do not make a trade of it, live in it as their element: that is to be sanctified. (2.) The body of sin must be destroyed, v. 6. The corruption that dwelleth in us is the body of sin, consisting of many parts and members, as a body. This is the root to which the axe must be laid. We must not only cease from the acts of sin; but get the vicious habits and inclinations weakened and destroyed: * not only cast away the idols out of the sanctuary, but the idols of iniquity out of the heart. (3.) We must be dead indeed unto sin, v. 11. as indifferent to the pleasures and delights of sin, as a man dying is to his former diversions. He that is dead

* The lower propensities are not to be destroyed, of course, for that would be to commit suicide, but they are to be weakened, if too active; to be made obedient to the higher principles or elements of our nature, enlightened by revelation and reason: to be regulated, and their abuses destroyed; they must never rule. Ed.

eration. For, as 'by the disobedience' of one single person, being a public character, or representative of his posterity, 'many were made' or constituted 'sinners,' and dealt with accordingly, previously to the consideration of their personal transgressions: so, 'by the obedience of One,' who also was a public character, and the representative of his people, 'many,' even the whole multitude of believers, 'are constituted righteous' before God, and dealt with as such; even previously to the consideration of their personal holiness and obedience; which spring from their spiritual union with Christ, as depravity does from man's natural union with Adam. Thus, in many things, the type and Antitype coincide; though disobedience and condemnation are opposite to obedience and justification. But the believer, being justified by faith, has his title to life, in Christ, who preserves it for him: so that he is not left to perdition, or to the hazards arising from the mutability of creatures, as Adam was; but he is safe by his union with Him, who is 'God manifest in the flesh;' and his future felicity will be proportionably more exalted, in consequence of his endeared relation to the Godhead, in Christ, his Brother and Friend.

(17.) Much more, &c. Can anything be 'much more' certain, than that all men as one with Adam die? Yes, it is much more certain that all, who, by faith 'receive the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life with Christ.' Enoch and Elijah did not die, but were translated; and multitudes innumerable shall be living when Christ shall come: 1 Cor. 15:50-54, but not one true believer shall come short of 'reigning in life with Him!'—As it is evident, that all men, in the strict sense of the word, do not 'receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness,' or obtain 'justification of life;' and that 'all men,' in this universal sense, shall not 'reign in life,' for some shall 'go away unto everlasting punishment:' so the term must be explained, in the 1st clause, of all men in Adam, and in the 2d, of all men in Christ, if any consistent meaning is to be affixed to the words (18): except universal 'salvation, with eternal glory,' be contended for; as 'justification unto life,' and 'reigning with Christ in life,' are predicated emphatically of the whole company here described. It may, indeed, be admitted, that the 'free gift' is sufficient for 'all men,' and ought to be proposed to 'all men;' and if 'all men' (18) be thus understood, as some think it may be, it differs from the 'many' in some of the other vs.; yet the apostle's argument seems, through the whole, to be concerning the same companies, those in Adam and those in Christ. Scott.

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The apostle does not set us an example of keeping out of sight, explaining away, or cautiously proposing the free grace of the Gospel: but, while he states his doctrine in the most explicit and decisive language imaginable, he shows also the inseparable connexion between justification and sanctification. Let 'the thought be abhorred,' says he, 'of continuing in sin that grace may abound.' The unbeliever has no part in that grace: and, as the believer is 'dead to sin, how shall he live any longer' in the practice of it? That view of the glory of God, of the holiness and excellency of the law, and of his own guilt and danger, which, as the effect of regeneration, convinced him that he needed the salvation of Christ, and made it precious to his heart, led him also to repent, and to abhor all sin. This change, begun in convictions, always humbling and often alarming, was more completely effected by further discoveries of the mercy, and experience of the comforts, of redemption: so that love and gratitude to the divine Savior, and other evangelical principles, concur with hatred of sin, to mortify his affections to its pleasures and interests, and to cause him to separate from iniquity, as a dead man ceases from the actions of life. John 16:8-11, 14, 15. 2 Cor. 5:13-15. Gal. 2:17-21. 5:13-26. Jam. 2:8-26. Not only ought this to be the believer's character, but in a measure it actually is so: and thus it forms the proper evidence, being the inseparable concomitant, of his justification. This effectually secures him from abusing the doctrines of grace: he may be seduced into sin, but he 'cannot live any longer' in the habitual practice of known transgression: 1 John 3:4-10.—The benefits of justification and sanctification are connected by a perpetual bond: each of them flows from Christ, by the grace of God. Sanctification is the destruction of sin, i. e. of our original depravity; in the place of which the purity of a renewed nature succeeds. This is the quality, which the Spirit creates in the members of Christ our Head.—'Dying unto sin,' and 'living unto God,' or Christ, or righteousness, answer to each other.' Beza.—It is surprising, that many learned expositors should, without hesitation or proof, interpret the phrase, as if it only meant the outward profession made in baptism: and, as if all baptized persons were indeed 'dead unto sin.' Note here, that if the faith, to which Paul in this epistle doth ascribe justification, did not [not?] only oblige to, but comprehend evangelical and constant obedience, there could be no color for this objection: that therefore must be a mistake.' Whitby. Sc.

(2.) Living therein. Zēn en plainly denotes living in the habitual commission of, being given up to. So the expression is used in [198]

Ælian., Philostr., Diod. Sic., and Wets., comp. v. 10 and 11. Col. 3:7. BL.

V. 3, 4. The spiritual meaning of the external sign is the same when baptism is administered to the infant-offspring of believers: even as the meaning of circumcision was the same, when it was performed on Abraham the aged believer, on Ishmael, who perhaps never believed, and on Isaac, an infant of 8 days old, long before he believed. 4:9-12. Gen. 17:7-12. Mat. 23:19, 20. It was the outward sign of regeneration, or 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,' and it sealed justification by faith to all those who ever possessed the thing signified, but to none else. Thus Simon Magus, though baptized adult, derived no more benefit from the outward sign, than those multitudes do, who, having been baptized in infancy, when grown up despise the inward and spiritual grace of it. Acts 8:9-13, 36-40.—Great stress has been laid on the expression, 'buried with Him by baptism into death,' as proving that baptism ought to be performed by immersion, to which the apostle is supposed to allude. Col. 2:11, 12. But we are said also, to be 'crucified with Christ,' and circumcised with Him, without any allusion to the outward manner in which crucifixion and circumcision were performed: and, as baptism is far more frequently mentioned, with reference to the 'pouring out' of the Holy Ghost; Notes, Acts 1:4-8. 2:14-21. Tit. 3:4-7. and as the apostle is evidently treating on the inward meaning, not the outward form, of that ordinance; no conclusive argument is deducible from the expression, showing that immersion is necessary to baptism; or even, apart from other proof, that baptism was generally thus administered. Scott.

(3, 4) Into his death. 'The context plainly confines us to one sense, namely, that expressed in the preceding words, dead to sin; and must therefore mean, to be bound, by baptism, to die unto, and utterly renounce and forsake all sin, as Christ has laid down his life. At the same time it must be acknowledged, that the similitude is, like many others of Jewish writers, but remote and faint, and is, as Kop. observes, more in words, than in the thing itself. There is plainly a reference, v. 4. to the ancient mode of baptism by immersion, (see Suicer, and Bingham,) and I agree with Kop. and Ros., that there is reason to regret it should have been abandoned in most Christian churches, especially as it has so evidently a reference to the mystic sense of baptism. (Wets. adverts to the figurative use of bury, as employed of plunging under water; which, he says, was especially applied to those who were cast into the sea. And he cites Sil. Ital., Plin., and Anthol. And so it seems to have been taken by Theoph., who observes, that, as we are by baptism buried in the water, so Christ was buried in the earth.) [This reference St. disputes, pp. 252-4.] Though I grant, with Doddr., that that will not prove this particular circumstance to be essential to the ordinance: and in whatever manner it was administered, if it were intended as a declaration of faith in the death and resurrection of Christ, as it is well known that Christ died for sin, it would infer an obligation to die to it, and rise again to a holy life; which is the main point at which the apostle labors.' Bloomf.—'Baptism, or our immersion into water, according to the ancient mode of administering it, is a figure of our burial with Christ, and of our conformity to his death, and so, signifies our dying to sin, and walking in newness of life. For the death of Christ must be considered not barely as a natural death, a separation of soul and body, but as a sacrifice for sin, to destroy the power and dominion of it; and so our dying to sin (i. e. ceasing from the practice of it) is the truest conformity to the death of Christ; and we must consider his resurrection, not as his returning to life again, but as his living to God, his advancement into his spiritual kingdom, the design of which is to promote the interest of religion and a divine life; and so our walking in newness of life (a virtuous and religious life) is our conformity to his resurrection, and makes us the true subjects of his spiritual kingdom; which, the apostle tells us, gives an abundant assurance of a glorious resurrection, that we shall, in a proper sense, rise with Him; because this new life, wherein our spiritual conformity to the resurrection of Christ consists, is an immortal principle of life, which can no more die, than Christ can die again, now He is risen from the dead.' is separated from his former company, converse, business, enjoyments, employments ; is not what he was, does not what he did, has not what he had. Death makes a mighty change ; such a change doth sanctification make in the soul, it cuts off all correspondence with sin. (4.) Sin must not reign in our mortal bodies, that we should obey it, v. 12. Though sin may remain as an outlaw, may oppress as a tyrant, yet let it not reign as a king ; make laws, preside in councils, nor command the militia ; let it not be uppermost in the soul, so that we should obey it. Though we may be sometimes overtaken and overcome by it ; yet let not sinful lusts be a law to you, to which you would yield a consenting obedience. In the lusts thereof,—it refers to the body, not to sin. Sin lies very much in gratifying the body, [and its animal propensities,] and humoring that. And there is reason implied in that, your mortal body ; because it is a mortal body, and hastening apace to the dust, therefore let not sin reign in it. It was sin that made our bodies mortal, therefore do not yield obedience to such an enemy. (5.)

V. 5-7. 'By an elegant metaphor, the apostle compares Christ, who died and was buried, and rose again from the dead, to a plant, which, being covered in the earth, germinates in due time. And then, because he had said, that we "are dead to sin, and buried with Christ," that we might rise again unto righteousness ; in order to intimate, that all these things take place by the grace which we derive from Christ, he says, that we have grown together with Him into one plant ; as those things which are "planted together" with a tree, grow together, and live by one common sap.' Beza. 'We grow together with Christ, as moss, ivy, missletoe, or such like, grow up by a tree, and are nourished by the juice thereof.' Leigh. Sinful men, then, become 'one with Christ,' by partaking of the Holy Spirit, which animates his whole mystical body, as the soul does our natural bodies ; and, by the teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, they believe unto justification : and then faith renders them in that way 'one with Christ ;' but the same Spirit also inclines and enables them to mortify all their sinful passions, and thus renews their souls unto holiness. . . . For he that is dead to the love and practice of sin, is freed for ever from its yoke : he has passed into the service of another Master ; sin has no further claim upon him, and shall never recover its lost authority. 8:3, 4, 12, 13. Gal. 5:22-26. Col. 2:11, 12. Thus v. 7. is commonly explained ; but it is most exactly tr. : 'He that is dead, has been justified from sin ;' Marg.—8:1, 2. and the lit. meaning seems still more aptly to coincide with the apostle's argument : he, and he only, who 'is dead to sin,' has been justified from the guilt of it, 'having received the free gift unto justification of life.' 5:15-19, v. 18. His death to sin is the requisite attestation of his being accounted righteous ; so that the doctrine, properly understood, is incapable of that perversion which is generally objected to it.—Indeed, Christ, when 'He died unto sin once,' (10) was justified as our Surety and Exemplar in consequence of his death : so that the believer's conformity to his Lord, of which the apostle discourses, is illustrated by the lit. tr.—(6) Our old man.] Our depraved nature is called 'a man ;' because it comprises a complete system of unholy dispositions and affections, and imparts its baleful influence to the whole soul and body ; and the 'old man,' because derived from the first Adam, and so in every one prior to grace, or the image of the second Adam. 1 Cor. 15: 45-49. Eph. 4:20-24. Col. 3:7-11.

(5.) 'For if we have become kindred with Him, by a death like his, then we shall be also by a resurrection.'

We must not yield our members as instruments of unrighteousness, v. 13. The members of the body are made use of by the corrupt nature as tools, by which the wills of the flesh are fulfilled ; but we must not consent to that abuse. The members of the body are fearfully and wonderfully made ; it is pity they should be the devil's tools of unrighteousness unto sin, instruments of the sinful actions, according to the sinful dispositions. Unrighteousness is unto sin ; the sinful acts confirm and strengthen the sinful habits ; one sin begets another ; it is like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it before it be meddled with. The members of the body may, perhaps, through the prevalence of temptation, be forced to be instruments of sin ; but do not yield them to be so, do not consent to it. This is one branch of sanctification, the mortification of sin.

2. Vivification, or living to righteousness ; and what is that ?

(1.) It is to walk in newness of life, v. 4. Newness of life supposes newness of heart, for out of it are the issues of life ; and there is no way to make the stream sweet, but by making the spring so. Walking, in Scripture, is put for the course and tenor of the conversation, which must be new. Walk by new rules, toward new ends, from new principles ; make a new choice of the way ; choose new paths to walk in, new leaders to walk after, new companions to walk with : old things should pass away, and all things become new. The man is what he was not, does what he did not.

(2.) It is to be alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord, v. 11. To converse with God, to have a regard to Him, a delight in Him, a concern for Him, the soul on all occasions carried out toward Him, as towards an agreeable object, in which it takes a complacency : this is to be alive to God. The love of God reigning in the heart, is the life of the soul towards God. The soul is where it loves, rather than where it lives ; the affections and desires alive toward God. Or, living (our life in the flesh) unto God, to his honor and glory as our end, by his Word and will as our rule ; in all our ways to acknowledge Him, and to have our eyes ever toward Him ; that is to live unto God. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ is our spiritual life ; there is no living to God but through Him. He is the Mediator ; there can be no comfortable receive-ings from God, or acceptable regards to God, but in and through Jesus Christ ; no intercourse between sinful souls and a holy God, but by the mediation of the Lord Jesus. Through Christ, as the Author and maintainer of this life ; through Christ, as the Head from whom we receive vital influence ; through Christ, as the Root by which we derive sap and nourishment, and so live. In living to God, Christ is all in all.

(3.) It is to yield ourselves to God, as those that are alive from the dead, v. 13. The very life and being of holiness lie in the dedication of ourselves to the Lord, giving our own selves to the Lord, 2 Cor. 8:5. 'Yield yourselves to Him, not only as the conquered to the conqueror, because he can stand it out no longer ; but as the wife to her husband, to whom her desire is ; as the scholar to the teacher, the apprentice to his master, to be taught and ruled by Him : yield nothing less than your whole selves ; accommodate yourselves to God ; so Tremellius, from the Syriac : comply with Him ; not only present yourselves once for all, but be always ready to Him. Yield yourselves to Him as wax to the seal, to take any impression, to be, and have, and do, what He pleases.' When Paul said, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do ? Acts 9:6. he was then yielded to God.—As those that are alive from the dead : not a dead carcase to a living God, but a living sacrifice, ch. 12:1. The surest evidence of our spiritual life is, the dedication of ourselves to God. It may be understood of a death, in law, and so of the justified and redeemed.

(4.) It is to yield our members, as instruments of righteousness, to God. The members of our bodies, when withdrawn from the service of sin, are not to lie idle, but to be made use of in the service of God. The powers and faculties of the soul are the immediate subjects of holiness and righteousness, yet the members of the body are to be instruments ; the body must be always ready to serve the soul in the service of God. Thus, v. 14. 'Yield your members servants of righteousness unto holiness. Let them be under the conduct, and at the command of the righteous law of God, and that principle of inherent righteousness, which the Spirit, as a Sanctifier, plants in the soul.—Righteousness unto holiness ; which intimates growth, and progress, and ground got. As every sinful act confirms the sinful habit,

(6.) 'The corrupt nature of man received in Scripture the name of the old man, in reference to the most critical condition in which we are placed, namely, at our birth, from which time (unless he be reformed) a man will more and more enslave himself to sinful habits. In continuation of the allegory, body and members are ascribed to this old man.' Wolf. 'Sin is here, by a continuation of prosopopœia, personified, as a master. But when a master is dead the slave no longer owes [gives] him service.' Bloomf. With Him.] 'As he was.—So that we should no longer, &c.'

V. 9-10. The promise of God, to give life, even eternal life, to all who believe, is the sole ground of our hope of obtaining the inestimable blessing ; but as all who hear the Gospel do not obtain it, nor all who profess and seem to believe it ; how shall we know, that we, rather than our fellow-sinners, are partakers of the promise, except by being conscious of having experienced a 'death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness ?' If a professed Christian is a stranger to this change, his confidence of 'reigning with Christ in glory' is presumptuous. But when a man becomes dead to his once most beloved sinful pleasures and pursuits ; his prospect is clear, and his interest in the righteousness of the Surety is demonstrated. 5:6-10. John 14:18-20. Gal. 2:17-21.—As the blessed Jesus was in Himself wholly free from sin ; it seems impossible to find any satisfactory meaning in the words, 'He died unto sin once ;' unless we allow, that He died as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men, which were imputed to Him, and that He 'bare them in his own body on the tree.' Col. 2:20-23. 3:1-4. Heb. 9:27, 28. 1 Pet. 2: 18-25, v. 24. 4:1, 2.

(8.) Believe.] Perhaps we may tr. 'may trust.'

V. 11. The preceding vs. declare the character and experience of real Christians, according to their measure of grace : but the apostle here proceeds to exhort professed Christians to evince their sincerity by a suitable conduct ; and believers to live up to their privileges, and in consistency with their profession. Dead unto sin.] Eph. 2:1, 5. Col. 2:13. The context clearly shows, that being 'dead to sin,' or 'from sin,' is meant ; and not 'dead in sins ;' and sanctification by union with Christ, not pardon through his atonement, is the benefit insisted on. This appears by the clause, 'our old man is crucified with Him' (6) : i. e. not our persons but our depraved nature and propensities. 1, 2. SCOTT.

(11.) 'Dr. A. Clarke well paraphrases, Die as truly unto sin, as He died for sin ; live as truly unto God, as He lives with God.' BLOOMF.

12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.

13 Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

14 For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace.

15 What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

and makes the nature more and more prone to sin; so every gracious act confirms the gracious habit: serving righteousness is unto holiness; one duty fits us for another; and the more we do, the more we may do, for God. Or, serving righteousness, as an evidence of sanctification.

II. His motives or arguments to show the necessity of this sanctification. There is such an antipathy in our hearts by nature to holiness, that it is no easy matter to bring them to submit to it: it is the Spirit's work, who persuades by such inducements as these, set home on the soul.

1. He argues from our sacramental conformity to Jesus Christ. Observe his reasoning:

(1.) In general, we are dead to sin, i. e. in profession, and in obligation. By our baptism we profess to have no more to do with sin. We are dead to sin by a participation of virtue and power for the killing of it, and by our union with Christ and interest in Him, in and by whom it is killed. All this is in vain if we persist in sin; we contradict a profession, violate an obligation, return to that to which we were dead, like walking ghosts; than which nothing is more unbecoming and absurd. For, v. 7. he that is dead, is freed from sin; i. e. he that is dead to it, is freed from the rule and dominion of it; as the servant that is dead, is free from his master, Job 3: 19.

(2.) In particular, being baptized into Jesus Christ, we were baptized into his death, v. 3. We were baptized,—unto Christ, as, 1 Cor. 10: 2. unto Moses. Baptism binds us to Christ as our Teacher, it is our allegiance to Christ as our Sovereign. Particularly, we were baptized into his death, into a participation of the privileges purchased by his death, and into an obligation both to comply with the design of his death, which was to redeem us from iniquity, and to conform to the pattern of his death, that, as Christ died for sin, so we should die to sin: thereby we know the fellowship of his sufferings, Phil. 3: 10. Thus we are here said to be planted together in the likeness of his death, v. 5. not only a conformity, but a conformation; as the ingrafted stock is planted together into the likeness of the shoot, of the nature of which it doth participate. Planting is in order to life and fruitfulness: we are planted in the vineyard, in a likeness to Christ; which likeness we should evidence in sanctification. Our creed concerning Jesus Christ, is, among other things, that He was crucified, dead, and buried; now baptism is a sacramental conformity to Him in each of these, as the apostle here notices.

[1.] Our old man is crucified with Him, v. 6. The death of the cross was slow, but sure; such is the mortification of sin in believers. It was a cursed death, Gal. 3: 13. Sin dies as a malefactor, devoted to destruction; it is an accursed thing. Crucified with Him,—not in respect of time, but in respect of causality. The crucifying of Christ for us, has an influence on the crucifying of sin in us.

[2.] We are dead with Christ, v. 8. Christ was obedient to death: when He died, we might be said to die with Him, as our dying to sin is an act of conformity, both to the design, and to the sampler of Christ's dying for sin. Baptism signifies and seals our union with Christ, our ingrafting into Christ; so that we are dead with Him, and engaged to have no more to do with sin than He had.

[3.] We are buried with Him by baptism, v. 4. Our conformity is complete. We are in profession quite cut off from all commerce and communion with sin, as those buried are from the world; not only not of the living, but no more among the living, have nothing more to do with them. Thus must we be, as Christ was, separate from sin and sinners. We are buried, in profession and obligation. Why this burying in baptism should so much as allude to any custom of dipping under water in baptism, any more than our baptismal crucifixion and death should have any such references, I confess I cannot see. It is plain, it is not the sign, but the thing signified, in baptism, that the apostle here calls being buried with Christ; and the expression of burying alludes to Christ's burial. As Christ was buried, that He might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are in baptism buried, cut off from the life of sin, that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

Again, our conformity to the resurrection of Christ obliges us to rise again to newness of life. That is the power of his resurrection, which Paul was so desirous to know, Phil. 3: 10. Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, i. e. by the power of the Father; the power of God is his glory; it is glorious power, Col. 1: 11. Now in baptism we are obliged to conform to that pattern, to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection, v. 5. to live with Him, v. 8. See Col. 2: 12. Conversion is the first resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and this resurrection is conformable to Christ's resurrection. This conformity of the saints to the resurrection of Christ, seems to be intimated, in the rising of so many of the bodies of the saints; which, though mentioned before by anticipation, is supposed to have been concomitant with Christ's resurrection, Mat. 27: 52. We are all risen with Christ. In two things we must conform to the resurrection of Christ:

[1.] He rose, to die no more, v. 9. others that were raised, rose to die again; but Christ, to die no more: thus, over Christ death has no more dominion; He was dead indeed, but is alive, and so alive, that He lives for evermore, Rev. 1: 18. Thus we must rise from the grave of sin, never again to return to it, or to have any more fellowship with the works of darkness, having quitted that grave, that land of darkness, as darkness itself.

[2.] He rose to live unto God, v. 10. to live a heavenly life, to receive that glory which was set before Him. Others, that were raised from the dead, returned to the same life in every respect they had before; but Christ, to leave the world. Now I am no more in the world, John 13: 1. 17: 11. He rose to live to God, i. e. to intercede and rule, and all to the glory of the Father. Thus must we rise to live to God: that is it he calls newness of life, v. 4. to live from other principles, by other rules, with other aims, than we have done. A life devoted to God is a new life; before, self was the chief and highest end, but now God. To live indeed, is to live to God, with our eyes

V. 12, 13. 'The vicious affections, like noxious weeds, sprout up and increase of themselves but too naturally; while the graces of the Christian temper, exotics in the soil of the human heart, like the more tender productions of the vegetable world, (though the breath of heaven must quicken them,) require on our part also, in order to their being preserved in health and vigor, constant superintendence and assiduous care.' Wilberforce's View of Pract. Christ.—Let none therefore suffer sin to reign in their bodies, that they should obey and comply with its corrupt lustings, to the injury of their immortal souls. If a professed Christian does this habitually, he can have no evidence of his conversion; as provision is made in the Gospel for deliverance from the dominion of sin, as well as from condemnation: and if a real Christian does this in any particular instances, it must weaken his evidence and confidence; and it is the effect of partial unbelief, unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of his obligations and privileges. 8:12, 13. 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Thus our eyes should be employed in contemplating the works, and reading the Word, of God; our ears, in hearing his voice, and in attending to the cries of the distressed; our tongues, in speaking the praises of God, instructing the ignorant, preaching his Word, and in profitable conversation: and even our natural inclinations should be so regulated by his law, and subordinated to superior considerations, that 'whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do it to the glory of God.' 16—19. 12:1. 1 Cor. 6:18—20. 10:29—33. Phil. 1:19, 20. Col. 3:16, 17. 1 Pet. 2:11. Is it not most evident, that sin is here represented as having its seat in the soul, which employs the members of the body, as instruments of accomplishing its evil purposes? And if so, what becomes of that system of interpretation, which supposes animal nature to be the flesh, and the rational soul the spirit? 7:15—25. 8:1—13. Gal. 5:16—26. Sc.

(12.) 'It is judiciously remarked by Chrys., that "the apostle does not say, let not the flesh energize; for he does not bid us destroy nature, but regulate our dispositions." [Note, end of ch. 7.] It is scarcely necessary to observe, that by hamartia [tr. sin] is here denoted not peccatum, but vitiositas, that propensity to evil which exists in every man. Mortal. He hints, (so Chrys. and the Gr. comment.) 1st, that the pleasures of the body are not permanent, from its liability to disease and death, and therefore there is the less reason to gratify corporal appetites: 2dly, that the labors of resisting temptations to vice are but of short continuance, and not, therefore, such as need seem formidable: 3dly, to admonish them of the near approach of that period when the dominion of sin would work death, spiritual and eternal.' Bloomf. 'Illicit pleasures are to be strangled in the very birth [conception]; nor ought even the lawful appetites to be indulged farther than nature requires, that the body may learn to obey the better part.' GROT.

(13.) I exhort you not in vain to throw off the tyranny of sin, for if you are not wanting to yourselves, promised spiritual aids shall help your infirmities: the law enjoined but helped not the performance, but ye are not now under it, but under grace, which forgave former, and helps against future transgressions. See Bloomf. Ed.

V. 14, 15. Hope of victory gives fresh ardor to the courageous: assurance of it would make a coward valiant. The slave emancipated from his yoke, or the captive escaped from his dungeon, will resist all attempts to reduce him to his former abject state, with a vigor proportioned to the prospect of preserving his beloved liberty. Thus the apostle assures believers, that sin shall not resume its hated dominion over them, in order to animate their opposition to its influence, in every instance. He shows, that the ground for this assurance of final liberty and victory, lies in the nature and securities of the new covenant. 2 S. 23:5. Is. 55:1—3. Jer. 31:31—34. 32:39—41. Heb. 6:7—13. He could not intend, merely to distinguish between the Mosaic dispensation and that of the Gospel; for all were not slaves to sin who were under the former, nor are all free from sin who live under the latter. But the moral law, as the foundation of the covenant of works, in whatever way or degree it is known, is evidently opposed to the covenant of grace. All, who remain under the covenant of works, must be held under the 'dominion of sin,' and their efforts to emancipate themselves be unsuccessful; because no grace is by it promised or communicated to a sinner. Ez. 19:5. But the believer passes from under this covenant, to be under that of mercy and grace; and as motives and encouragements are by it supplied, so effectual help is ensured to him, to preserve him from ever again becoming the willing slave of any sin; though he may be grievously harassed, huffed, or even polluted, by those temptations and corruptions, to which he once was wholly subjected. Sc.

16 Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

17 But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin: but ye have obeyed from the heart that form<sup>v</sup> of doctrine<sup>x</sup> which was delivered you.

18 Being then made free<sup>v</sup> from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness.

19 I speak after the manner of men, because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity, unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness, unto holiness.

20 For when ye were the servants<sup>z</sup> of sin, ye were free<sup>a</sup> from righteousness.

21 What fruit<sup>b</sup> had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end<sup>c</sup> of those things is death.

2. He argues from the precious promises and privileges of the new covenant, v. 14. It might be objected, that sin is unavoidably too hard for us; 'No,' says he, 'there is strength laid up in the covenant of grace for your assistance, if you will but use it. Sin shall not have dominion.' Sin may struggle in a believer, may create him a great deal of trouble; but it shall not have dominion; may vex him, but it shall not rule over him. For we are not under the law, but under grace, not under the law of sin and death, but under the law of the spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus: we are actuated by other principles than we have been. Or,

V. 16—19. It could not but be known, and acknowledged, that all Christians were 'the servants of God.' Is. 54:15—17. John 12:23—26. The apostle therefore demanded, whether it might not be proved, what master any man served, by observing the constant tenor of his conduct. A person may do an occasional service for one to whom he is not servant; but no doubt he is the servant of that man, to whom he habitually yields and addicts himself; and in whose work he spends his time and strength, and skill, and abilities, day after day, and year after year. The case is the same in spiritual matters; a man may profess Christianity, and in some things appear to serve God; and yet habitually addict himself to sinful pursuits and pleasures. Mat. 6:24. But every one must be adjudged to be the servant of that master, to execute whose commands he willingly 'yields himself;' 2 Chr. 30:12. whether it be the sinful propensities of his own heart, in such actions as lead to death; or the new and spiritual obedience implanted by regeneration, in habitually performing the righteousness required in the law, and daily seeking, and striving, and praying, to be more and more exactly conformed to it.—These things the apostle stated to the Christians at Rome, by similitudes taken from the affairs of men, 'because of the infirmity of their flesh;' which rendered them less capable of understanding abstract reasonings on subjects of this kind; and that he might guard them against those delusions, to which their weakness and remaining sinfulness would otherwise expose them.

V. 20. The willing slaves of sin, though by no means free from obli-not under the covenant of works, which condemns on the least failure, which runs thus, 'Do this and live; do it not, and die;' but under the covenant of grace, which is herein well ordered, that every transgression in the covenant does not put us out of the covenant; and especially, that it does not leave our salvation in our own keeping, but lays it up in the hands of the Mediator, who undertakes for us, that sin shall not have dominion over us; hath Himself condemned it, and will destroy it; so that, if we pursue the victory, we shall come off more than conquerors. This is a very comfortable word to all true believers: if we were under the law, we were undone, for the law curses every one that continues not in everything; but we are under grace, grace which accepts the willing mind, which is not extreme to mark what we do amiss, which leaves room for repentance, which promises pardon on repentance: and what can be to an ingenuous mind a stronger motive than this, to have nothing to do with sin? Shall we sin against so much goodness, abuse such love? Sin because of it! The apostle starts at such a thought, v. 15. What can be more black and ill-natured than from a friend's extraordinary expressions of kindness and good-will, to take occasion to affront and offend him? To spurn at such bowels, to spit in the face of such love, is that which, between man and man, all the world would cry out shame on.

3. He argues from the evidence that this will be of our state, making for us, or against us, v. 16. All men are either the servants of God, or the servants of sin; these are the two families. Now, if we would know to which of these families we belong, we must inquire to which of these masters we yield obedience.

4. He argues, (1.) from their former sinfulness, v. 17—21. The servants of God do well to remember the time when they were the servants of sin; to keep them humble, penitent, and watchful, and to quicken them in the service of God. 'God be thanked that ye were so, i. e. that though ye were so, yet ye have obeyed.' Ye were so; God be thanked that we can speak of it as a thing past. Nay, your having been so formerly tends much to the magnifying of divine gations to be righteous, are yet unrestrained by these obligations in following their own carnal inclinations. They perform no service to righteousness; they are not influenced by a single regard to the glory or authority of God, in any of their actions, but they uniformly gratify some of their own unholy passions, and seek happiness in so doing; or, in one way or other, are actuated by selfish motives: so that nothing which they do is 'good before God.'—Free from righteousness.] 'To righteousness.' 'The dominion of sin' consists in willingly being slaves to it; not in being harassed by its hated power, and occasional prevalence; as an expelled usurper struggling to resume his throne: and being 'made free from sin,' means deliverance from the 'dominion of sin;' not an exemption from its distressing and hated strugglings for victory and dominion; as many erroneously suppose, to their deep disconsolation. Luke 11:14—26, v. 21, 22.

(20.) From.] In respect to. St. So Mich. 'Free with respect to righteousness, free from all dependence upon it, or constraint from it, acknowledging no subjection to it.' Bloomf. ED.

V. 21—23. As 'death' is here opposed to 'everlasting life;' and as temporal death is the end of the most godly life, as well as the most ungodly; it is clearly absurd to restrict his meaning to the death of the body; doubtless the apostle meant the future state of final misery, in a total separation from the presence and favor of God, and under his awful wrath and vengeance. 8:13. Gen. 2:16, 17. Rev. 20:11—15.—Thus the apostle closes his argument concerning justification, and sanctification as the seal and evidence of it.

(21.) Death.] 'Under this image, most terrible to human nature, the ancients adumbrated misery of every kind, and the reverse by life.' Koppe. 'He might have added, that though the telos [end] of sin be death, both in a physical and moral sense, yet, so untameable is human nature, that neither human laws, however severe, nor divine denunciations, however awful, have availed to repress it. This very propensity of our corrupt nature was clearly perceived [and lamented by many of the heathen themselves, see the citations in Wets. and Kop. on 7:15.] Here then it is, that divine laws come in aid of human enactments, and produce the strongest effects; because, though they suspend over the sinner denunciations the most terrible, yet they do what human laws never can effect [but ought, perhaps, in some degree to do, by offering rewards], namely, encourage the sinner to repent, by never leaving it (to use the words of the immortal Herod.) as an "hopeless case,—there being no room for repentance, nor getting rid of the sin." Let those, then, seriously reflect on this, who would remove capital punishments, and strive to cut out of the Scriptures what they term the unphilosophical doctrine of eternal punishments.' Bloomf.

22 But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness; and the end, everlasting life.

souls answering to it, complying with it, conformed to it: understanding, will, affections, aims, principles, actions, all according to that form of doctrine.

Being made free from sin, ye became servants of righteousness, v. 18. Servants to God, v. 22. We cannot serve two opposite masters. Conversion is a freedom from the service of sin; the shaking off of that yoke, resolving to have no more to do with it; a resignation of ourselves to the service of God and righteousness; to God as our Master, to righteousness as our work. When made free from sin, it is not that we may live as we list, and be our own masters; no: when delivered out of Egypt, we are, as Israel, led to the holy mountain, to receive the law, and there brought into the bond of the covenant.

PRACT. OBS. Self-righteous pride, and antinomian licentiousness, are two fatal rocks, on which immense multitudes are continually wrecked, and between which none but the Holy Spirit can pilot us: and the objections of open enemies to the doctrines of grace, derive their greatest plausibility from the unholy lives of many professed friends.—If indeed we have been so made 'one with Christ,' as to stand accepted in his righteousness; we shall certainly have conformity to Him in his death and resurrection; and his grace will enable us to 'crucify the old man, with his affections and lusts,' and excite us to determine on the destruction of 'the whole body of sin;' that we may no more serve that hated enemy, which crucified our beloved Lord; nor ever rest satisfied, till it has no place in our souls.—As our 'mortal bodies' will at last be raised immortal and incorruptible, by the almighty power of the Savior; 1 Cor. 15:50—53. Phil. 3:20, 21. so we should never allow 'sin to reign' in them, or obey it in the lusts thereof; but, praying

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 1—4. In interpreting these vs. the meaning of the word 'law' must be first carefully settled, whether the ceremonial law in particular, or the Mosaic dispensation in general; or the moral law, as requiring perfect obedience in order to 'justification of life,' he intended, 3:19, 20. Most expositors explain it either of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; but they do not assign any satisfactory reason, why sin must have dominion over a man, as long as he continued under the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; or why deliverance from the law, in this sense, by professing the gospel, should ensure his liberty from that slavery: indeed, no such reason can be assigned. No doubt, great numbers under the Mosaic dispensation, were both justified and sanctified, by the mercy and grace of the new covenant; and their relation to the law did not prevent them from being made 'free from sin.' Ex. 19:5. On the other hand, immense numbers remain slaves to sin under the Christian dispensation; and their external privileges and profession do not deliver them. 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 4:21—31. But so long as a man continues 'under the law,' as a covenant, and seeks justification by his own obedience; he inevitably continues the slave of sin, in one form or other: because nothing but 'the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus' can make any sinner 'free from the law of sin and death;' 3:3, 4. And, on the other hand, every one who is delivered from the law, as a covenant, by living faith in Christ, is, by the 'Spirit of life' given to him, delivered from the bondage of sin, which shall never more have dominion over him.—The apostle's argument, through all the subsequent parts of this ch., relates exclusively to the moral law, and refers especially to the tenth commandment; as found the service of sin, an unfruitful service. Besides the future losses, which are infinitely great, the very present gains of sin are not worth mentioning. It is an unbecoming service; that of which we are now ashamed; ashamed of the folly, ashamed of the filth of it. Shame came into the world with sin, and is still the certain product of it; either the shame of repentance, or, if not that, eternal shame and contempt. Who would wilfully do that which, sooner or later, he is sure to be ashamed of?

5. Lastly, He argues from the end of all these things; the prerogative of rational creatures is a power of prospect, of looking forward, considering the latter end of things. To persuade us from sin to holiness, here are blessing and cursing, good and evil, life and death, set before us; and we are put to our choice. (1.) The end of sin is death, v. 21. The way may seem pleasant and inviting, yet the end is dismal; at the last it bites; it will be bitterness in the latter end. Death is as due to a sinner, as wages to a servant, v. 23. This is true of every sin; there is no sin in its own nature venial; death is the wages of the least sin. (2.) If the fruit be unto holiness, if there be an active principle of true and growing grace, the end will be everlasting life; a very happy end! So, v. 23. The gift of God is eternal life. Heaven is life, consisting in the vision and fruition of God; and it is eternal life, no infirmities attending it, no death to put a period to it. This is the gift of God. The death is the wages of sin, it comes by desert; but the life is a gift, it comes by favor. And this gift is through Jesus Christ our Lord. He purchased it, prepared it, prepares us for it, preserves us to it; He is the Alpha and Omega, All in all in our salvation.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—6. Among other arguments used in the foregoing ch. to persuade us against sin, and to holiness, this was one, v. 14. that we are not under the law; and that argument he is here further insisting on and explaining, v. 6. We are delivered from the law. What does he mean by that? And how is it an argument why sin should not reign over us, and why we should walk in newness of life. 1. We are delivered from that power of the law, which curses and condemns us for the sin committed by us. The sentence of the law against us is vacated and reversed, by the death of Christ, to all true believers, Gal. 3:13. 2. We are delivered from that power of the law, which irritates and provokes the sin that dwelleth in us. This the apostle seems especially to refer to, v. 5. We being lamed by the fall, the law comes and directs us, but provides nothing to heal and help our lameness, and so makes us halt and stumble the more. Understand this not of the law as a rule, but as a covenant of works.

Now each of these is an argument why we should be holy; for here is encouragement to endeavors, though in many things we come short. We are under grace, which promises strength to do what it commands, and pardon on repentance when we do amiss. This is the scope of these vs. in general, that, in point of profession and privilege, we are under a covenant of grace, and not of works; under the Gospel of Christ, and not the Law of Moses. The difference between a law-state and a gospel state he had before illustrated, by the similitude of rising to a new life, and serving a new master; here he speaks of it under the similitude of being married to a new husband.

1. Our first marriage was to the law, which, according to the law of marriage, was to continue only during the life of the law. The law of marriage is obliging, only till the death of one of the parties, no matter which, the death of either discharges both. For this he appeals to themselves, as persons knowing the law, v. 1. many of the Christians at Rome had been Jews, and so were well acquainted with the law. The law hath power over a man as long as he liveth; in particular, the law of marriage hath power; or, in general, every law is so limited. The obligation and condemnation extends no further; death is the finishing of the law. Thus while we were alive to the Law, we were earnestly for help from above, we should refuse to yield any of our senses, or members, to be the instruments of unrighteousness; and seek to have them all devoted [and obedient] to God, and employed in his service; as those who have already entered on that divine and happy life, which we hope to lead to all eternity.—To this we may be encouraged, by the nature of the new covenant. If we be indeed Christians, we are 'not under the law,' which gives no power, and proposes no mercy; but 'under' the 'grace' of the Gospel; and this insures, to the regenerate and believing, the preservation and perfection of that 'liberty, with which Christ hath made him free.' Gal. 5:1—6. 13—15.—The real Christian finds, by experience, that his heart, as well as his state, is made new. Notwithstanding, therefore, 'the infirmities of the flesh,' he aims and prays to be enabled to spend all his powers and capacities, of body and soul, in the service of righteousness, unto increasing holiness. SCOTT.

those who explain these verses of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, are constrained to admit: 7—12. and though he speaks in the first three vs. of the law, in a more general sense; it should be noticed, that he is only illustrating his main subject by an apt similitude. — When the apostle particularly meant the ceremonial, in distinction from the moral law, he frequently spoke of it in diminutive terms. Eph. 2:15. Col. 2:20. Heb. 8:13. 9:10. .. But none of these lessening or distinctive characters of the law are found in this epistle, . . . to restrain it to the ceremonial law, in what is said about justification by its works.' Guise.—These remarks may prepare the way, for that interpretation of this passage, and of the ch., which, after mature deliberation, I have given. In ordinary cases, death alone dissolved the relation between the Jew and the law: yet in particular instances, the law became dead, and lost its authority to command or condemn a man, through his change of circumstances: and when the Jew became a Christian, and understood his Christian liberty, his relation to the Mosaic dispensation was finally terminated. From this case of a Jew, in respect of the law of Moses, as the condition of the national covenant, Ex. 19:5. 24:3, 4. Gal. 3:15—18. Heb. 8:7—13. 9:18—23. they might learn how the matter stood in respect of the moral law, as the condition of the covenant of works. The law respecting marriage in particular would aptly illustrate the subject.—The apostle does not, in this place, state the precepts concerning marriage, under the Christian dispensation; he merely shows, in one particular, how the case stood under the law: he says nothing concerning divorces or polygamy; neither does he intimate, that the man would be an adulterer, who took another wife, while his former was living, and not legally divorced: yet our Lord has taught this, Mat. 19:3—9. It would therefore be foreign to the apostle's design to interpret his words, as meaning that a woman, who had been equitably divorced, would be guilty of adultery, if she married again during her former husband's life: for neither the law of Moses, nor the precepts of Christ inculcate any such thing.—Now the case of the believer, in re-

3 So then, if, while <sup>b</sup> her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law <sup>c</sup> by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth <sup>d</sup> fruit unto God.

5 For when we were <sup>e</sup> in the flesh, the <sup>f</sup> motions of sins, which were by the law, did work in our members, to bring forth fruit <sup>e</sup> unto death.

6 But now we are delivered from the law, <sup>h</sup> that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.

7 What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not <sup>i</sup> known sin, but by the law: for I had not known <sup>j</sup> lust, except the law had <sup>k</sup> said, Thou shalt not covet.

under the power of it; while we were in our O. T. state, before the Gospel came into the world, and before it came with power into our hearts.

Such is the law of marriage, v. 2. the woman is bound to her husband during life, so bound to him, that she cannot marry another; if she do, she shall be reckoned an adulteress, v. 3. It will make her an adulteress, not only to be defiled by, but to be married to, another man; for that is so much the worse, on this account, that it abuses an ordinance of God, by making it to patronize the uncleanness.

Thus were we married to the law, v. 5. When we were in the flesh, i. e. in a carnal aspect of the subject under consideration, bore some analogy to that which had been stated. Not only were the Jewish converts 'dead to' the Mosaic law, by its virtual abrogation; but all true Christians were become dead to the moral law, as a covenant of works, 'by the body of Christ,' by his incarnation, obedience, and sacrifice on the cross for their transgressions. Eph. 2:14-18. He having thus answered its demands as their Surety, it had no further power to condemn; but believers were looked upon as if they had fully endured its sentence, and fulfilled its righteousness, by their Surety and Representative. Thus the relation between them and the law, as the condition of a covenant between God and them, was dissolved, even as marriage is dissolved by the natural or legal death of either party; and this was in order to their being 'married to Christ as risen from the dead,' that, being united to Him, according to the covenant of grace, and made partakers of all his 'unsearchable riches,' they might, by 'the supply of his Spirit,' bring forth such fruit in their lives, as bore the holy stamp of God upon it, was meet for his gracious acceptance, and honorable to his name.—It should be remembered, that many (probably most) of the Christians at Rome had been Gentiles, who never were under the Mosaic law; and even the Jewish converts were not, as yet, required to renounce it. This consideration fully proves, that no mere change of external state is exclusively meant, as many learned commentators have supposed. Gal. 2:17-21. SCOTT.

(1.) 'Commentators seem agreed upon little else in this ch. than that vs. 1-6. have a close connexion with the preceding ch. So that the present division occurs at a very wrong place. . . That Paul addresses Jewish Christians, and by law means that of Moses, is held by Chrys., the Gr. comtrs., and most moderns, as Grot., Beza, Willet, Tolet., Wetst., Ros., Hardy, and especially Locke, "as evident from the whole ch., especially v. 1, 4, 6." But Estius, Crell., Sch., Kop., Mid., and partly Mackn., think he addresses all Christians, and means law universally. Kop. strenuously maintains, that any law is meant, including, of course, the Mosaic, which he acknowledges is especially adverted to in this ch. ['Law, in this v. seems used generally.' Hodge.] BLOOMF.

(4.) 'Thus, my brethren, ye also have become dead. . . in order that ye should be joined to another who is risen,' &c. St. 'Now ye Jewish Christians being dead by baptism, (6 3, 4.) the bond between you and the Mosaic law is broken. . . "So that now ye are another's," i. e. "are no longer subject to the dead and abrogated law, but are immediately added unto Christ." The church also is compared to a spouse, at 2 Cor. 11:2. Eph. 5:49.' Ros.

state, under the reigning power of sin and corruption; our desire was to sin, as that of the wife to her husband, and sin ruled over us; we embraced it, loved it, devoted all to it, conversed daily with it, made it our care to please it; we were under a law of sin and death, and the product of this marriage was fruit brought forth unto death, i. e. actual transgressions were produced by the original corruptions, such as deserve death. This comes of the motions of sin working in our members. And this continues during life, while the law is alive to us, and we to the law.

II. Our second marriage is to Christ: and how comes that about? Why,

1. We are freed, by death, from our obligation to the law as a covenant, as the wife is from her obligation to her husband, v. 3. This application is not very close, nor needed it to be, v. 4. Ye are become dead to the law, He does not say, 'The law is dead;' some think, because he would avoid giving offence to those who were yet zealous for the law; but, which comes all to one, Ye are dead to the law. We are delivered from the law, v. 6. we are nulled as to the law; our obligation to it is made void. And then he speaks of the law being dead, as far as it was an imprisoned law to us, that being dead wherein we were held; not the law itself, but its obligation to punishment, and its provocation to sin, that is dead, it has lost its power; and this, v. 4. by the body of Christ, i. e. by the sufferings of Christ in his body, crucified, which abrogated the law, answered the demands of it, made satisfaction for our violation of it, purchased for us a covenant of grace, in which righteousness and strength are laid up for us, such as were not, nor could be, by the law. We are dead to the law, by our union with the mystical body of Christ; by being incorporated into Christ in our baptism professedly, in our believing powerfully and effectually, we are dead to the law, have no more to do with it than the dead servant, that is free from his master, hath to do with his master's yoke.

2. We are married to Christ. The day of our believing, is the day of our espousals to the Lord Jesus. Married to another, even to Him who is raised from the dead; a periphrasis of Christ, very pertinent here; for as our dying to sin and the law is in conformity to the death of Christ, and the cru-cifying of his body; so our devotedness to Christ in newness of life, is in conformity to the resurrection of Christ. Comp. 2 Cor. 11:2. Eph. 5:29 Now the great end of this is, our fruitfulness in love, and grace, and every good work. That is fruit unto God, pleasing to God, according to his will, aiming at his glory. Whatever our professions and pretensions be, there is no fruit brought forth to God, till then; it is in Christ Jesus that we are created unto good works, Eph. 2:10. This distinguishes the good works of believers, from the good works of hypocrites and self-justifiers, Col. 3:17. Without controversy, this is one of the great mysteries of godliness.

(1.) That we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, v. 6. Being married to a new husband, we must change our way. Still we must serve, but it is a service that is perfect freedom, whereas the service of sin was a perfect drudgery: we must now serve in newness of spirit, by new spiritual rules, from new spiritual principles, in the spirit, and in truth, John 4:24. There must be a renovation of our spirits, wrought by the Spirit of God, and in that we must serve.

(2.) Not in the oldness of the letter; we must not rest in mere external services, as the carnal Jews did, and minded not the spiritual part of worship. The letter is said to kill with its bondage and terror, but we are delivered from that yoke, that we might serve God without fear, in holiness and righteousness, Luke 1:74, 75. We are under the dispensation of the Spirit, and therefore must be spiritual, and serve in the Spirit. Comp. 2 Cor. 3:3, 6, &c. It becomes us to worship within the veil, and no longer in the outward court.

V. 7-14. To what he had said in the former paragraph, the apostle here raises an objection, which he answers very fully; What shall we say then? Is the law sin? When he had been speaking of the dominion of sin, he had said so much of the influence of the law as a covenant on that dominion, that it might easily be misinterpreted as a reflection on the law; to prevent which he shows from his own experience, the great excellency and usefulness of the law, not as a covenant, but as a guide; and further discovers how sin took occasion by the commandment.

V. 5, 6. 'Some of "the works of the flesh do not require the members of our body," . . . but only the faculties of our minds, for their performance.' Locke. SCOTT.

(5.) 'Grot. truly remarks, that few under the law were spiritual; most were carnal, having little or no hope of another life, and therefore given up to the cares and pleasures of this. The strongest confirmation of this, I add, may be found in the facts recorded by their great historian [Jos.], and the confessions of their equally great moralist and philosopher [Philo].—Chrys. and Theoph. observe, that the blame of sin is laid on the passions, not the members. For, add they, "the soul is like a harper, and the members are the harp: if the harper plays badly, the harp sounds ill." Bl. 'V. 5. here is the theme of discussion through vs. 7-25; while v. 6. (the antithesis of v. 5.) constitutes the theme of 8:1-11. which is in all important respects the antithesis of 7:7-25.' St. Also Kuapp, Tholuck, Flatt, &c. EN.

(5, 6.) Motions of sins.] 'A Heb. expression, signifying "the sinful affections, lusts, passions, and evil propensities of our corrupt nature." Bloomf. 'Our sinful passions . . . wrought powerfully, &c., but now we are freed from the law by which we were held in bondage, inasmuch as we have become dead to it; so that we must serve (God) in newness of spirit, and not in the old and literal manner.' St. I. e. 'according to a new and spiritual mode, not in the old and literal one.' Bl. Held.] 'As in stocks.' STUART.

(5-25.) Since many regard the psychological system of the phrenologists as most helpful to explain the apostle's language, it is added at the end of the ch. The reader will consult with profit the discussions hence arising, in Stuart's Com. on Rom. comparing with Hodge. Ed.

V. 7, 8. It might be objected to the above statement, that if those who were under the law inevitably remained the slaves of sin, and if none could serve God in newness of spirit, till they were 'dead to the law,' and it to them; surely 'the law' and 'sin' were in reality the same: and would not this cast a vile aspersion on the holy law of God? 1-4. 5:20, 21.—In particular, the apostle observes, that, by his natural conscience without the law, he should not have known that 'lust,' or coveting, was sinful: he should not have supposed, that, while free from adultery, theft, or murder, [&c.] the desire of a forbidden indulgence, or an object withheld by Providence, was criminal, even so criminal as to expose him to the curse of the law. Ex. 20:17. Mat. 5:27, 28. That man has no deep knowledge of human nature, or the perverse wickedness of his own heart, who does not observe, or is not conscious, of this irrational propensity, to fancy that there is something exquisitely pleasurable, in what

8 But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law, sin was dead.

9 For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.

10 And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death.

11 For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me.

1 Eze. 20:11, &c.

I. The great excellency of the law in itself. Far be it from Paul to reflect on the law.

1. It is holy, just, and good, v. 12. The law in general is so, every particular commandment is so; laws are as the law-makers are; God, the great Lawgiver, is holy, just, and good, therefore his law must needs be so: it is holy, as being agreeable to the holy will of God, the original of holiness; just, as consonant to the rules of equity and right reason; and good, as given for the good of mankind. Wherever there is true grace, there is an assent to this,—that the law is holy, just, and good.

2. The law is spiritual, v. 14. not only in regard of the effect of it, as it is a mean of making us spiritual; but in regard of the extent of it, it reaches our spirits, [our thoughts and desires.] Heb. 4:12. it forbids spiritual wickedness, it commands spiritual service. It is spiritual, as given by God, who is a Spirit, and the Father of spirits; and given to man, whose principal part is spiritual; herein it is above all other laws. Other laws cannot take cognizance, unless there be some overt act; but the law of God takes notice of the iniquity regarded in the heart, though it go no further. Wash thy heart from wickedness, Jer. 4:14. Farther, wherever there is true grace, there is an experimental knowledge (we know, v. 14.) of the spirituality of the law of God.

II. The great advantage he had found by the law.

1. It was discovering, v. 7. As that which is straight discovers that which is crooked, as the looking-glass shows us our natural face, with all its spots and deformities; so there is no way of coming to that knowledge of sin which is necessary to repentance, and consequently to peace and pardon, but by comparing our hearts and lives with the law. Particularly, he came to the knowledge of the sinfulness of lust, by the law of the tenth commandment: the law spake in other language than the Scribes and Pharisees made it to speak in; it spake in the spiritual sense and meaning. By this, he knew that lust [inordinate desire] is sin, and very sinful; that those motions and desires of the heart toward sin, which never came into act, are sinful, exceeding sinful. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind, than about original corruption, concerning which the understanding is altogether in the dark, till the Spirit by the law reveal it, and make it known. We never see the desperate venom and malignity there are in sin, till we come to compare it with the law, and the spiritual nature of the law, and then we see it to be an evil and a bitter thing.

2. It was humbling, v. 19. he thought himself in a very good condition, was alive in his own opinion and apprehension; very secure and confident of the goodness of his state. Thus he was once, in times past, and the reason was, he was then without the law. He had the letter, but not the spiritual meaning; the shell, but not the kernel. He had the law in his hand, in his head, but not in his heart; the notion of it, but not the power of it. Many are so, and it is their strangeness to the law, that is the cause of the mistake. But when the commandment came, came in the power of it, sin revived, as the dust in a room rises, i. e. appears, when the sunshine is let into it. Paul then saw that in sin which he had never seen before; he then saw sin in its causes, the bitter root, the corrupt bias, the bent to backslide; sin in its colors, deforming, defiling, breaking a righteous law, affronting an awful Majesty, profaning a Sovereign crown by casting it to the ground; sin in its consequences, sin with death at the heels of it, sin and the curse entailed upon it.

Of this excellent use is the law, it is a lamp and a light, it converts the soul, opens the eyes, prepares the way of the Lord in the desert, rends the rocks, levels the mountains, makes ready a people prepared for the Lord.

III. The ill use his corrupt nature made of the law notwithstanding.

1. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence, v. 8. Observe, Paul, though one of the best unregenerate men that ever was, as touching the righteousness of the law, blameless, was yet sensible of all manner of concupiscence. And it was sin that wrought it, is out of our reach, or prohibited. Indeed it seems natural to expect, that it would be so with the posterity of those, who could be satisfied with no fruit in the garden of God, except that which He had forbidden. We readily observe this propensity in others, especially in our children; though perhaps self-love may make us blind to it in ourselves.—Thus the spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law, excite the depravity of the heart by their contrariety to it; as the alkali produces an effervescence by its contrariety to the acid; and so the heart rises in blasphemous enmity to the law, and rushes more impetuously into transgression.—In what sense can this be applied to the ceremonial law, the ordinances of which a carnal mind might readily comply with, provided their relation to the gospel were not perceived? Does the tenth commandment belong to the ceremonial law? Where is the marked transition, from the ceremonial to the moral law, to be found in this discussion? Is not the apostle evidently throughout illustrating one proposition; namely, that 'those who are under the law are slaves to sin?' The inconsistency of expositors, who set out with confining the meaning to the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; and then glide, either imperceptibly to themselves, or at least without hinting it to their readers, to the most spiritual precept of the moral law, must be obvious to every attentive student: and the perplexity which arises from this source is inexpressible.—It is surprising to me, that the learned Mr. Locke, and some others after him, should make the sense of the passage to be, "without the law," (meaning the law given by Moses,) "sin is dead," not able to hurt me; or, without the law of Moses, which annexes death to transgression, sin is as good as dead, is not able to have its will against me, and bring death upon me. For this is contrary to the apostle's peremptory assertions, that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin;" "that sin was in the world until," or all along before, "the law;" and that "death reigned from Adam to Moses." (5:12—14.) How then could it be said, that sin was not able to hurt the apostle, or to bring death on him, or on any other Jew, without the law of Moses: since "it had reigned unto death" so many hundred years before that law was given; and we are told, that the very heathens, who had only the law of nature, knew the judgment of God, that the transgressors of that law were worthy of death? Rom. 1:32. Guise. Scott.

(7.) 'Still, I had not known sin except by the law; for I had not known even inordinate desire, [and what desire, or degree of it, was to be accounted by God and by myself inordinate? Ed.] unless the law had said: "Thou shalt not lust." St. Photinus, (Ecum., [the most ancient fathers, St.] and the best modern contrs. are agreed, that Paul here, and to the end of the ch., is not speaking in his own person, or of his own case, but assumes that of human nature; [but see Scott, seq.] to avoid offence to the Jews.' Bl.: and see Stuart's Exc. VI. All men, however, have moral perceptions, and conversion regulates and controls but does not annihilate any primitive faculty or instinct. Ed.

(8.) Concupiscence.] 'Inordinate desire. Was.] Is' St. The Gr. epithumia, here tr. lust, at v. 7. signifies a strong desire of any kind; and is used in a good sense; (see on Luke 22 15.) or in a general but evil sense, Gal. 5:16. Eph. 2:3. 1 Pet. 4:2, 3.' Sc. 'By sin is here meant, the propensity to sin, and that even involuntary, as 9, 15, the lamentable perversity of inclination incident to human nature, and so unequivocally acknowledged even by the heathen writers.' Bl. Philo compares these desires to a tiger, or other wild beast; so Livy speaks of 'luxury, (sensuality,) as a fierce beast, irritated by its very chains;' moralists still use the expressions, 'animal propensities,' 'animalism;' and we all experience in a greater or less degree how restraint, or a rule which fixes our thoughts to them and their objects, operates to increase their force. Prayer, which quiets their action by leading the thoughts far away, and excites the other and higher nature, is the best remedy; for we have the precept, 'Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.' Ed.

V. 9—12. It seems evident, that the apostle in these vs., and in the subsequent part of the ch., spoke literally of himself, and his own experience. If he personated another man, why did he not give some intimation of his design? In another place he fairly brought forward the Jew; 2:17—29. and ambiguity is no characteristic of his writings. Indeed, I apprehend, that the more humble and spiritual any Christian is, the more clearly will he perceive, that the apostle describes the experience of the true believer, from his first convictions, to his greatest progress in grace during this present imperfect state. His avowed object is to show, that the law can do nothing for a sinner, either to justify or sanctify him; and that the believer feels this daily, as long as he lives. 'I was,' says he, 'alive, without the law once;' he was once a Pharisee, ignorant of the spirituality of the law, and, . . . having some general decency of character, without any acquaintance with his inward depravity, he concluded that his heart and life were good, and that he was in a state of acceptance with God. But when 'the commandment came' to his conscience, by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and he perceived its righteous and extensive requirements, and its severe denunciations; he found the sinful propensities of his heart, which before seemed dormant, rise against it; and every endeavor to fulfil its precepts, showed him more plainly his inability to do it. Thus his former hopes died away; he found himself a helpless sinner, under merited condemnation, and became as a dead man, except as the Gospel revived him from despondency. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Thus the law, which was originally ordained to life for holy creatures, and from which, he, though a sinner, had expected heaven, was 'found to be unto death:' even as the law of any country, which secures the lives of honest men, is 'found to be unto death' by the murderer or robber.—The ceremonial law was not 'ordained unto life,' except as it pointed out Christ, the Substance of its shadows; and it was found unto death by none, but those who made it an appendix to the covenant of works, and rejected Christ for the sake of it: and this perfectly coincides with the interpretation above given.—Sin, the corruption of fallen nature, being averse to the holy strictness of the moral law, by its extreme deceitfulness, seduced Paul into various transgressions, and thus slew all his self-righteous hopes, and actually brought him under deeper condemnation. Not that the law caused this, or even gave any just occasion for it: but 'sin took occasion' from it; as a wicked man takes occasion from a pious discourse, or a friendly admonition, to scoff, blaspheme, or rage the more. Prov. 9:7—9. 23:9. Mat. 7:6. Acts 18:1—6. The whole law must therefore be allowed to be perfectly holy, the transcript of the divine character; and each commandment most 'holy,' at the utmost distance from moral evil; most 'just,' as requiring nothing more than what is righteously due to God and our neighbors; and most 'good,' as tending to the true welfare of ourselves, our families, the community, and all mankind: so that the universal observance of it would almost annihilate the evils of the world, and convert earth into heaven. Ex. 20:1, 17. Ps. 19:7—11. Gal. 3:19—22. 1 Tim. 1:8—11.—The apostle never passes such eulogiums on the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation: they had a temporary fitness and goodness; but they 'made nothing perfect,' and consisted of 'carnal ordinances,' which continued in force 'till the time of reformation,' and no longer. Heb. 9:8—10. Scott.

(9.) 'To say that sin was dead, and to say that I was alive, is saying the same thing, as to sentiment; for wherever sin lives the man dies [and vice versa], as the sequel of the v. clearly shows.' Stuart.

(10.) 'But I died; yea, the commandment which was unto life, the very same was found to be death to me.' St. 'This law may be said to 12 Wherefore the law <sup>m</sup> is holy ; and the commandment holy, and just, and good.

13 Was then that which is good made death unto me ? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good ; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful.

14 For we know that the law is spiritual : but I am carnal, sold <sup>n</sup> under sin.

15 For that which I do, I <sup>o</sup> allow not : for what I would, that do I not ; but what I hate, that do I.

indwelling sin, his corrupt nature ; (he speaks of a sin that did work sin ;) and it took occasion by the commandment. The corrupt nature would not have swelled and raged so much, if it had not been for the restraints of the law ; it is incident to corrupt nature, in vetitum niti,—to lean towards what is forbidden. Ever since Adam ate forbidden fruit, we have all been fond of forbidden paths ; the diseased appetite is carried out most strongly toward that which is hurtful and prohibited. Without the law sin was dead, as a snake in winter, when the sunbeams of the law quicken and irritate.

2. It deceived me. Sin puts a cheat on the sinner, a fatal cheat, v. 11. By it, by the commandment, slew me. There being in the law no such express threatening against sinful lustings, sin, i. e. his own corrupt nature, took occasion from thence to promise him impunity, and to say, as the serpent to our first parents, Ye shall not surely die. Thus it deceived and slew him.

3. It wrought death in me by that which is good, v. 13. That which works concupis-cence, works death, for sin bringeth forth death. Nothing so good but a corrupt and vicious nature will pervert it, and make it an occasion of sin ; no flower so sweet, but it will suck poison out of it. Now in this, sin appears sin. The worst thing sin does, and most like itself, is the perverting of the law, and taking occasion from it to be so much the more malignant.

Thus the commandment, which was ordained to life—was intended as a guide in the way to comfort and happiness, proved unto death, through the corruption of nature, v. 10. Many a precious soul splits upon the rock of salvation. And the same Word which to some is an occasion of life unto life, is, to others, an occasion of death unto death. The same sun that makes the garden of flowers more fragrant, makes the dunghill more noisome : the same heat that softens wax, hardens clay ; and the same Child was set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel. The way to prevent this mischief, is, to bow our souls to the commanding authority of the word and law of God, not striving against, but submitting to it.

V. 14—25. Here is a description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, applicable two ways ; I. To the struggles in a convinced soul, but yet unregenerate : in the person of whom it is supposed, by some, Paul speaks. II. To struggles in a renewed, sanctified soul, but yet in a state of imperfection, as others apprehend.

I. Applying it to the struggles in a convinced soul, yet in a state of sin, that knows his Lord's will but does it not, approves the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law, and yet lives in the constant breach of it, ch. 2:17—23. though he has that within him that witnesses against the sin he commits, and it is not without great reluctancy he does commit it ; the superior faculties striving against it, natural conscience warning against it before it is committed, and smiting for it afterward, yet the man continues a slave to his reigning lusts.*

It is not thus with every unregenerate man, but with those only that are convinced by the law, but not changed by the gospel. The apostle had said, ch. 6:14. That sin shall not have dominion, because ye are not under the law, but under grace. For the proof of which, he here shows that a man under the law, and not under grace, may be, and is, under the dominion of sin ; the law may discover sin, and convince of sin, but it cannot conquer and subdue sin, witness the predominancy of sin [a selfish propensity] in many that are under very strong legal convictions : it may make him feel the burden of sin, Mat. 11:28. but cannot relieve him ; Christ only can do that. It may make a man cry out, O wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me ? and yet leave him thus fettered and captivated, as being too weak to deliver him, ch. 8:3. give him a spirit of bondage to fear, ch. 8:15. Now a soul, advanced thus far by the law, is in a fair way towards a state of liberty by Christ ; though many rest here, and go no further, as Felix. A man may go to hell with his eyes open, Num. 24:3, 4. illuminated with common convictions ; and carry about with him a self-accusing conscience, even in the service of the devil ; he may consent to the law, that it is good ; delight to know God's ways, as they, Is. 58:2. may have that within him, that witnesses against sin, and for holiness ; and yet all this overpowered by the reigning love of sin. Drunkards, [misers, gluttons, cruel, quarrelsome, selfish, malicious, proud, or] unclean persons, have some faint desires to leave off their sins, and yet persist in them notwithstanding, such are the impotency and insufficiency of their convictions.

Of such as these many will needs have all this understood, and contend earnestly for it : though it is very hard to imagine why, have been intended for life, though by sin made the occasion of death ; as medicines which, not being rightly applied, prove fatal, may nevertheless be said to have been intended for cure.

(12.) Holy . . . just . . . good.] Hagios . . . dikaios . . . agathos . . . hagios, like the Latin sanctus, is an epithet especially appropriated to law, and signifies what may justly claim reverence. Dikaios signifies just in itself, and is here employed to denote, that the law is not the cause of the misery of those who violate it. As to agathē, it signifies calculated for good ; and all this by the eternal rule of right [i. e. God's will].

V. 13. Wholesome food, or a valuable medicine, through a diseased state of the body, or when taken improperly, may 'occasion' death, contrary to its general and proper tendency : but poison kills, as a cause, by its native efficacy. The law may occasion death through man's depravity ; but sin is the poison that causes death. Thus through the commandment 'sin became exceeding sinful ; i. e. the odious and ruinous nature of sin, as well as the sinfulness of the human heart, were most clearly shown ; in order that the abounding grace of God might appear the more glorious.

Just like a disorder, which, when it has become worse, may be said to display, by means of the medical art, its malignity, as not being removed even by that.
THEOPH.
BLOOMF.

V. 14. The apostle here proceeds to confirm his position. 'We know,' says he, and allow, 'that the law is spiritual,' . . . and allows of nothing but what is done from the most pure and sublime motives, and in perfect love, zeal, gratitude, and delight. Compared with this most holy rule of conduct, the apostle found that he was 'carnal, sold under sin ;' his nature was perfectly opposite to this spiritual law ; and, even after all his attainments in grace, he found himself so very far short of this perfection, and in every respect so unable to attain to it, though he ardently aspired after it ; that he seemed comparatively to be 'carnal,' and like a man who is sold against his will to a hated master, from whom he can by no means set himself at liberty. (M. R. q-s.)—Numbers cannot conceive, that Paul could mean this of himself as a confirmed believer ; and, finding it to be inseparably connected with what follows, they would explain the whole of an awakened Jew, or some other convinced sinner, who is seeking justification by the 'works of the law ;' or at most an unconfirmed believer. But such things are spoken, as are true of none but real Christians ; and the whole is actually verified in their experience. Every believer is 'carnal' in exact proportion to the degree, in which he falls short of perfect conformity to the law of God : and he indignantly and reluctantly thus far serves an abhorred master ; yet cannot shake off the galling chain, till his powerful and gracious Friend comes to rescue him from it. . . . As the apostle was far more enlightened and humble than Christians in general are, doubtless this clog was more uneasy to him, than it is to them ; though most of us find our lives at times greatly embittered by it. So that this energetic language, which many imagine to describe an unestablished believer's experience, or even that of an unconverted person, seems to have resulted from the extraordinary degree of Paul's sanctification, and the depth of his self-abasement and hatred of sin ; and the reason of our not readily understanding him seems to be, because we are so far beneath him in holiness, humility, acquaintance with the spirituality of God's law, and the evil of our own hearts, and in our degree of abhorrence of moral evil. In the former part of the ch., the apostle had spoken in the past tense, 'I was alive, &c.' (9) but here he uses the present, to which he uniformly adheres in what follows. Thus in another place he says, 'What things were gain to me, these I counted loss for Christ ; yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, &c.' Phil. 3:1—11. vv. 7—9. Some, indeed, suppose the transition from the experience of the apostle, under his first convictions, to his subsequent conflict with indwelling sin, to be made at the next v. ; but the change of tense in this place does not admit of that construction.—In the very same ch. in which our Lord pronounces Peter 'blessed,' as a believer, he says, 'Thou savorest not the things that be of God. but those that be of men :' Mat. 16:17—23. i. e. thou art 'carnal,' not totally, but in a considerable degree. Humbly to confess, and deeply to lament, that we are thus 'carnal and sold under sin,' is very far indeed from the disposition and conduct of the willing slave to his lusts ; and the readiness with which numbers of the most eminent believers adopt the apostle's language, shows that it is very suitable to their strong feelings of abhorrence of sin, and of self-abasement. 'I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' Job 1:1. 42:1—9. P. O. 1—6 'Woe is me ! for I am undone : for I am a man of unclean lips.' Is. 6:5. P. O. 1—8. 'My soul cleaveth unto the dust.' Ps. 119:25. 'Surely I am more brutish than any man !' Prov. 30:2, 3.—Indeed all the complaints of the prevalence of sin, and all the longings and pantings after holiness, and all the earnest cries for pardon, teaching, quickening grace which pervade the book of Psalms, especially Ps. 119. are entirely coincident with this complaint of the apostle, and arise precisely from the same source ; a 'delight in the law of God ;' and a painful consciousness of great remaining want of conformity to it. Ps. 119:5. Mat. 5:6.—Sold under sin.] Mat. 18:25, et al.—1 S. 23:7. 1 K. 21:25. Is. 50:1. 52:3. Sept. 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 17, 20, 23.—In all these texts with the article, 'the sin, which dwelleth in us,' and which the apostle speaks of as a person, or agent, is evidently intended.

SCOTT.

V. 15—17. The apostle here begins more particularly to enlarge on the conflict he daily maintained with the remainder of his original depravity. He earnestly desired, and fully determined, if possible, to perform a perfect obedience to the law of God ; but he continually fell short of this : and, while he 'hated' and abhorred every kind and degree of sin, he found it impracticable wholly to avoid committing it in work, or word, or thought. In thus doing what he 'hated,' and desired above all things to shun, he 'consented to the law, that it was good ;' and as the prevailing bias of the soul was to holiness, he was evidenced by it to be a regenerate man, under the covenant of grace ; so that it would not be laid to his charge, in the day of judgment, that he did the evil which he hated, but it would be placed to the account of 'the sin, 16 If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law, that it is good.

17 Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

18 For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not.

19 For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.

20 Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

p Ge. 6:5.

q Ga. 5:17.

if the apostle intended this, he should speak all along in his own person; and not only so, but in the present tense. Of his own state under conviction he had spoken at large, as of a thing past, v. 7, &c. I DIED; the commandment I FOUND to be unto death; and if here he speaks of the same state as his present state, and the condition he was now in, surely he did not intend to be so understood: therefore,

II. It seems rather to be understood of the struggles between grace and corruption, in sanctified souls. That there are remainders of indwelling corruption, even there where there is a living principle of grace, is past dispute; that that corruption is daily breaking forth in sins of infirmity, (such as are consistent with a state of grace,) is no less certain. If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, 1 John 1:8, 10. That true grace strives against these sins and corruptions, does not allow of them, hates them, mourns over them, groans under them as a burden, is likewise certain, Gal. 5:17. These are the truths which, I think, are here contained. And the apostle's design is further to open the nature of sanctification, that it does not attain to a sinless perfection in which dwelt in him, as a detested inmate, and which he was not able to expel, though not willing to obey it. Ps. 66:18, 19. 119:113. Phil. 3:12-14. The apostle certainly did not mean to excuse his sinfulness, as if he might not justly have been condemned for it: but to show that 'righteousness could' in no case 'be by the law;' and that, by the grace of the gospel, a man's state and character are determined, according to what habitually prevails in his heart and life; notwithstanding impediments and restraints. A wicked man feels some inward opposition to his crimes, from conscience, fear, or shame, [&c.] and he meets with various obstacles to the gratification of his desires: yet all this is accounted for nothing, while sin habitually prevails in his heart and conduct, and he does not hate it. Ps. 36:3, 4. A godly man has great hindrances in his holy progress, from indwelling sin and outward temptation: yet this is not imputed to him for condemnation, seeing the prevailing state of his heart and tenor of his conduct are holy. Thus Judas, in betraying Christ, acted in character, according to the habitual, though concealed, state of his heart; it was 'Judas that did it;' but Peter, through sudden temptation, acted out of character, and contrary to the habitual state of his heart, in denying Christ; it was 'not he, but the sin that dwelt in him;' i. e. according to the gracious tenor of the new covenant. Sc.

Most assuredly the want of this intellectual and moral liberty is one of the most striking features of spiritual bondage. Such was the fate of all who lived before the Gospel, [and of the heathen now,] and such is that of all regenerate persons under it.'

V. 18-21. The apostle 'knew, that in him,' as a fallen creature, apart from regenerating grace, 'no good thing,' but sin and only sin was found; though its actings were more specious at one time than another. Gen. 6:5. Jer. 17:9, 10. Mat. 15:15-20. It is evident from the limitation, 'that is, in my flesh,' that he spoke as a believer, who had grace, as well as 'sin dwelling in him:' for by 'flesh,' in this connexion, he does not mean the body as distinct from the soul, but 'the old man,' or unregenerate human nature, as the subsequent parts of the argument fully prove; and this nature,* derived from fallen Adam, never concurs with this life: and therefore to quicken us to, and encourage us in, our conflicts with remaining corruptions; our case is not singular, that which we do sincerely strive against, shall not be laid to our charge; and through grace the victory is sure at last. Understanding it thus, observe,

1. What he complains of; the remainder of indwelling corruptions; to show that the law is insufficient to justify even a regenerate man, that the best man in the world hath enough in him to condemn him, if God should deal with him according to the law; which is not the fault of the law, but of our own corrupt nature, which cannot fulfil the law. The repetition of the same things over and over again in this discourse, shows how much Paul's heart was affected with what he wrote, and how deep his sentiments were. Particularly,

(1.) I am carnal, sold under sin, v. 14. He speaks of the Corinthians as carnal, 1 Cor. 3:1. Even there where there is spiritual life, there are remainders of carnal affections, and a man may be so far sold under sin; he does not sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did, 1 K. 21:25. but he was sold by Adam when he sinned and fell; sold, as a poor slave that does his master's will, against his own will; sold under sin, because conceived in iniquity, and born in sin.

(2.) What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I, v. 15. And to the same purport, v. 19, 21. Such was the strength of corruptions, that he could not reach at that perfection in holiness which he did [conceive of] desire and breathe after. Thus, while he was pressing forward toward perfection, yet he acknowledges he had not already attained, neither was already perfect, Phil. 3:12. Fain he would be free from all sin, and perfectly do the will of God, such was his settled judgment; but his corrupt nature drew him another way; it was like a clog, that checked and kept him down when he would have soared upward; like the bias in a bowl, which, when it is thrown straight, yet draws it aside.

(3.) In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good, v. 18. Here he explains himself concerning the corrupt nature, which he calls flesh; as far as that goes, there is no good to be expected; any more than one would expect good corn growing on a rock, or on the sand by the seaside. As the new nature, as far as that goes, cannot commit sin, 1 John 3:9. so the flesh, the old nature, as far as that goes, cannot perform a good duty. How should it? For the flesh serveth the law of sin, v. 25. it is under the conduct and government of that law; and while it is so, it is not like to do any good. The corrupt nature is elsewhere called flesh, Gen. 6:3. John 3:6. and though there may be good things dwelling in those that have this flesh, yet, as far as the flesh goes, there is no good, the flesh is not a subject capable of any good.

(4.) I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, v. 23. The corrupt and sinful inclination is here compared to a law, because it controlled and checked him in his good motions. It is said to be seated in his members; because Christ having set up his throne in his heart, it was only the rebellious members of the body that were the instruments of sin. In the sensitive appetite, [the lower, selfish, or the animal propensities,] or we may take it more generally, for all that corrupt nature which is the seat not only of sensual but of more refined lusts. This wars against the law of the mind, the [higher, impulsive sentiments, enlightened and inspired, the] new nature; it draws the contrary way, drives on a contrary interest; which corrupt disposition and inclination are as great a burden and grief to the soul, as the worst drudgery and captivity could be. It brings me into captivity. To the same purport. v. 25.

(5.) His general complaint we have, v. 24. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The thing he complains of, is, a body of death; either the body of flesh, which is a mortal, dying body, or the body of sin, the old man, the corrupt nature, which tends to death; or, the Holy Spirit in regeneration, or with the new man afterwards, but always strives against both. 5, 6. 8:1-13. John 3:6. Gal. 5:6-18. The apostle became more deeply acquainted with this humiliating truth by his experience subsequent to conversion, than he had been before. Formerly he perhaps supposed, that a little good disposition, or moral ability to holiness, was in man; but this was now experimentally disproved. He was obliged, contrary to his habitually prevalent inclinations, to live under a sort of necessity of being sinful; and he could only persist in maintaining the conflict with his inward enemies, without being able entirely to extirpate them. Ps. 119:5. 2 Cor. 7:1. For, indeed, he found, by painful experience, that there was 'a law' imposed on him, in his present state of warfare, that when he was most desirous of 'doing good, evil was present with him,' to interrupt, [aggrieve,] buffet, discourage, and defile him.—Let any man who knows his own heart, and the spirituality of the law of God, compare his actual conduct, comprising his thoughts, motives, affections, words, and works, during any given time, with his purposes, prevailing desires, and earnest, persevering prayers: let him take that one duty, which he especially aims to perform most perfectly, or that wrong temper, or evil propensity, which he most longs to rectify or extinguish; let him examine himself very exactly in these respects every night; and he will surely find, that he cannot but be a sinner still, and subjected to 'a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him.' God has wise reasons for permitting this to be so, especially to give us a deeper sense of the malignity of sin, and our own deep depravity, in order to commend the grace of the Gospel; but those who are most acquainted with the excellency of the law, and most diligently aim in everything to obey it, will be most deeply conscious that the case is actually thus with them, whatever their opinion may be of those, whom they suppose to be more eminent Christians.—This opposition to sin, however, though in a measure unsuccessful; and this humiliating and distressing disappointment, respecting the object of their most ardent desires, must not be confounded with the willing slavery of sin, and the convenient excuse of indwelling depravity. The apostle 'daily exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man;' and could call others to witness, 'how holily, and justly, and unblameably, he had behaved among them.' Yet this was not inconsistent with his being deeply humbled in the sight of God, by the consciousness of wandering thoughts in prayer, want of fervor, of love and gratitude to God, of zeal for his glory, and of enlarged good-will to men; the rising of evil tempers, the intrusion of vain imaginations, and the intermixture of selfish motives. 24:10-21, v. 16. 1 Thes. 2:9-12. All these are 'sin,' and as such hated and abhorred, in proportion to the degree of a man's sanctification: Ps. 119:113. yet no mere man on earth, after all possible diligence, watchfulness, fasting, and prayer, could truly say, that, in these respects, he was perfectly free from sin, in his worship and obedience. So that, even the person who is not conscious of at any time neglecting one duty, or committing one actual transgression, in word or deed, (which is at least a most uncommon case,) yet, 21 I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me.

22 For I delight in the law of God after the inward man :

23 But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.

24 O wretched man that I am ! who shall deliver me from the body of this death ?

comparing it to a dead body, the touch of which was by the ceremonial law defiling. If actual transgressions be dead works, Heb. 9:14. original corruption is a dead body. It was as troublesome to Paul, as if he had had a dead body tied to him, which he must have carried about with him. A man that had learned in every state to be content, yet complains thus of his corrupt nature. Had I been to have spoken of Paul, I should have said, 'O blessed man that thou art, an ambassador of Christ, a favorite of heaven, a spiritual father of thousands !' But in his own account he was a wretched man, because of the corruption of nature, because he was not so good as he felt would be. Who shall deliver me ? He speaks like one sick of it, that would give anything to be rid of it; looks to the right hand and to the left for some friend, that would part between him and his corruptions. The remainders of aspiring to be holy as an angel, or as Jesus Christ was, will very painfully feel, that 'he doeth not the things that he would;' and will 'find a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him;' and the more spiritual the services are in which he engages, the greater clog and hindrance it will be to him. Had the apostle intended to describe the case of any of those, however distinguished, who habitually live in sin, against the conviction of their own judgment and conscience; it cannot be conceived, that he would not, with his usual concise energy, have reprobated their conduct, as far more aggravated, than that of ignorant and thoughtless transgressors; but nothing of this kind appears; on the contrary, he leads on the character, which he is describing, to exultation and joy in believing. (Notes, 22-25. 8:1 2.)—(21) A law. 23, 25, 8:2.—Men, in various respects, do those things voluntarily; which yet they are very reluctant to do, and perhaps previously had resolved not to do. Thus Homer, 'I indeed willingly gave unto thee, but with an unwilling mind.' This unwilling willingness pervades a great proportion of human actions. 'I really could not refuse him.'—'I could not, as I was circumstanced, do otherwise.' So that free-agency and responsibility still remain the same, notwithstanding this 'law, that when we would do good, evil is present with us.'

(18.) 'For, to desire what is good, is easy for me, but to do it I find difficult.' St. Yet this tr. seems hardly an improvement; nor the placing of 'desire,' for 'will' and 'would' in vs. 15-21.

(21.) 'I find, then, that it is a law [note, v. 25.] to me, when desirous to do good, that evil is near to me.' St. Law. 'Nomos: here has the laxer sense of norma, dictamen; a term not inapplicable to the impetus animi humani, (and so used, v. 23. and 8:2.) and so employed from its resemblance to the force by which laws excite and impel men to action. Now this impetus is represented as driving the disposition to do evil, when the will is disposed to do good. Here, then, the sense seems to be: "I experience this impulse of contrary action, that when I would do good evil is at hand, is ready, and besets me." BLOOMER.

V. 22-25. By 'the inward man,' the apostle must mean the soul, as renewed by divine grace. He alone uses the term; and he uses it concerning believers only. 2:25-29. 2 Cor. 4:13-18, v. 16. Eph. 3:14-19, v. 16. The affections and faculties of the soul in fallen man, are more opposite to the law of God, than the bodily appetites, nay, the latter are not sinful, except as improperly gratified through the lusts of the heart. 6:12, 13, 16-19. Gal. 5:16-21. Jam. 1:13-15. But to approve, and even 'delight in, the law of God,' according to the habitual judgment and affections of the soul, through a kind of spiritual sympathy, or congeniality of heart with its most strict and holy requirements, must be peculiar to the regenerate; nay, it must imply a high degree of sanctification. This the apostle had attained to; yet he 'found another law in his members,' the constituent parts of the old man, 6:5-7, which continually enjoined a conduct, or suggested inclinations, contrary to 'the law of his mind;' and this tended to 'bring him into captivity to the law of sin,' and in some cases for a time it produced that effect.—'So then,' says he, 'I myself with my mind,' my prevailing judgment, affections, and purposes, as a regenerate man, 'serve and obey the law of God;' but with the flesh, the carnal nature, the remains of depravity, 'I serve the law of sin,' or that 'law which wars against the law of my mind.' Before conversion, the whole man serves this law, with a very feeble opposition from conscience, fear, and shame [&c]; but, at length, the usurper is dethroned, and grace reigns in the heart. Yet still the usurper lurks in the kingdom, reigns over his own part, makes war, creates immense disturbance, and gains temporary advantages; but he is hated, opposed, proscribed, and shall die. Gal 5:22-26.—(22) De-indwelling sin are a very grievous burden to a gracious soul.

2. What he comforts himself with.

(1.) His conscience witnessed for him, that he had a good principle ruling and prevailing in him, notwithstanding. The rule of this good principle which he had, was, the law of God; his threefold regard to which he here speaks of; which is certainly to be found in all that are sanctified, and no others. [1.] I consent, give my vote, unto the law that it is good, v. 16. There is the approbation of the judgment. Wherever there is grace, there is not only a dread of the severity of the law, but a consent to the goodness of the law; it is good in itself, it is good for me. This is a sign that the law is written in the heart, that the soul is delivered to the mould of it. To consent to the law, is so far to approve of it as not to wish it otherwise constituted than it is. The sanctified judgment not only concurs to the equity of the law, but to the excellency of it, as convinced that a conformity to the law [obedience to all God's will] is the highest perfection of the human nature, and the greatest honor and happiness we are capable of. [2.] I delight in the law of God after the inward man, v. 22. His conscience bore witness to a complacency in the law. He delighted not only in the promises of the Word, but in the precepts and prohibitions of the Word; the Gr. word speaks a becoming delight. He did herein concur in affection with all the saints. All that are savingly regenerate, and born again, do truly delight in the law of God; delight to know it, to do it; cheerfully submit to the authority of it, and take a complacency in that submission; never better pleased than when heart and life are in the strictest conformity to the law and will of God. After the inward man; i. e. 1st. The mind or rational [and unselfish] faculties, in opposition to the sensitive appetites and wills of the flesh. The soul is the inward man, and that is the seat of gracious delights, which are therefore sincere and serious, but secret; it is the renewing of the inward man, 2 Cor. 4:16. 2dly. The new nature. The new man is called the inner man, Eph. 3:16. the hidden man of the heart, 1 Pet. 3:4. Paul, as far as he was sanctified, had a delight in the law of God. [3.] With the mind I myself serve the law of God, v. 25. It is not enough to consent to the law, and to delight in the law, but we must serve the law; our souls must be entirely delivered up into the obedience of it. Thus it is with every sanctified, renewed mind; that is the ordinary course and way; thitherward goes the bent of the soul, [the I myself.]

(2.) That the fault lay in that corruption of his nature, which he did really bewail and strive against; It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. This he mentions twice, v. 17, 20. not as an excuse for the guilt of his sin, but as a salvo for his evidences, that he might not sink in despair, but take comfort from the covenant of grace, which accepts the willingness of the Spirit, and has provided pardon for the weakness of the flesh. He likewise herein enters a protestation against all that which this indwelling sin produced. 'It is not I, I disown the fact, it is against my mind that it is done.' As when, in the senate, the major part are bad, and carry everything the wrong way, it is indeed the act of the senate, but the honest party strive against it, bewail what is done, and enter their protestation against it; so that it is no more they that light in the law of God. 'This is so sure a trace of real piety, and is represented in Scripture as in this view so decisive; that if it be supposed a true representation of a character, we must surely allow it to have been that of a truly good man.' Doddr. It is especially spoken of Christ; and of the man after God's own heart, as the type of Him. Ps. 40:6-8. 112:1. 119:47, 48, 92, 97-110, 111. It is the effect of 'the law being written in the heart;' and it is the direct opposite of 'the carnal mind, which is enmity against God; for that is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be.' 8:5-9. Jer. 31:31-34. Heb. 8:7-13. 10:5-18. 'Consenting to the law that it is good;' 'delighting in' the holy, just, good, and spiritual law of God; hating all evil; loving all good; and being deeply distressed at not being able to do the good which is loved, are all exclusively peculiar to the regenerate, and widely different from a heathen's saying in one particular: 'I see and approve the better, but follow the worse;' which in fact any man might say. 'Araspus' (in Xenophon) 'complains, of two souls contending within him, which contains an agreeable illustration of this paragraph.' Doddr. But in the case of Araspus, the conflict was between ambition and sensual indulgence, equally corrupt principles; not between 'delight in the holy law of God,' and the opposition of remaining depravity to earnest endeavors after perfect conformity to it. Indeed, such a conflict as is here described, must exist where sin is hated, and 'the law of God delighted in,' till holiness is perfected. 'Abhorrence of evil' must increase in proportion to the love of God and holiness; so that the least degree of evil rising in the heart, and escaping from the lips, in some passionate or vain word, will necessarily more grieve and burden an eminent saint, than perhaps the grossest crimes did before his conversion; even as a speck of dirt gives more uneasiness to a very cleanly person, than the most squalid filthiness does to those, who are used to live in it as their element. Ez. 11:17-20.—There is, therefore, no need to have recourse to such unnatural expedients in expounding this ch., as to imagine, that when the apostle said, 'I myself,' he meant some other person of a widely different character; or the whole family of Abraham, before and under the law. However these theories have been sanctioned by eminent names, they go on suppositions, for which the Scripture gives not the least ground; and which are wholly unprecedented and unparalleled, in the writings of any good author, sacred or profane. No doubt, numbers have perverted the words of the apostle: and it is fairly allowed, that no man, who is not himself engaged in this conflict, can clearly understand his meaning, or fully enter into those feelings which dictated his energetic language. But, as to the former case, those who want an evence for sin, 'wrest the other scriptures also to their own destruction:' 2 Pet. 3:14-16. and as to the latter, 'the secret of the Loan is with them that fear Him;' and 'the heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy.' Ps. 25:14. Prov. 14:10. It cannot be expected, that a man, who never saw war, could enter into the feelings, and fully understand the ardent language of an experienced soldier, when he related all his conflicts, dangers, hardships, terrors, narrow escapes, victories, and triumphs. But I apprehend, that many pious persons exclude themselves from the rich source of instruction and consolation, in their warfare, provided for them in this chap., either from fear lest others should pervert it to bad purposes; or because men of great name have affected to reprobate the evidently obvious interpretation, and have tried to force some other meaning on the words, of which it is impossible they can admit. Ps. 119:81-83, 97-100, 131, 173-176. SCOTT.

(22.) Inner man. 'I. e. the mind, the inner and sentient part of man. Now this is to be understood by a reference to the modes of think-

25 I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then, with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin.

CHAP. VIII.

1 They that are in Christ, and live according to the Spirit, are free from condemnation. 5, 13 What harm cometh of the flesh, 6, 14 and what good of the Spirit: 17 and what of being God's child. 19 whose glorious deliverance all things long for, 29 was beforehand decreed from God. 38 What can sever us from his love?

THERE is, therefore, now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

do it. Dwelleth in me, as the Canaanites among the Israelites, though they were put under tribute: dwelleth in me, and is likely to dwell there, while I live.

(3.) His great comfort lay in Jesus Christ, v. 25. In the midst of his complaints he breaks out into praises. It is a special remedy against fears and sorrows, to be much in praise: many a poor drooping soul hath found it so. And in all our praises, this should be the burden of the song. 'Blessed be God for Jesus Christ.'

Who shall deliver me? says he, v. 24. as one at a loss for help. At length, he finds an all-sufficient friend, even Jesus Christ. When we are under the sense of the remaining power of sin and corruption, we shall see reason to bless God, through Christ, (for as He is the Mediator of all our prayers, so He is of all our praises,) to bless God for Christ; it is He that stands between us and the wrath due to us for this sin. If it were not for Christ, this iniquity that dwells in us, would certainly be our ruin. He is our Advocate with the Father, and through Him God pities, and spares, and pardons, and lays not our iniquities to our charge. Through Christ death will put an end to all these complaints, and waft us to an eternity which we shall spend without sin or sigh.

CHAP. VIII. The apostle having fully explained the doctrine of justification, and pressed the necessity of sanctification, in this ch. applies himself to the consolation of the Lord's people. And we have here such a draught of the gospel-charter, such a display of the unspeakable privileges of true believers, as may furnish us with abundant matter for joy and peace in believing, that by all these immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation. Many of the people of God have, accordingly, found this ch. a well-spring of comfort to their souls, living and dying; and have been satisfied herefrom.

V. 1-9. The apostle here begins with one signal privilege of true Christians, and describes the character of those to whom it belongs, v. 1. This is his triumph after that melancholy complaint and conflict in the foregoing ch.; sin remaining, disturbing, vexing, but blessed be God, not ruining.

I. It is the unspeakable privilege and comfort of all in Christ Jesus, that there is therefore now no condemnation to them. He does not say, 'There is no accusation against them, nothing in them that deserves condemnation;' but it shall not be their ruin. Not, 'There is no cross, no affliction to them, or no displeasure in the affliction,' for that there may be; but no condemnation. They may be chastened of the Lord, but not condemned with the world. Now this arises from their being in Christ Jesus; because they are interested in the satisfaction Christ by dying made to the law. In Christ, God does not only not condemn, but is well pleased with them, Mat. 17:5.

II. It is the undoubted character of all who are so in Christ Jesus, as to be freed from condemnation, that they walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. The character is given from their walk, not any one particular act, but their course and way. And the great question is, What is the principle of the walk, the flesh or the spirit, the old or the new nature, corruption or grace? Which of these do we mind, for which of these do we make provision, by which of these are we governed, which of these do we take part with?

PRACT. OBS. We stand in such a relation to the holy law of God, as the rule of our present conduct and future judgment, that none but He who formed the union can dissolve it; and unless 'we become dead to the law by the body of Christ,' renouncing all expectations from it, that we may be united to Him, who 'died for our sins and rose again for our justification,' we must inevitably abide under the dominion of sin, and the curse of the law for ever.—A proper knowledge of the holy law of God, is the two-edged sword, which gives the death-wound both to self-righteousness, and to antinomianism: for it is perfectly fit to be the rule of our duty, to be written in our hearts, and obeyed in our lives, for the very same reasons on account of which it cannot justify or save us.—But, if a man speak on this subject [the tendency to sin] with indifference or with satisfaction; if 'sin dwelling in him' be the excuse for crimes committed, without remorse or godly sorrow; if he 'allow the evil, and desire not the good,' presuming that he has all things in Christ; if, instead of consenting to the goodness of the law, condemning himself, and loathing his sins, he depreciates the law and extenuates his own guilt; if his utmost willingness be to escape hell at any rate, without longing to be holy according to the spiritual and good law of God; if he do not 'delight in it after the inward man,' nor serve it with the prevailing desire of his mind, but willingly 'serve the law of sin'; then doubtless he is 'without Christ,' whose name he profanes; he is under the law which he hates; and his presumptuous confidence and quietness only prove, that he is given over to 'a strong delusion to believe a lie.' Nor does this much disputed and abused chap. more evidently condemn the hope of the proudest Pharisee on earth, than it does that of such a professor of evangelical truth. SCOTT.

ing among the Jewish theologians. So Jalkut Rubeni, "the skin and flesh is the garment of a man, but the interior spirit is called the man;" and Philo "the mind, which is the map lording it in the man, the better in the worse;" and in another passage he calls it "the leader man." Carpzov thinks the doctrine derived from the Platonic school; and Wets. cites Plato, de Rep. "we should do and say so, that the inner may overpower the outer man." Plotinus speaks of "the man within." The expression was used in the Pythagorean philosophy. Nay, it had passed even to the poets. Thus Plautus, "the health of the inner man." Philo seems to have borrowed it, not from Plato, but rather from the more ancient theology of his own countrymen, vestiges of which are found in Jos. and the Rabbins, and also in the Epistles of Peter, as well as Paul's.—The struggles between the good and the bad principles of the mind are ably depicted by Euripides in the Medea.

Concluding Note. The following is the system hinted at on vs. 5-25. Besides the senses and limbs, the instinctive feelings and faculties (or intellect, sentiments, and appetites) of man have cerebral organs necessary in this life to their manifestation; and these organs are propagated in greater or less force, according to the physiological laws; are increased in size and power by use, and diminished by disuse; are excited when their appropriate objects are presented to them, and at rest otherwise, except that, after a certain rest, they, in a healthy state, have spontaneous activity. The manner in which life, or soul, or spirit, or mind, or 'heart,' (the self,) is connected with and operates upon and in these organs, is beyond the reach of our limited powers. Each human being is endowed, in greater or less relative proportions, with the organs of,

V. 4. That the ' righteousness, &c. required by ' the law, ' might be fully written in our hearts, and habitually, in all its parts, performed in our lives, though too imperfectly to justify us ; and that, hereafter, we might be perfectly conformed to the holy law, in its substantial requirement of perfect love to God and his creatures, and obey it fully for evermore.—Many expositors explain this of Christ, as One with his people, having fulfilled the righteousness of the law in their stead ; and of its imputation to those, who walk after the Spirit. But the former sense seems more obvious, and best to answer the apostle's design ; who was proving, that deliverance from the law as a covenant was necessary, in order to our obeying the law as a rule. 7:5, 6. Gal. 2:17—21. ' Sanctification, begun in us, is the sure evidence of our union with Christ ; which is the richest fruit of a holy life.' Beza. by the law. Or, understand it of the ceremonial law ; and that could never take away sin, Heb. 10:4.

(2.) The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, does it, v. 2. The covenant of grace made with us in Christ, is a treasury of merit and grace, and from thence we receive pardon and a new nature ; are freed from the law of sin and death, i. e. both from the guilt and power of sin ; from the curse of the law, and the conduct of the flesh, v. 3. The best exposition of this v. is, Heb. 10:1—10. To make the sense of the words clear, which in our tr. is a little intricate, we may read it thus, with a little transposal, God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, that the,—v. 4. Observe, [1.] Christ appeared not sinful, for He was holy, harmless, undefiled ; but in the likeness of that flesh which was sinful. He took upon Him that nature which was corrupt, though perfectly abstracted from the corruptions of it. His being circumcised, redeemed, baptized with John's baptism, speak the likeness of sinful flesh. How great condescension, that He who was God, should not only be made in the likeness of flesh, but sinful flesh ! And for sin, there the best Greek copies place the comma :—and as a sacrifice for sin. The LXX call a sacrifice for sin no more than for sin ; so Christ was a Sacrifice ; He was sent to be so, Heb. 9:26. [2.] By this appearance of His, sin was condemned, i. e., God did therein more than ever manifest his hatred of sin ; and not only so, but for all that are Christ's, both the damning and the domineering power of sin is broken and taken out of the way. Christ was made sin for us, 2 Cor. 5:21. and, being so made, when He was condemned, sin was condemned in the flesh of Christ ; condemned in the human nature : so was satisfaction made to divine justice, and way made for the salvation of the sinner. [3.] The happy effect of this on us, v. 4. A righteousness of satisfaction for the breach of the law, is fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's complete and perfect righteousness, which answers the utmost demands of the law ; and a righteousness of obedience to the commands of the law, is fulfilled in us, when by the Spirit the law of love is written on the heart, ch. 13:10. though the righteousness of the law is not fulfilled by us. Who walk not, &c. Those who are interested in this privilege, act from spiritual, not carnal principles ; as for others, the righteousness of the law will be fulfilled on them in their ruin. Now,

2. Observe how we may answer to this character, v. 5, &c.

(1.) By looking to our minds ; examining what we mind, the things of the flesh, or of the Spirit. Carnal pleasure, worldly profit and honor, the things of sense and time, are the things of the flesh, which unregenerate people mind. The favor of God, the welfare of the soul, the concerns of eternity, are the things of the Spirit, which they that are after the Spirit, do mind. The man is as the mind is, Prov. 23:7. Which way do the thoughts move with most pleasure ? On what do they dwell with most satisfaction ? Which way go the projects and contrivances ? Whether are we more wise, for the world, or for our souls ? It is a great matter what our savor is, so the word is tr. Mat. 16:23. what truths, what tidings, what comforts, we most relish, and are most agreeable to us.

Now, to caution us against this carnal-mindedness, he shows the great misery and malignity of it, and compares it with the unspeakable excellency and comfort of spiritual mindedness.

more fully stated. Habitual prevalence stamps the character, as carnal or spiritual ; so that, if a man be ' carnal,' in the prevailing judgment, temper, and affections of his mind, he is under condemnation, dead in sin, and meet for destruction ; but if he be ' spiritual,' in the habitual, prevailing temper of his soul, he is evidently alive to God, and at peace with Him ; and the spiritual mind is, in proportion as it prevails, the very essence of life and peace. 7:13, 14. The importance of this distinction is manifest, ' because the carnal mind is enmity against God : ' man's apostasy originated in his preferring the satisfaction to be found in the creatures through disobedience, to the felicity to be enjoyed in God by obedience. This is in fact the universal idolatry ; and men thus preferring self-satisfaction, and created good, to the favor and service of God, not only rebel against Him, but become enemies to Him, and ' haters ' of Him.—' The carnal mind is not subject to the divine law, and indeed cannot be ; ' it is morally unable to do anything but revolt against it, and refuse obedience to it. 7:7—12.—Evangelical religion is equally remote from self-righteousness, which cleaves to the law as a covenant ; and [from] antinomianism, which rejects it as a rule : for, not being subject to the law, men ' cannot please God.'—If ' the flesh,' be explained of the body, as distinguished from the soul, or spirit ; it follows, beyond all doubt or evasion, that no man can ' please God,' while he lives in this world ; and also that the Romans were disembodied spirits, which is palpably absurd ; yet the interpretation of other scriptures, concerning the flesh and spirit, by many learned men, unavoidably leads to this absurdity. Nor is it less unreasonable and unscriptural to aver, that living under the Mosaic dispensation was ' being in the flesh ; ' and professing the Gospel, especially if miraculous powers were vouchsafed, was being in the Spirit. Mat. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3. Yet these seem the only ways, by which the above plain and natural interpretation can possibly be evaded. John 6:52—53. 14:15—17, 21—24. 17:20—23. 2 Cor. 13:5, 6. SCOTT.

(5.) After the flesh, i. e. living so.] ' Those who are actuated by the impetus of appetite, like the brutes, who have no knowledge of religion.' Ros. Mind. ' This verb [phronein] denotes the judgment of the intellect, together with the affection of the will.' Toletus. ' The word is here transferred from the intellect to the affections.' Grot. BL.

(6, 7.) ' Mind of the flesh . . . mind of the Spirit.' St. ' Death, life, peace, are used, by metonymy, for the cause of each. Thanatos signifies misery and death, both temporal and eternal ; and zoē happiness, both in this world and in the next. Mind. [Phronēma : disposition, mores ; a sense frequent in the classics. Neither can be.] I. e. as long as it remains such, as a lewd woman cannot be chaste, i. e. not now, not while she remains such. So Theoph. and Chrys. best explain. ' Of this language the Calvinists have taken a very unfair advantage, for the support of their favorite doctrine, of the utter impotency of the unregenerate man in appreciating, much less conforming to, the divine injunctions. Thus Carpz. calls such a person a trunk and stone, who can no more begin the work of reformation than a statue ; nay, is worse than a stock or stone, as being naturally rebellious, which those are not. It is unnecessary to observe, that this doctrine is contrary to the plainest rules of justice, as it is unsupported by Scripture. For, as for the present passage, it may be understood (and so Kop.) in a popular sense ; or will admit of an easy interpretation on metaphysical principles, quite accordant with revelation, so as entirely to put aside any such doctrine.' [209]

8 So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God.

9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell <sup>in</sup> you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness.

11 But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, <sup>he</sup> that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies <sup>by</sup> his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

12 Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not <sup>to</sup> the flesh, to live after the flesh.

13 For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify <sup>the</sup> deeds of the body, ye shall live.

14 For as many as are led <sup>by</sup> the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.

[1.] It is death, v. 6. spiritual death, the certain way to eternal death, the death of the soul; for it is its alienation from God, in union and communion with whom the life of the soul consists. Death includes all misery; carnal souls are miserable souls. But to be spiritually minded, to have — a spiritual savor, the wisdom that is from above, a principle of grace, is life and peace, the felicity and happiness of the soul, eternal life and peace begun, and an assuring earnest of the perfection of it.

[2.] It is enmity to God, v. 7. and this is worse than the former; not only an enemy, but enmity itself; not only the alienation of the soul from God, but the opposition of the soul against God; it rebels against his authority, thwarts his design, opposes his interest, [hates his love.] To prove this, he urges, that it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The holiness of the law of God, and the unholiness of the carnal mind, are as irreconcilable as light to darkness. See how wretchedly the corrupt will of man is enslaved to sin; as far as the carnal mind prevails, there is no inclination to the law of God; therefore wherever there is a change wrought, it is by the power of God's grace, not by the freedom of man's

So Bl. Man indeed is not a machine, nor driven by fatal necessity of fixed natural laws, like a vegetable, nor is his body a part of that of God; he has a separate identity from God, an eternal consciousness that he is not God, but a self; yet when he comes to explain where God's will ends and his own begins, or how God has connected Himself with his spirit, it is beyond the power of the constitution God has endowed him with, and he is of course at a loss, and drowns himself in a sea of theology, shoreless and fathomless. Nor is this dispute, (or kindred ones,) profitable, or practical; we acknowledge we have no power but as God wills, yet every act at every instant is done with a present, distinct, and indisputable consciousness of the agency, the free agency of self. Disputes will not make either point clearer, any more than they will the facts included under the terms, self, existence, object, matter, space, time, thought, &c. The reader may well, however, consult Hodge, Stuart, Edwards, &c.

(9.) If so be. The apostle trusts they are not in the flesh. And so Kop.

V. 10, 11. Several readers may be aware, that the celebrated Mr. Locke explains, quickening the mortal body, by sanctifying the immortal soul! But . . . . in no book, which the author has read, does the pride of human reason, opposing the express testimonies of God, and striving to wrest them from their obvious meaning, appear so prominent, as in most parts of the great Mr. Locke's exposition of Paul's epistles. So at 7:25. Kop. 'The words are exceedingly obscure and mystical.' Bl. Some argue from it a resurrection of the body. On the terms, pneuma, psyche, soma, &c., see Bibl. Repos. Oct. 1837. Art. will. Hence he infers, v. 8. They that are in a carnal, unregenerate state, cannot do the things that please God; wanting grace, the pleasing principle, and an interest in Christ, the pleasing Mediator. The very sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination, Prov. 15:8.

We may know our state and character, (2.) By inquiring whether we have the Spirit of God and Christ, or no, v. 9. states and conditions of the soul vastly different. All the saints have flesh and spirit in them; but to be in the flesh, and to be in the Spirit, are contrary. It denotes our being overcome and subdued by one of these principles. The Spirit dwelling in us, is the best evidence of our being in the Spirit, for the indwelling is mutual, 1 John 4:16. The Spirit visits many that are unregenerate, with his motions, which they resist and quench; but in all that are sanctified He dwells; there He resides and rules.

To this he subjoins a general rule of trial; If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. 1. That are spirited as He was spirited, meek, lowly, humble, peaceable, patient, charitable. We cannot tread in his steps unless we have his Spirit; the frame and disposition of our souls must be conformable to Christ's pattern. 2. That are actuated and guided by the Holy Spirit of God, as a Sanctifier, Teacher, and Comforter. Having the Spirit of Christ is the same with having the Spirit of God to dwell in us. But those two come much to one; for all that are actuated by the Spirit of God as their rule, are conformable to the Spirit of Christ as their pattern.

V. 10—16. In these vs. the apostle represents two more excellent benefits of true believers.

1. Life. The happiness is not barely negative, but positive, an advancement to a life that will be the unspeakable happiness of the man, v. 10, 11. If the Spirit be in us, Christ is in us. He dwells in the heart by faith, Eph. 3:17. Now we are here told what becomes of the bodies and souls of those in whom Christ is.

1. The life purchased and promised does not immortalize the body in its present state, because of sin. This was the first threatening, Gen. 3:19. Dust thou art. The death even of the bodies of the saints is a remaining token of God's displeasure against sin.

2. But the spirit, the precious soul, that is life; it is now spiritually alive, nay it is life. Grace in the soul is its new nature; the life of the saint lies in the soul, while the life of the sinner goes no farther than the body. When the body dies, and returns to the dust, the spirit is life; not only living and immortal, but swallowed up of life.

When Abraham was dead, yet God was the God of Abraham, for even then his spirit was life, Mat. 22:31, 32. See Ps. 49:15. And this because of righteousness. The righteousness of Christ, imputed to them, secures the soul, the better part, from death; the righteousness of Christ, inherent in them, the renewed image of God on the soul, preserves it, and, by God's ordination, at death elevates and improves it, and makes it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light. The eternal life of the soul consists in the vision and fruition of God, and both assimilating, for which the soul is qualified by the righteousness of sanctification, Ps. 17:15.

3. There is a life reserved too for the poor body at last, v. 11. though at death it is cast aside as a despised broken vessel, yet God will have a desire to the work of his hands, Job 14:15. will remember his covenant with the dust, and will not lose a grain of it; but the body shall be re-united to the soul, and clothed with a glory agreeable to it. Vile bodies shall be new fashioned, Phil. 3:21. 1 Cor. 15:42. Two great assurances of the resurrection of the body are mentioned. (1.) The resurrection of Christ. Christ rose as the Head and first-fruits and forerunner of all the saints, 1 Cor. 15:20. (2.) The indwelling of the Spirit. The same Spirit that raiseth the soul now, will raise the body shortly; by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. The bodies of the saints are the temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. 3:16. 6:19. Now, though these temples may for a while lie in ruins, yet they shall be rebuilt again. The Spirit, breathing on dead and dry bones, will make them live, and the saints even in their flesh shall see God.

From hence the apostle by the way inferences, how much it is our duty to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, v. 12, 13. for, [1.] We are not debtors to the flesh; neither by relation, gratitude, nor any other bond or obligation. It is implied that we are debtors to Christ and to the Spirit: there we owe our all, all we have, and all we can do, by a thousand bonds and obligations. See 1 Cor. 6:19, 20. [2.] Consider the consequences, the end of the way; life and death, blessing and cursing, are set before us. If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; die eternally. Pleasing, and serving, and gratifying the flesh, is the ruin of souls; that is the second death. Dying indeed is the soul's dying: the death of the saints is but a sleep. But on the other hand, Ye shall live, live and be happy to eternity; that is the true life; If ye through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, subdue and keep under all fleshly lusts and affections, deny

V. 12, 13. The natural appetites of the body need only to be moderated, regulated, and subordinated; but the carnal desires 'of the body of sin and death,' the 'old Adam,' 'the flesh, with its affections and lusts,' must be extirpated, and all its actings terminated. 6:5—7. 7:22—25. 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Col. 2:11, 12. 1 Pet. 2:11. This must be done by the Holy Spirit, working in us both 'to will' and 'to do,' what God commands; Phil. 2:12, 13. yet we are to do it through Him, and by dependence on Him, which is energetically enforced by the words; 'If ye, through the Spirit, &c.'

(13.) 'Mortify, destroy the evil [inordinate] desires of the body. Præcis [deeds] denotes evil actions (as in Col. 3:9.), which show themselves in the body. Not only (so Kop.) external actions, but internal feelings, the passions of the mind, and the desires of the heart. [Comp. note, end of ch. 7.] From the copious Rabbinical citations by Schoet. it appears, that thanatoute [kill, mortify] is used here agreeably to the Jewish sacrificial metaphors shecht ytsr, to sacrifice, (i. e. destroy.) evil concupiscence. So Sanchid. fol. 43. 3. 'Whoever sacrifices (slays) evil concupiscence, it is the same as if he glorified God in both worlds, in this and in the next.' Thus there is no reason to suppose, with Crellius, that this alludes to the former evil life of the Roman converts.' Bl.

V. 14—17. Regeneration by the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for receiving Christ by living faith; and communicates a new and divine life to the soul, though in a feeble state, as that of a 'new-born babe.' 1 Pet. 2:1—3, v. 2.—The Holy Spirit leads a man into the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of his own heart; into humble repentance, faith in Christ, holy love, communion with God, and delight in his worship and commandments; on the other hand, He leads him away from vanity and iniquity, from vice and ungodliness, from pride and discord: Ps. 143:8—10. and in proportion as we willingly give up ourselves to be led in the paths of truth and holiness, we may know our adoption.—The Mosaic dispensation had a greater tendency to foster this temper, [slavish

15 For ye have not received the Spirit of bondage 'again, to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.

16 The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God:

17 And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together.

18 For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.

yourselves in the pleasing and humoring of the body; and this through the Spirit: we cannot do it without the Spirit working it in us; and the Spirit will not do it without us doing our endeavor. So that, in a word, we are put on this dilemma, either to displease the body, or destroy the soul.

II. The Spirit of adoption is another privilege belonging to those that are in Christ Jesus, v. 14—16. All such are taken into the relation of children to God, v. 14. Observe, They are led by the Spirit of God; as a scholar, a traveller, or a soldier; not driven as beasts, but led as rational creatures; drawn with the cords of a man, and the bands of love. They are the sons of God; owned and loved by Him as his children.

And these sons of God have the Spirit, 1. To work in them the disposition of children, v. 15. Understand the spirit of bondage, of that, [1.] Which the O. T. church was under, by reason of the darkness and terror of that dispensation. The veil signified bondage, 2 Cor. 3:15. Comp. v. 17. The Spirit of adoption was not fear,] than the Christian religion has: and the Jews, too generally, considering the whole as a covenant of works, worshipped God in this slavish manner. But the greater number of the Roman converts had never been under the Mosaic law; yet they are spoken of indiscriminately, as having been formerly influenced by 'the spirit of bondage;' we may therefore suppose, that those convictions were also intended, under which awakened sinners, even if in consequence converted, act more from fear and selfish principles, than established believers do; abstaining from many sins through dread of consequences, without decidedly hating them; and practising duties without loving them. These convictions indeed proceed from the moving of the Spirit of God on their minds, and prepare them for receiving Christ by faith; but they are very different from the disposition, and state of mind and heart, of those who are brought into the full light and liberty of the Gospel, and have received 'the Spirit of adoption.' Num. 17:12, 13. Mat. 25:24—30. John 16:8—11, 14, 15. Gal. 4:4—7, 21—31. Eph. 1:13, 14. 2 Tim. 1:6—8. 1 John 4:18. Then they are taught and animated to 'serve [and obey] God,' with filial reverence, confidence, love, gratitude, submission, zeal, and admiring, adoring complacency; and are especially encouraged and emboldened to call upon Him as 'a Father,' for all things which they want, and for support and deliverance under all their trials, notwithstanding their conscious unworthiness. The use of different languages, in this connexion, [to express the filial relation,] sweetly indicates the harmony of Jews and Gentiles, and of different nations, in this filial worship of God according to the Gospel. Mat. 6:6, 9. Mark 14:36. Gal. 4—7. Thus the Holy Spirit, by producing in believers the affections which dutiful children bear to a wise and good father, in their habitual state of heart toward God, most manifestly attests their adoption into his family. This is not done by a voice, or immediate revelation, or impulse, or merely by a text brought to the mind; (for all these things are equivocal and delusory;) but by 'bearing witness with their spirits,' or coinciding with the testimony of their own enlightened minds and consciences, as to their uprightness in embracing the Gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of God. 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. So that, while they are examining themselves concerning the reality of their conversion, and find scriptural evidence of it; the Holy Spirit, from time to time, shines on his own work, excites their holy affections into lively exercise, renders them very efficacious upon their conduct, and thus puts the matter beyond doubt; for while they feel the spirit of dutiful children towards God, as described in his holy Word, they become satisfied concerning his parental love to them. 9:1—3. So that, this 'witness of the Spirit' is borne along with that of our own consciences, not without it, nor against it; and it coincides with the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the Scripture, and must be proved and saved by it. But this being clearly ascertained, we may confidently regard ourselves as the heirs of the heavenly inheritance, (for 'if children, then heirs,') and of God Himself as our Portion; even 'joint heirs with Christ,' the beloved Son of the Father, being accepted in Him, and then so plentifully poured out as now. [2.] Which the saints were, many of them, under at their conversion; convictions of sin and wrath set home by the Spirit; as they, Acts 2:37. the jailer, Acts 16:30. Paul, Acts 9:6. 'God as a Judge,' says Dr. Manton, 'by the spirit of bondage, sends us to Christ as Mediator, and Christ as Mediator, by the Spirit of adoption, sends us back again to God as a Father.' But you have received the Spirit of adoption; this works in the children of God a filial love to God as a Father, a delight in Him, and a dependence on Him, as a Father. A sanctified soul bears the image of God, as the child the image of the father. Whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Praying is here called crying; which is not only an earnest, but a natural expression of desire; children that cannot speak, vent their desires by crying. Now, the Spirit teaches us in prayer to come to God as a Father, with a holy, humble confidence, emboldening the soul in that duty. Abba is Syriac, signifying father, or my father; so Christ in prayer, Mark 14:36. Abba, Father: and we have received the Spirit of the Son. It denotes an affectionate, endearing importunity, and a believing stress laid on the relation; also, that the adoption is common both to Jews and Gentiles.

2. To witness to the relation of children, v. 16. The former is the work of the Spirit as a Sanctifier, this as a Comforter. Beareth witness with our spirit, is to be understood not of any immediate, extraordinary revelation, but an ordinary work of the Spirit, in and by the means of comfort speaking peace to the soul. This testimony is always agreeable to the written Word, and therefore always grounded on sanctification; for the Spirit in the heart cannot contradict the Spirit in the Word. The Spirit witnesses to none the privileges of children, who have not the nature and disposition of children.

V. 17—25. In these words, the apostle describes a fourth illustrious branch of the happiness of believers, that is, a title to the future glory. This is fitly annexed to our sonship. If children, then heirs, v. 17. Heaven is an inheritance all the saints are heirs to; not by any merit or procurement of their own; but purely by the act of God; for God makes heirs. The saints are heirs, though in this world under age; see Gal. 4:1, 2. Their present state is a state of education and preparation for the inheritance. How comfortable should this be to all the children of God, how little soever they have in possession, that, being heirs, they have enough in reversion! But the honor and happiness of an heir lies in the value and worth of that he is heir to; we read of those that inherit the wind; and therefore we have here an abstract of the premises.

I. Heirs of God. The Lord Himself is the portion of the saints' inheritance, Ps. 16:5. a goodly heritage! v. 6. saints are spiritual priests, that have the Lord for their inheritance, Num. 18:20. the vision of God and the fruition of God make up the inheritance of the saints. God Himself will be with them, and will be their God, Rev. 21:3.

II. Joint heirs with Christ. Christ, as Mediator, is said to be the Heir of all things, Heb. 1:2. and true believers, by virtue of their union with Him, shall inherit all things, Rev. 21:7. John 17:24. Rev. 3:21. Now, this future glory is further spoken of, as the reward of present sufferings, and as the accomplishment of present hopes.

1. As the reward of the saints' present sufferings; and it is a rich reward; If so be that we suffer with Him, v. 17. or, forasmuch as we suffer with Him. The state of the church in this world always is, but was then especially, an afflicted state; to be a Christian, was certainly to be a sufferer. Now, to comfort them, he tells them that they suffered with Christ, for his sake, for his honor, and for the testimony of a good conscience; and we shall be glorified with Him: this the Gospel is filled with the assurances of. The sufferings of the saints are but for the present, strike no deeper, last no longer, 2 Cor. 4:17. light affliction, and but for a moment. In the other scale he appointed with Him to share the glorious inheritance: John 14:15—17. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Eph. 1:3—3, 13, 14. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. and of this we may be still more fully assured, if we patiently endure sufferings after his example, and for his sake, and [in] the hope of being also 'glorified with Him.' It has here a fuller meaning, even than "being animated with the mind of God, imitating his perfections, learning and strongly infixing in the mind the doctrine of Christ, which is that of God;" viz. the being dear to God, as a son to the father; the having a right and interest in the felicity of the Father; as the son is heir to his father's goods: v. 17. 'Polytheism necessarily weakens the reliance of man on divine protection [Intro. See Bloomf. Adoption. Sonship, rather; see Bloomf. Ed.—'A servile spirit, that ye should again be in fear . . . but . . . a filial spirit.' St. Pnevma, [spirit,] like the Heb. ruch, has (as often) the sense of affectus; indeed it is used of all the stronger emotions of the mind, as love, wrath, &c. See 1 Cor. 2:12. 4:21. Gal. 6:1. The Mosaic economy dealt in threatenings and punishments, and fear constituted a great part of heathen worship.

V. 18—23. By a kind of constraint, through the guilt and righteous condemnation of Adam and his posterity, everything seems perverted from its intended use: the inanimate creatures are pressed into the service of man's rebellion; the luminaries of heaven give him light, by which to work wickedness; the fruits of the earth are sacrificed to his luxury, intemperance, and ostentation; its bowels are ransacked for metals, from which arms are forged for public and private murder and revenge; or to gratify man's avarice, and excite him to fraud, oppression, and war. . . . Above all, nearly every part of the creation has been, and is perverted, in one way or other, to idolatry, which is especially 'vanity.' 1:21—23. The heavenly luminaries, the earth, rivers, woods, and puts the glory; and finds that a weight, an exceeding and eternal weight; glory that shall be revealed. In our present state we come short, not only in the enjoyment, but in the knowledge of that glory, 1 Cor. 2:9. 1 John 3:2. it shall be revealed. It surpasses all that we have yet seen or known, though present vouchers are very precious, very sweet. Revealed not only to us, to be seen, but in us, to be enjoyed. The kingdom of God is within you, and will be so to eternity. He determines the sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory. They cannot merit that glory; and if suffering for Christ will not merit, much less will mountains, as well as animals, have been adored as gods; while metals, stone, and wood, have been fashioned into idols, and decorations of idols; and all the prime of the productions of the earth have been offered in sacrifice unto them. So that, everything is in an unnatural state: the good creatures of God appear evil, through man's abuse of them; and even the enjoyment originally to be found in them, is turned into vexation, bitterness, and disappointment, by man's idolatrous love of them, and expectation from them. Thus we are assured, that 'the whole creation groans' in every part, as with one sympathizing expression of anguish, expecting and impatiently longing for a glorious event of all these distractions. This it has done ever since the fall, and will do, in a measure, till the end of the world. The miseries also of the human species, through their own and each other's wickedness, as well as the state of the inferior creatures, declare the world to be in such a situation, as is not intended always to continue. Nay, not only do all creatures, and all other men here below, as it were, groan under the burdens imposed on them through sin; but even 'the children of God,' who have 'the Spirit of adoption,' and his holy consolations, as the first-fruits and pledge of their everlasting felicity, 14—17. yet groan within themselves, through manifold pains, conflicts, temptations, and difficulties; and especially through the disquietude of indwelling sin, 7:22—25. 2 Cor. 5:1—3. [But at the final consummation of all things] Satan, sin, death, misery, and all wicked creatures, will be confined to hell; and the rest of God's creation will appear glorious, pure, beautiful, orderly, and happy; in every respect answering the end for which it was formed, and in nothing abused to contrary purposes. Rev. 20:11—15. 21:1—4.—The sufferings of animals, though very many and grievous, yet being unfeared and transient, are doubtless overbalanced by their enjoyments; and to infer an individual resurrection of all or any of them, from this passage, is surely one of the wildest reveries, which ever entered into the mind of thinking man.—The happy effects produced by the Gospel, when extensively successful, even in this present world, may be considered as earnest of the glorious scene, of which the apostle speaks; Rev. 20:1—6. but 'the manifestation of [this glory of, St.] the sons of God' (19), and 'the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body' (23), clearly show, that the general resurrection, and the state which follows, were especially, and indeed exclusively meant; for then only will 'the children of God be manifested' as such, and be separated from all others. 1 John 3:1—3, v. 2.

(18.) 'Moreover, I count not the sufferings of the present time as worthy of comparison with the glory which is to be revealed to us.' St. 'The objection which might probably be raised to the Christian religion, that by it men expected everything good, and yet scarcely ever met with anything but tribulations and afflictions, Paul overrules: 1st, by reminding them, that men cannot have the fruition of any good that is yet future, and only in hope, v. 19—25. 2dly, by pointing out the present good which, amidst its very miseries, the Christian religion affords, 26—30. inasmuch as by it we are assured that, according to the divine ordination, the pious worshippers of God shall find evils themselves turn to good, v. 28. and shall hereafter enjoy supreme felicity, even as Christ, who endured the like tribulations and afflictions before He attained the summit of felicity and dignity which He now enjoys.'

(19, &c.) Creation.] 'Ktisis: The difficulty of this passage, v. 19, &c. (considered the most difficult of Paul's writings, and which has perhaps, beyond all others, perplexed commentators,) turns on the sense to be assigned to this word. 1. It has been tr. nature, the whole terrestrial creation, spoken by a prosopopeia common both to the Scriptures and the classics, by which that is ascribed to universal nature which is only properly applicable to intelligent beings. Koppe instances Gen. 4:10. Lev. 26:34. Dent. 32:1. Ps. 19:1. 114:3—6. Is. 55:12. Jer. 47:6. Hos. 13:14. Hab. 3:10. Baruch 3:34. Ja. 5:4. Also Philo de Præm. And so the classical writers, when speaking of the golden age, as Hesiod, Virg., Theoc. — Chrys., Ambr., Hil., T. Aq., and the Gr. cmtts.; also Luther, Grot., Cap., Parr., Mosheim, Lakemacher, [Flatt., Tholuck, Carpz., Danhauer, Jacobi, Mich., Kop., Boltz, [Hodge.] and Ros., thus tr. For, says Carpz., "(1.) It is required by the following ktisis in v. 20, which has the same sense. (2.) The tr. is supported by other SS. where to ktisma and hē ktisis, used alone, signify creatura, and phusis, viz. Mark 10:6. 13:19. Col. 1:15. and especially Rom. 1:25. Rev. 5:13. (3.) By the characteristics of universality at v. 22. (4.) By the antithesis; doing. The sufferings are small and short, and concern the body only: but the glory is rich and great, concerns the soul, and is eternal.

This he reckons, very seriously and deliberately considers. He had reasoned the case within himself, weighed the arguments on both sides, and thus at last resolves the point, as an arithmetician balancing an account; he first sums up what is disbursed for Christ, in his sufferings of this present time, and finds they come to very little; he then sums up what is secured to us by Christ in the glory that shall be revealed, and that he finds an infinite sum, transcending all conception, the disbursement abundantly made up, and the losses infinitely counter-vailed. And who would be afraid then to suffer for Christ, who, as He is beforehand with us in suffering, so He will not be behindhand with us in recompense?

Now Paul was a competent judge; could reckon not by art only, but by experience; for he knew both. He knew what the sufferings of this present time were; see 2 Cor. 11:23—28. He knew what the glory of heaven is; see 2 Cor. 12:3, 4. And on the view of both, he gives this judgment here. There is nothing like a believing view of the glory which shall be revealed, to support and bear up the spirit under all the sufferings of this present time. Heb. 11:26.

2. As the accomplishment of the saints' present hopes and expectations, v. 19, &c. As the saints are suffering for it, so they are waiting for it. Heaven is therefore sure; for God, by his Spirit, would not raise and encourage those hopes only to defeat and disappoint them; He will establish that word unto his servants, on which He has caused them to hope, Ps. 119:49. and heaven is therefore sweet; for if hope deferred makes the heart sick, surely when the desire comes it will be a tree of life, Prov. 13:12. Now he observes an expectation of this glory; (1.) In the creatures, v. 19—22. This observation in these vs. has some difficulty in it, which puzzles interpreters a little: and the more, because it is a remark not made in any other scripture, with which it might be compared.

By the creature here we understand, not as some do, the Gentile world, and their expectations of Christ and the Gospel; which is an exposition very foreign and forced; but the whole frame of nature, especially that of this lower world; the whole creation, the compages of inanimate and sensible creatures; which, because of their harktisis being opposed to those who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, i. e. the faithful. Therefore ktisis cannot mean the faithful. Neither, moreover, can it mean the unfaithful, or unbelievers; since to this the words subjoined are repugnant. (5.) By the attributes, For, 1st, this ktisis is made obnoxious to vanity and abuse, contrary to its end, and against its proper use, solely by the permission of God. 2dly, it groans under that servitude, and anxiously expects to be restored to liberty. 3dly, and will finally obtain it. Such allegory is frequent, too, in the SS. Lak. and Ros. think, also, there is allusion to a Jewish opinion, that at Messiah's reign the whole creation, corrupted and depraved by the fall, would be restored to its original perfection. But to the introduction of Jewish opinions here, I must take strong exception, even though supported by the authority of Philo, and some ancient fathers, who held the doctrine of a millennium; as Iren. adv. Hæc.—Ammon objects, that ktisis, in the N. T., denotes the creation, actively taken, and is to be understood of the things created, (Col. 1:23. Rev. 14.) but not the rerum creatorum complexus. Nor, thinks he, would the apostle here, in a doctrinal discussion, introduce a poetic allegory so sublime, as scarcely to be paralleled in the Zendavesta. Besides, the for, v. 19. unites it to troubles endured by men, and v. 21. this ktisis is to be associated with the inhabitants of heaven. Turner, too, objects, that if it have a figurative sense here, it must in v. 20, 21, 22. "which seems inconsistent with what is said of ktisis." [But see Hodge, Rom. pp. 335—346.]

2. Another class, as Ham., Le Clerc, Wets., Schl., take ktisis, not of a physical but moral creation, (as 2 Cor. 5:17.) and explain Christians recently converted, from Judaism or heathenism, or (as Noesselt) the latter only. But to this, Am. and Turn. with reason, object, that then v. 23. must be restricted to Jewish converts, or to Paul, with his brethren, perhaps, in the ministry, which is very improbable, as v. 23. is as applicable to all Christians. "Ou monon de alla [and not only but] v. 23. (he adds), is used elsewhere in Rom. (5:3, 11. 9:18.) to denote opposition, and v. 22. shows it should thus be understood here. Further, if ktisis referred to Christians, it would, as in other places, have some adjunct." See Eph. 4:24. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal.

3. Many eminent cmtts., as Locke, Whit., Taylor, Henm., Semler, Mackn., Cætel., Doed., Am. Jaspis, [St.,] &c. interpret ktisis, of mankind generally, of whom the Gentiles formed the greatest bulk; the popular use of language (as Turn. obs.), allowing that to be affirmed of all which is applicable to a large proportion. Am. remarks, that ktisis, like the Heb. bryth, has undoubtedly the sense of the human creation, in Mark 16:15. Col. 1:15 and 23. Heb. 4:13. And Schoet. says, that in the Rabbinical writings bryth is frequently used for man. "And, (says Am.) the sense at v. 20. sqq. proves that creatures endowed with free-will are entreated of. Besides, the apolutrōsis tou sōmatos [deliverance from the bondage of corruption, v. 21.], expressly adverts to the frailty of human nature, derived from the dominion of sin. Again, the inheritance with Christ, v. 17. does, according to Paul's intent, belong not only to all Israel, 11:26. but also to the fullness of the Gentiles, v. 25." Turner thus gives the sense, "What mankind were anxiously expecting, i. e. an amelioration of their condition, expected in different degrees of excellency, and with different degrees of certainty, according to circumstances." See Scholar Armed, and Bishop Blomfield, on the Traditional Knowledge. "We need consider as expected only that part of these blessings which is the earnest and pledge of the rest. From the same terms being used to express both the present and future blessings of the Gospel, they seem here considered in connexion, as constituting one whole, the expectation of which may be affirmed, although the expectants were not aware of the full extent of them, their views differing according to situation and circumstances." Turner. [St. refers to the innate longing after immortality, shown in the heathen pictures of Elysium, and compares Cic. and Sen.]

"The 1st and 2d of the above interpretations deserve the preference, the 2d is utterly untenable, though each is pressed with peculiar difficulties. Perhaps, however, the last is liable to the fewest." [See Stuart, Rom. pp. 327—342.]

(20.) Vanity.] 'The Gr. has so extensive a meaning, that it may be expl. on any of the above interpretations, note, v. 19. &c. See Dr. A. C., and Schl.' Bloomf. 22 For we know that <sup>b</sup> the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now.

23 And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits <sup>c</sup> of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan <sup>d</sup> within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption <sup>e</sup> of our body.

24 For we are saved by hope <sup>f</sup>; but hope that is seen, is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope <sup>f</sup> for?

25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.

mony and mutual dependence, and because they all constitute and make up one world, are spoken of in the singular number as the creature. The sense of the apostle in these four vs. we may take in these observations: [1.] That there is a present vanity, which the creature, by reason of the sin of man, is made subject to, v. 20. the ground was cursed, and with it all the creatures became mutable and mortal. Under the bondage of corruption, v. 21. the creature contracted an impurity, deformity, and infirmity, and an enmity of one to another. When the world was drowned, it was made subject to vanity; and the whole species of creatures is designed for, and hastening to, a total dissolution by fire. Nor is it the least part of their vanity and bondage, that they are used, or abused rather, by men as instruments of sin; as when they are made the food and fuel of our lusts. And this, not willingly; all desire their own perfection and consummation: when made instruments of sin, it is not willingly. Or, They are thus captivated, not for any sin they had committed, but for man's sin; By reason of Him who hath subjected the same. Adam did it meritoriously [meritingly?]; the creatures being delivered to him, when he by sin delivered himself, he delivered them likewise into the bondage of corruption. God did it judicially; He passed a sentence on the creatures for the sin of man, by which they became subject. And this yoke (poor creatures) they bear, in hope that it will not be so always,—in hope that the creature itself;

V. 22. 'All creatures sigh together and are in anguish.' St. 'The Gr. (so the best critics) is to be taken in a metaphorical sense, for deep lamentation and extreme agony; without ascribing to the latter term any reference to its original acceptance. The chief cause was (not merely the political evils of that time, as Koppe, nor mortality, as Locke and Ros., but their conviction of sin, and fear of punishment from an offended God, whom they know not how to appease, nor how to obtain expiation and atonement.'

BLOOMF.
(23.) They. 'So . . . (our) adoption as children, the redemption,' &c. St. Turner, in Bl. thus nently paraphrases vs. 18—23. 'I consider that the afflictions to which we are now subject, do not in the least counter-balance the blessings which the Gospel displays for our enjoyment. And (v. 13.) such blessings as, by the Gospel, God imparts to his children, (that is to say,) an amelioration of the present unhappy state of the world, vast numbers of mankind are ardently expecting. And (v. 20.) this is a reasonable expectation; for although mankind are subject, in their present state, to frailty and death, by the providence of God, permitting it, for wise purposes, it was not in consequence of any direct act of their own, and therefore they entertain the hope (v. 21.) that they shall be delivered from their present miserable situation, and brought into that state of happiness, of present favor with God, and of well-grounded expectation of future bliss, which Christians now enjoy (v. 22.) For it is well known, that, till the present day, mankind have been earnestly longing for some such improvement of state and character as the Gospel offers (23.) And not they only, not merely the great mass of the Gentile world, but we Christians also, who are already partakers of the privileges of the Gospel, even we ardently aspire after its full blessings, when our adoption, as God's children, shall be publicly recognised, by the deliverance of our bodies from corruptibility at the general resurrection.'

so many Greek copies join the words. We have reason to pity the poor creatures, that for our sin are become subject to vanity. [2.] That the creatures groan and travail in pain together under this vanity and corruption, v. 22. It is a figurative expression. Sin is a burden to the whole creation; the sin of the Jews, in crucifying Christ, set the earth a quaking under them. Comp. Is. 46: 1. Hab. 2: 11. Job 31: 38. [3.] That the creature, that is now thus burdened, shall, at the time of the restitution of all things, be delivered from this bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God, v. 21. shall no more be subject to vanity and corruption, and the other fruits of the curse; but, on the contrary, this lower world shall be renewed: when there will be new heavens, there will be a new earth, 2 Pet. 3: 13. Rev. 21: 1. and there shall be a glory conferred on all the creatures, which shall be (in the proportion of their natures) as suitable and as great an advancement as the glory of the children of God shall be to them. The fire at the last day shall be a refining, not a destroying, annihilating fire. What comes of the souls of brutes, that go downward, none can tell. But it should seem by the Scripture there will be some kind of restoration of them. And if it be objected, What use will they be of to glorified saints? we may suppose them of as much use as they were to Adam in innocency; and if it be only to illustrate the wisdom, power, and goodness of their Creator, that is enough. Comp. with this, Ps. 96: 10—13. 98: 7—9. [4.] That the creature doth therefore earnestly expect and wait for the manifestation of the children of God, v. 19. Now the saints are God's hidden ones, the wheat seems lost in a heap of chaff; but then they shall be manifested. 1 John 3: 2. And this redemption of the creature is reserved till then; for as it was with man, and for man, that they fell under the curse, so with man, and for man, they shall be delivered. This the whole creation looks and longs for; and it may serve as a reason why now a good man should be merciful to his beast.

[1.] The grounds of this expectation in the saints. It is our having received the first-fruits of the Spirit; which both quickens our desires, and encourages our hopes, and both ways raises our expectations. The first-fruits did both sanctify and insure the lump. Grace is the first-fruits of glory, it is glory begun. We, having received such clusters in this wilderness, cannot but long for the full vintage in the heavenly Canaan. Not only they; not only the creatures, who are not capable of such a happiness as the first-fruits of the Spirit; but even we, who have such present rich receivings, cannot but long for something more and greater. We groan within ourselves; which denotes the strength and secrecy of these desires. Or, among ourselves. It is the unanimous vote, the joint desire of the whole church, all agree in this; Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Present receivings and comforts are consistent with many groans; not as the pangs of one dying, but as the throes of a woman in travail; groans that are symptoms of life, not of death.

[2.] The object of this expectation; The adoption; to wit, the redemption of our body. The resurrection is here called the redemption of the body. It shall then be rescued from the power of death and the grave, and the bondage of corruption; and though a vile body, yet it shall be refined and beautified, and made like that glorious body of Christ, Phil. 3: 21. 1 Cor. 15: 42. This adoption is that manifested before all the world, angels and men. The deed of adoption, now written, signed, and sealed, will then be recognised, proclaimed, and published. As Christ was, so the saints will be, declared to be the sons of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, ch. 1: 4. It is the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls; and till those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, the adoption is not perfect. But then it will be complete, when the Captain of our salvation shall bring the many sons to glory, Heb. 2: 10. Ps. 16: 9, 10. Job 14: 14, 15.

[3.] The agreeableness of this to our present state, v. 24, 25. Our happiness is not in present possession; We are saved by hope. It is acknowledged that one of the principal graces of a Christian, is hope, 1 Cor. 13: 13. which necessarily implies a good thing to come, as the object of that hope. Faith respects the promise, hope the thing promised. Faith is the evidence, hope the expectation, of things not seen. Faith is the mother of hope. We do with patience wait. In hoping for this glory, we have need of patience, to bear the sufferings we meet with in the way to it, and the delays of it.

V. 26—28. The apostle here suggests two privileges more, which true Christians are entitled to.

I. The help of the Spirit in prayer. Hope supposes desire, and desire, offered up to God, is prayer; we groan. Observe,

1. Our weakness in prayer; We know not what we should pray for as we ought, both as to matter and manner. We are not competent judges of our own condition, Eccl. 6: 12. short-sighted, very much biassed in favor of the flesh, and apt to separate the end from the way, Mat. 20: 22. like foolish children, ready to cry for fruit before it is

V. 24—27. True believers are saved 'by,' or in, 'hope;' they have been actually brought into a state of safety; but their comfort consists 'in hope,' rather than fruition. The future felicity of the saints will chiefly consist in beholding the manifested glory of God; * some glimpses by faith they here 'see, as in a glass darkly;' for the full vision and fruition of his glory they hope, and wait, in reliance on his promise, and 'by patient continuance in well doing,' amidst manifold trials and temptations; and from this hope they cannot be diverted, by the vain expectation of finding satisfaction in the things of time and sense. Mind of, &c. 'The phrase is here . . . the very same as in v. 6.; and expresses, not merely the meaning, but the temper and disposition, of the mind, as under the influences of the Divine Spirit, pursuing and breathing after such blessings, as suit its rational and immortal nature.' Doctr. 5—9. Eph. 6: 18—20, v. 18.—The clause, in one of the collects of our liturgy, seems well to express this: 'That they may love the thing which Thou commandest, and desire that which Thou dost promise.' When the Holy Spirit produces this state of the judgment and affections; the prayers which spring from it will be graciously accepted, through our heavenly Advocate, by the holy, heart-searching God.

(21.) 'For even we are saved (only) in hope.' STUART.
(26.) Infirmities. 'Recent comtrs. (from Grot.) explain griefs from adversity, but it also comprehends all those infirmities, frailties, and weaknesses, arising from the flesh, which disincite us to sustain the trials and temptations of virtue, and, indeed, indispose to discern our real good, or to form such prayers as may be acceptable to God. This ignorance of our real good, and consequent inability to pray for it aright, was not unknown to the heathen sages. Pythagoras, says Diog. Laert.,

* This phraseology, though common, gives us, of course, a very inadequate idea of the progressive, busy, happy life of obedience, Christians will hereafter enjoy: for certainly more than a single faculty, that of sight, will be immortal.

27 And he <sup>h</sup> that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, <sup>i</sup> because he maketh intercession for the saints according <sup>j</sup> to the will of God.

28 And we know <sup>k</sup> that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

29 For whom he did <sup>l</sup> foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren.

ripe, and fit for them, Luke 9:54, 55.; we know not how to pray as we ought: we are often at a loss; graces are weak, affections cold, thoughts wandering: and it is not always easy to find the heart to pray, 2 S. 7:27. The apostle speaks of this in the first person; We know not. He puts himself among the rest. Folly, and weakness, and distraction in prayer, are what all saints complain of.

2. The assistances the Spirit gives us in that duty. He helps our infirmities; meant especially of our praying infirmities, which most easily beset us in that duty, against which the Spirit helps, in the Word, in the heart, dwelling in us, working in us, as a Spirit of grace and supplication; especially with respect to the infirmities we are under when in a suffering state, when our faith is most apt to fail; for this end the Holy Ghost was poured out. Helpeth, heaves with us, over against us, as we help one that would lift a burden, by lifting over-against him at the other end; helps with us, with us doing our endeavor, putting forth the strength we have. We cannot without God, and He will not without us. What help? Why, the Spirit itself makes intercession for us, dictates our requests, indites our petitions, draws up our plea; Christ intercedes for us in heaven, the Spirit, in our hearts; so graciously has God provided for the encouragement of the praying. The Spirit, as an enlightening Spirit, teaches us what to pray for; as a sanctifying Spirit, works and excites our praying graces; as a comforting Spirit, silences our fears, and helps us over all discouragements. The Holy Spirit is the Spring of all our desires and breathings toward God. Now this intercession which the Spirit makes is, (1.) With groanings that cannot be uttered. The strength and fervency of those desires which the Holy Spirit works, are hereby intimated. There may be praying in the Spirit, where there is not a word spoken, Ex. 14:15. 1 S. 1:13. Cannot be uttered; they are so confused, the soul is in such a hurry with temptations and troubles, we know not what to say, nor how to express ourselves. (2.) According to the will of God, v. 27. The Spirit in the heart never contradicts the Spirit in the Word. The Spirit interceding in us evermore, melts our wills into the will of God. Not as I will but as Thou wilt.

3. The sure success of these intercessions; He that searches the heart, knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, v. 27. To a hypocrite, nothing is more dreadful, than that God searches the heart, and sees through all his disguises. To a sincere Christian, nothing is more comfortable than that God searches the heart, for then He will hear and answer those desires we want words to express. He knows what we have need of before we ask, Mat. 6:8. He knows what is the mind of his own Spirit in us. And as He always hears the Son interceding for us, so He always hears the Spirit interceding in us, because his intercession is according to the will of God.

What could have been done more for the comfort of the Lord's people, in all their addresses to God? Christ had said, 'Whatever you ask the Father according to his will, He will give it you.' But how shall we learn to ask according to his will? Why the Spirit will teach us that. Therefore it is, that the seed of Jacob never seek in vain.

II. The concurrence of all providences for the good of those that are Christ's, v. 28. It might be objected, that, notwithstanding all these privileges, we see believers compassed about with manifold afflictions; though the Spirit makes intercession for them, yet their troubles are continued. It is very true; but in this the Spirit's intercession is always effectual, that, however it goes with them, all this is working together for their good. Observe here,

1. The character of the saints, who are interested in this privilege, here described by properties common to all that are truly sanctified. (1.) They love God. This includes all the outgoings of the soul's affections toward God, as the chiefest good and highest end. (2.) They are the called according to his purpose; effectually called according to the eternal purpose.

2. The privilege of the saints, that all things work together for good to them, i. e. all the providences of God that concern them. Their sins are not of his performing, therefore not intended here, though his permitting of sin is made to work for their good, 2 Chr. 32:31. But all the providences of God are theirs; merciful providences, afflicting providences, personal, public: they are all for good; perhaps for temporal good, as Joseph's troubles; however, for spiritual and eternal good; directly or indirectly, every providence has a tendency to the spiritual good of those that love God, [comp. Note, Job 36:1.] breaking them off from sin, bringing them nearer to God, weaning them from the world, fitting them for heaven. Work together: as physic on the body, various ways, according to the intention of the physician, but all for the patient's good; work together, as several ingredients in a medicine concur to answer the intention. All this we know; know it for a certainty, from the Word of God, from our own experience, and from the experience of all the saints.

V. 29, 30. The apostle, having reckoned up so many ingredients of the happiness of true believers, comes here to represent the ground of them all, which he lays in predestination. For the explication of which, he here sets before us the order of the causes of our salvation, a golden chain, which cannot be broken. There are four links of it. 1. Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. All that God designed for glory and happiness as the end, He decreed to grace and holiness as the way. Not, whom He did foreknow to be holy, them He predestinated to be so. The counsels and decrees of God, do not truckle to the frail and fickle will of men; no, God's foreknowledge of the saints is the same with that everlasting love wherewith He is said to have loved them, Jer. 31:3. God's knowing his people, is the same with his owning of them, Ps. 1:6. John 10:14. 2 Tim. 2:19. See ch. 11:2. Words of knowledge often in Scripture denote affection: so here: Elect according to the foreknowledge of God, 1 Pet. 1:2. And the same word is rendered fore-ordained, 1 Pet. 1:20. Whom He did foreknow, that is, whom He designed for his did not permit [his disciples, or some of them?] to pray for themselves, because they knew not what was fit." Bl. Hodge, from this, asserts too broadly, it seems, that 'the heathen philosophers gave this as a reason why men ought not to pray.' Let us judge the benighted heathen, of old, and now, with more candor, if we must at all. We are too apt, perhaps, to consider them as destitute of every virtue. With groanings. 'In sighs.' St. 'The Holy Spirit intercedes, not as Mediator, by virtue of his own merit, which is Christ's only, but as Advocate, who excites the faithful, as it were his clients, to prayer, shows them what they are to pray for, and cherishes their hope of obtaining their petitions.' So Erasmus, Beza, Estius, Par., Grot., Wolf, Bl. &c. 'The intercession of the H. S. differs from the intercession of Christ, as well in respect of person as of office. For the H. S. is the allos Paraklētōs [another Comforter] promised by Christ, John 14:16. It differs in these respects: 1. That the H. S. is our Paraclete, by virtue of his abiding and dwelling in the heart (v. 37); but Christ, by virtue of his office, as Sponsor, or Advocate in heaven. (Heb. 9-24.)—2. That Christ intercedes with the Father formally, as God-man, Mediator, and our High Priest, by virtue of his own merit: (Heb. 7:25.) But the H. S., sent by the Father and the Son to the faithful, intercedes effectively in the heart, as our Helper, by strengthening us from the efficacy of Christ's merits, and claiming it for us as our own, by faith, (2 Cor. 4:12.) by impelling us to prayer, and suggesting to us how we ought to supplicate (Zech. 12:10.): by exciting in our hearts spiritus occulta ineffabilique to the heavenly Father (3:26.): finally, by Himself praying, as it were, in us, for us, so that we by Him cry Abba, Father, 3:15. Gal. 4:6. Carppz. Cannot be uttered. Rather, unspoken. Bl. tr. 'low whisperings and secret suggestions.' Wets. 'those made in imo pectore. [the recesses of the breast;] and not uttered with the voice, so as to be heard.' En.

V. 23-31. All things. Providential appointments are doubtless primarily intended: but as these often lead men into temptation, and so prove occasions of sin, we could have no assurance that they would 'all work together for good,' if we were absolutely to except the effects of our own sin and folly. Gen. 22:1. The sins, indeed, even of true believers, are not always overruled for their increase of present grace, or of future glory; in this respect they 'snuff loss, and are saved as by fire.' 1 Cor. 3:10-15. yet the whole concurs, as one complex plan, to prepare them for the inheritance intended for them; and many of their own mistakes and miscarriages, being deeply repented of, work together eminently for their humiliation, and the increase of their grateful love. As far as they act in character, and live in the habitual exercise of 'love to God,' all things concur in augmenting their final recompense. [Note, Job 36:3-14.] When they act out of character, corrections, and perhaps terrors, will be employed to bring them back again; and if a man allow himself in sin, expecting to derive good from it, he 'does evil that good may come,' he 'sins on that grace may abound,' he bears the broad mark of a hypocrite, and 'his damnation will be just.' So that we need not invalidate this animating assurance, to guard it from the perversion of wicked men, as some have done, to the great discouragement of humble Christians; who fear nothing so much by far, even in their sharpest afflictions, as their own lamented propensity to sin. John 10:26-31.—The persons intended, once did not 'love God'; 5-9. 5:7-10. but they had been 'called' into a state of reconciliation and love to Him, according to his purpose and choice of them, which He will never suffer to be frustrated. Having, in his infinite, but incomprehensible wisdom and righteousness, permitted the fall and apostasy of man; He looked upon the whole human species as deserving of destruction, and meet for it; yet, purposing to provide and reveal a gracious salvation to them, for the glory of his name, He knew that they would as certainly reject this salvation, as they would break his holy law. For reasons, therefore, not revealed to us, He determined to leave some deservedly to perish in obstinate enmity; and graciously to recover others by regeneration and efficacious grace. These 'He foreknew,' not merely in respect of external privileges, or as a part of favored nations, but as individually chosen to eternal life; for, in consequence of this foreknowledge, 'He predestinated, or before decreed them' to be conformed to the image of his Son.' Acts 2:22-24. . . . Sanctification is not expressly mentioned in this golden chain; but 'predestination to be conformed to the image' of Christ, effectual calling, and final glory, so describe the beginning, the progress, and the consummation of sanctification, that no omission can in this respect be imputed to the apostle. In the language of faith and hope, he speaks of the whole work as already done, because ensured by the purposes and promises of God; and he demands what can be said unto, or against, such things.—From this and similar passages, some persons have absurdly spoken of our having been justified from eternity, &c. but the fixed intention of doing anything, is perfectly dis-

30 Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also <sup>m</sup> called: and whom he called, them he also <sup>n</sup> justified: and whom he justified, them he also <sup>o</sup> glorified.

31 What shall we then say to these things? If <sup>p</sup> God be for us, who can be against us?

32 He <sup>q</sup> that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?

friends and favorites. Ex. 33:12. Now those whom God thus foreknew, He did predestinate to be conformed to Christ. (1.) Holiness consists in our conformity to the image of Christ. That takes in the whole of sanctification, of which Christ is the great pattern and sampler. (2.) All that God hath from eternity foreknown with favor, He hath predestinated to this conformity. It is not we that can conform ourselves to Christ; our giving of ourselves to Christ, takes rise in God's giving of us to Him: and in giving us to Him, He predestinated us to be conformable to his image. It is a mere cavil, therefore, to call the doctrine of election a licentious doctrine; and to argue that it gives encouragement to sin, as if the end were separated from the way, and happiness from holiness. None can know their election but by their conformity to Christ; for all that are chosen are chosen to sanctification, 2 Thess. 2:13. and surely it cannot be a temptation to any to be conformed to the world, to believe that they were predestinated to be conformed to Christ. (3.) What is herein chiefly designed, is, the honor of Christ, that He might be the First-born among many brethren; have the honor of being the great Pattern, as well as the great Prince; and in this, as in other things, might have pre-eminence. And blessed be God that there are many brethren; though but a few in one place, at one time, yet, when all together, a great many. There is, therefore, a distinct from the actual performance of it. God as absolutely determined the final glorification of every believer, as He did the justification of every elect person; we might then as well say, they have been glorified in body and soul from all eternity; this could not be more absurd or unscriptural, than the notion of being justified from eternity; and probably it would be less capable of perversion.—Dr. Whitby says, that all the fathers, before Augustine, understood this passage of those, 'whom God foresaw would love Him?' But does God foresee, that any of our race, while unregenerate, will love Him? Eph. 1:3-8. And is not the clause, 'called according to his purpose,' of the same import as regenerated? And can this choice of some, rather than others, of our fallen race, because of something spiritually good in them, as the ground of it, in order to their being thus 'called,' possibly consist with the doctrines of original sin, or the total depravity of human nature, and of a regeneration from the death of sin to the life of righteousness? Does it not border on Pelagianism? This, however, gives up the notion of a national election being intended. Indeed, if all the Gentiles, or all the inhabitants of any one nation, whom God foreknew, and determined to call into his church, be actually 'conformed to the image of Christ,' and 'justified,' and shall, without exception, partake of eternal glory; the interpretation of the passage, as referring to the election of collective bodies, may stand; but otherwise it cannot. So that, if this were the only passage, in which the humiliating subject was expressly mentioned; we might confidently maintain, that the doctrine of individual predestination to eternal life, and the authority of the apostle as an inspired writer, must stand or fall together. Nothing more fully shows this, than the difficulties to which its very learned and sagacious opposers are reduced; and the different and discordant grounds on which they rest their cause: for they scarcely agree in anything, but in determining to oppose the most natural and obvious meaning of the words. Perhaps the apostle's doctrine was never more justly expressed by any uninspired writer, than in the former part of the seventeenth article of our church. 'Predestination unto life, is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) He hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom He hath chosen in Christ out of mankind; and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honor. Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made the sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.'

(28.) 'To those who are called.' St. Being united with 'loving God,' this word must mean those who also obey that calling and embrace the Gospel. See Bl. &c. Purpose.] 'Will, good pleasure.' Bl. There certain number predestinated, that the end of Christ's undertaking might be infallibly secured.

2. Whom He did predestinate, them He also called. Not only with the external call; many are so called, that were not chosen, Mat. 20:16. 22:14. but with the internal and effectual call. The former comes to the ear only, this to the heart. All that God did from eternity predestinate to grace and glory, He does, in the fulness of time, effectually call. The call is then effectual, when we come at the call; and we then come at the call, when the Spirit draws us, convinces the conscience of guilt and wrath, enlightens the understanding, bows the will, persuades and enables us to embrace Christ in the promises, makes us willing in the day of his power. Them He called, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand; we are called to that to which we were chosen. So that the only way to make our election sure, is, to make sure our calling, 2 Pet. 1:10.

3. Whom He called, effectually called, them He also justified; absolved from guilt, and accepted as righteous through Jesus Christ: no sin they have ever been guilty of, shall come against them, to condemn them. Those that stand it out against the Gospel call, abide under guilt and wrath.

4. Whom He justified, them He also glorified. The power of corruption being broken in effectual calling, and the guilt of sin removed in justification, all that hinders is taken out of the way, and nothing can come between that soul and glory. Observe, It is spoken of as a thing done, He glorified, because of the certainty of it; He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling. In the eternal glorification of all the elect, God's design of love has its full accomplishment; created wills are fickle, created powers feeble, but this God Himself hath undertaken the doing of, from first to last, that we might abide in a constant hope in, and dependence on, and subjection to Him, and ascribe all the praise to Him; that every crown may be cast before the throne.

V. 31-39. The apostle closes his discourse on the privileges of believers with a holy triumph, in the name of all the saints, What shall we then say? What use shall we make of all that has been said? He speaks as one amazed and swallowed up with the contemplation and admiration of it, wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. The more we know of other things, the less we wonder at them; but the further we are led into an acquaintance with gospel-mysteries, the more we are affected with the admiration of them. If ever Paul rode in a triumphant chariot, on this side heaven, here it was: with such a holy height and bravery of spirit, with such a fluency and copiousness of expression, does he here comfort himself, and all the people of God, on the consideration of these privileges.

In general, he here makes a challenge, dares all the enemies of the saints to do their worst: The ground of the challenge is, God's being for us; for, if so, who can be against us, so as to prevail, so as to hinder our happiness? Be they ever so great, strong, many, mighty, malicious, what can they do? While God is for us, and we keep in his love, we may with a holy boldness defy all the powers of darkness. Who then dares fight against us, when God Himself is fighting for us? And this we say to these things, this is the inference we draw from these premises.

I. We have supplies ready in all our wants, v. 32.

1. Observe what God has done for us, on which our hopes are built; He spared not his own Son; was willing to part with Him, did not think Him too precious a gift to bestow for the salvation of poor souls; now we may know He loves us, in that He hath not withheld his Son, his own Son, his only Son, from us, as He said of Abraham, Gen. 22:12. Thus did He deliver Him up for us all, for all the elect, for us all; not only for our good, but in our stead, as a sacrifice of atonement, to be a propitiation for sin.

2. What we may therefore expect He will do; with Him freely give us all things. It is implied, He will give us Christ, for other seems a reference to the doctrine (so great a mystery to the Jews) of the calling of the Gentiles. Eph. 3:1-11. Turner, Bl. &c. Chrys. thinks, 'this v., and most of the preceding, are to be considered with a view to the peculiar trials and persecutions of the Christians of Rome.' See Bloomf.

(29.) 'The most judicious agree, that this whole passage has a direct reference to the calling of the Gentiles. Did foreknow.] Many comtrs. tr. "hath from eternity loved:" but for this use of the simple verb, the authority is very weak, and for the compound none at all. Besides, in the consideration of so very important a portion of S., nothing but the most rigid accuracy can guide us to the true meaning. With Koppe, I retain the common tr., especially as it includes the other. The sense (and so Wetst. and Kop.) is; "If any one is brought to the religion of Christ, that is not to be attributed to accident and fortune, but solely to the eternal and most wise counsel of God." See 1 Pet. 1:2, 20. Acts 2:23. Bloomf. Some ask, does the apostle here teach, that the Great Disposer of events so arranges things, that some have circumstances, condition, imagination, privileges, and disposition, education, &c. more favorable to true religion than others, and all this, as well as their conduct in this state, is perfectly known to God from eternity? Bloomf. thinks, it would be extraordinary, indeed, if Paul, who all along speaks of communities, and even in this ch., should here mean 'individuals; and that the prothesis in v. 28. refers to a community, is evident by the meaning in the parallel place, Eph. 3:3.' But see Scott. First-begotten, and First-born Son, are terms applied to the Logos by Philo; and see Koppe. Id.

(30.) Called.] 'Simply invited to participate in the benefits of the Christian religion.' Ros. 'The absolute necessity of holiness to salvation is the very subject of the apostle's discourse.' Turner. 'In v. 28 and 29. are mentioned the divine benefits before the creation of the world, i. e. from eternity. 1. The prothesis, or determinate purpose of granting felicity to those who should believe in Christ to the end of life. 2. The prognosis, the prescience of God, (conjoined with his love,) by which He foreknew all and each who would believe in Christ. 3. The prodrismos, the determination and decree of conferring eternal happiness on all and each of them. At v. 30. are enumerated the divine benefits granted in this life: (1.) Hē klēsis, calling to faith, or an offering of grace, which here comprehends actual conversion, and regeneration; since God illumines the intellect of man by the Holy Ghost, sways the will, and confers faith on those who do not perversely reject his offer. (2.) Dikaiōsis, justification, by which is meant, the being declared just by God, and absolved from guilt and punishment. (3.) Doxa, glorification, which takes its commencement in renovation and sanctification, and is perfected in life eternal.' Yet see Scott, ns above. CARPZ.

V. 32-34. The omnipotence and omniscience of God had been, in the preceding v., opposed to the puny efforts of every enemy: here, his former benefits are shown to be assured pledges of final felicity, to all real Christians. All things in heaven and earth, the universal creation, 33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth.

34 Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.

35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?

36 As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.

37 Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us.

things are bestowed with Him: He will with Him freely give us all things, all things that He sees needful and necessary for us; all good things, and more we would not desire, Ps. 34:10. Freely give; freely, without reluctancy; He is ready to give; freely, without recompense, without money, and without price. How shall He not? Can it be imagined, that He should do the greater, and not the less? That He should give so great a gift for us, when we were enemies, and should deny us any good thing, now that through Him we are friends and children?

II. We have an answer ready to all accusations, and a security against all condemnations, v. 33, 34. Doth the law, their own consciences, or the devil, the accuser of the brethren, accuse them? This is enough to answer, It is God that justifieth. Men may justify themselves, as the Pharisees did, and yet the accusations be in full force against them; but if God justifies, that answers all. Who is he that condemneth? Though they cannot make good the charge, yet they will be ready to condemn; but we have a plea ready to move in arrest of judgment, a plea which cannot be overruled. It is Christ that died, &c. It is by virtue of our interest in Christ, our relation to Him, and our union with Him, that we are thus secured. By the merit of his death, He paid our debt; and his resurrection is a convincing evidence, that divine justice was satisfied by the merit of his death. His resurrection was his acquittance, it was a legal discharge. Therefore the apostle mentions it with a yea rather. If He had died, and not risen again, we had been where we were. So his sitting at the right hand of God, is a further evidence, that He had done his work, and denotes, that He is ready there, always at hand, and ruling there; all power is given to Him. Our friend is Himself the Judge. Moreover, He is there, not unconcerned about us, not forgetful of us, but making intercession. He is agent for us there; an Advocate for us, to answer all accusations, to put in our plea, and to prosecute it with effect, to appear for us, and to present our petitions. And is not this abundant matter for comfort?

Some understand the accusation and condemnation here spoken of, of that which the suffering saints met with from men. The primitive Christians had many black crimes laid to their charge,—heresy, sedition, rebellion, and what not? For these the ruling powers condemned them; 'But no matter for that;' (says the apostle;) 'while we stand right at God's bar, it is of no great moment how we stand at men's. To all the hard censures, the malicious calumnies, and the unjust and unrighteous sentences of men, we may with comfort oppose our justification before God, through Christ Jesus, as that which doth abundantly countervail,' 1 Cor. 4:3, 4.

III. We have good assurance of our preservation and continuance in this blessed state, v. 35. to the end. We have here,

1. A daring challenge to all the enemies of the saints, to separate them, if they could, from the love of Christ. Who shall? None shall, v. 35—37. God having manifested his love in giving his own Son for us, and not hesitating at that, can we imagine that anything else should divert or dissolve that love? Observe here, (1.) The present calamities of Christ's beloved ones, supposed a very black and dismal case, illustrated, v. 36. by a passage quoted from Ps. 44:22. which intimates, that we are not to think strange, no, not concerning the fiery, bloody trial; for the O. T. saints had the same lot; so persecuted they the prophets that were before us. Killed all the day long, continually exposed to, and expecting, the fatal stroke. Accounted as sheep for the slaughter; they make no more of killing a Christian, than of butchering a sheep. They kill them to please themselves, to be food to their malice. They eat up my people as they eat bread, Ps. 14:4. (2.) The inability of all these things to separate us from the love of Christ. Shall they, can they, do it? No, by no means. Christ doth not, will not, love us the less for all this. We do not, will not, love Him the less for this; and that for this reason, because we do not think that He loves us the less. (3.) The triumph of believers in this, v. 37. We are conquerors: though killed all the day long, yet conquerors, Rev. 12:11. Nay, not only conquerors, but more than conquerors, i. e. triumphers. Those are more than conquerors, that conquer with little loss, and great gain. The spoils are exceeding rich; glory, honor, and peace, a crown of righteousness that fades not away; but the loss is only the dross the gold loses in the furnace. In this the suffering saints have triumphed; not only have not been separated from the love of Christ, but have been taken into the most sensible endearments and embraces of it. As afflictions abound, consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. 1:5. There is one more than a conqueror, when pressed above measure. He that embraced the stake, and said, 'Welcome the cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life;' He that said, 'In these flames I feel no more pain, than if I were on a bed of down;' Those that have gone smiling to the stake, and stood singing in the flames; these were more than conquerors. But it is only through Christ that loved us; the merit of his death taking the sting out of all these troubles: the Spirit of his grace strengthening us, and enabling us to bear them with holy courage and constancy, and coming in with special comforts and supports. Thus we are conquerors, not in our own strength, but in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. He hath overcome the world for us, John 16:33. both the good things and the evil things of it; so that we have nothing else to do but to pursue the victory, and to divide the spoil, and so are more than conquerors.

2. A direct and positive conclusion of the whole matter; For I am persuaded, v. 38, 39. It denotes a full, and strong, and affectionate persuasion, arising from the experience of the strength and sweetness of the divine love: enumerating all those things which might be supposed likely to separate between Christ and believers, (1.) Neither death nor life; neither the terrors of death on the one hand, nor the comforts and pleasures of life on the other; neither the fear of death, nor the hope of life. Or, we shall not be separated from that love, either in death or in life. (2.) Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers. Both the good angels and the bad are called principalities and powers: the good, Eph. 1:21. Col. 1:16. the bad, Eph. 6:12. Col. 2:15. And neither shall do it. The good will not, the bad shall not; and neither can. The good are engaged friends, the bad restrained enemies. (3.) Nor things present, nor things to come: neither the sense of troubles present, nor the fear of troubles to come. Time shall not separate us, eternity shall not. Things present separate us from things to come, and things to come from things present; but neither from the love of Christ, whose favor is twisted in with both present things and things to come. (4.) Nor height, nor depth: neither the height of prosperity and preferment, nor the depth of adversity and disgrace; nothing from heaven above, no storms, no tempests; nothing on earth below, no rocks, no seas, no dungeons. (5.) Nor any other creature: anything that can be named or thought of; it will not, it cannot, yea, the everlasting enjoyment of the Creator Himself, as their Portion, are not so great a display of his free love to them, as the gift of his co-equal Son to be the atonement on the cross for their sins; and all the rest necessarily follows on their union with Him, and interest in Him. John 3:16. The emphasis is evidently here laid, not on Christ, as incarnate, being given up to death for us; but in God's giving his own Son to become incarnate for such a purpose.

(32.) 'The apostle has set forth the benevolence of God in the divine decrees; which, however, being as it were hidden in God, he brings forward a palpable and indubitable proof of his love; as much as to say: He who gave the greater, shall He not also give the less?' Crellius. Chrys., with his usual fine taste, observes, that the words are spoken with hyperbole and great warmth. The expressions are indeed extremely energetic, and pregnant with meaning. For us.] Crell. interp. this, "for our benefit." But it also means, "for our expiation;" although Ros. says, "in our stead." Causâ locoque nostro. Kop.

V. 35—39. As infinite and unchangeable power and love are engaged in behalf of all believers, and the mercy already shown them is greater than all that which is further needful; they may even triumph on the field of battle, and exult amidst their conflicts and groans.—It is frivolous to say, that sin, being no creature of God, may separate the believer from his love, notwithstanding all this: for such a restriction wholly invalidates the passage. Tribulation, persecution, the terror of death, the frowns or smiles of the world, and the machinations of evil spirits, have not the smallest tendency to 'separate us from the love of God,' except as they prove occasions of sin. Professed believers, in such circumstances, often forsake God, and perish; but 'all his saints are in his hand,' and 'are kept by his power through faith unto salvation:' so that they either resist and overcome every temptation; or if baffled and foiled, they are brought back by convictions and corrections, with penitent tears and fervent supplications; and they dread suffering chiefly, because they fear lest it should prove the occasion of indwelling sin gaining some victory over them. Luke 22:31—34. John 10:26—31. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.—If a man take encouragement to sin from such assurances, he renders it extremely probable that he has no interest in them: no one can triumph on this ground, who has not scriptural evidence of his conversion, and his love to God; 28:31. or take the warrantable comfort of them, except he is, at present, striving against sin, and harassed by fears lest some future event should give that detested and dreaded foe a fatal advantage over him. We must not, therefore, take the cordials from the weary and almost fainting combatants, because others unwarrantably seize on them, and fatally intoxicate themselves with them. (39) Creature.] 'Created thing.' St.

(35) Tribulation . . distress.] 'Affliction . . anguish.' St. 'The words are all modifications of misery arising from persecution.' BL.

38 For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. It cannot cut off or impair our love to God, or God's to us; nothing does it, can do it, but sin. Observe, The love between God and true believers, is through Christ; it is in and through Him that God can love us, and we dare love God.

39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

An eminent Christian, when dying, called for a Bible; but finding his sight gone, he said, Turn me to the eighth of the Romans, and set my finger at those words, I am persuaded that neither death nor life, &c. 'Now,' said he, 'is my finger on them?' And when they told him it was, without speaking any more, he said, 'Now, God be with you, my children; I have breakfasted with you, and shall sup with my Lord Jesus Christ this night;' and so departed.

PRACT. OBS. What can a worldly life present to our view, worthy for a moment to be put in competition with the noble 'prize of our high calling?' All that we owe to the flesh, [the corruptness of propensity,] is a holy revenge for the injuries already done, and the hindrances continually given us: and instead of rendering our state doubtful, by living after it in any degree; we should, by the Spirit, continually endeavor, more and more entirely, to mortify it, and repress all its actings. Thus, giving up ourselves to be 'led by the Spirit,' our adoption will be manifest, we shall gradually be emancipated from servile motives and fears, and shall trust and obey God.—It is the will of our heavenly Father.

(38.) 'Sure I am, that, in the whole universe, there is nought that can seduce me to desert the religion of Christ. Koppe. To me it appears, that the most powerful things and persons are mentioned first: 1. No fear of death, no hope of life. 2. No being, however powerful, no, not even angels, principalities, nor powers, [i. e. magistrates, presidents, even the emperor himself, Wets.] Angels are, therefore, simply mentioned, as being the most powerful of God's creatures: and thus it is needless to refine upon the mode [of temptation, opposition, &c.] It would be scarcely necessary to notice, (were it not for the error of some comtrs.,) that archai and dunamis do not express other orders of angels, still less demons (though the Jews believed in several kinds of such; see Koppe); but human powers, archai denoting the principal, dunamis, the inferior ones; and both (like exousia, kuriotes, &c.) are abstracts instead of concretes; as is remarked by Grot., who rightly numbers this idiom among oratorisms. Comp. 1 Cor. 3:22.' BLOOMF.

NOTES. CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. From the apostle's arguing so strenuously for 'salvation by grace,' 'through faith' alone, without any respect to the Mosaic law, or the peculiar privileges of the Jews; it might, perhaps, be inferred, that he had no great attachment to his countrymen; nay, that the persecutions he had endured from them, had alienated him from them. Being, therefore, about still more fully to discuss the subject, of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and to resolve the whole into the sovereign, electing love of God; he introduced these topics, by expressing, in the most energetic language, his cordial affection for his people. The appeal is evidently equivalent to a solemn oath. Now, an oath being an act of religious worship, the apostle, by thus solemnly appealing to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Spirit, fully shows, that he considered them as entitled to religious worship, as one with the Father. Mat. 28:19, 20. (3) Accursed from Christ, or, after the manner of Christ; to be excommunicated from his visible church, loaded with infamy, crucified, or in any way put to the utmost pain and disgrace; or even for a time to be excluded from all the comfort of communion with Christ, and shut up under the deepest horror and distress of mind which could be endured without sin; if, by any personal sufferings of his own, that could consist with his final salvation, he might rescue his beloved brethren and kinsmen, from that national and personal destruction, which he saw was about to come upon them for their obstinate unbelief. Ex. 32:30—33.—This seems to be the utmost the apostle could mean; * as it would be utterly unlawful, on any consideration whatever, to wish to be eternally miserable, and an implacable enemy of God, as all who perish will be. 1 John 3:16, 17.—I could wish.] I have wished, &c., or prayed, so it may be tr. On some occasion, perhaps, the apostle had passionately wished, or prayed to this effect. This appears to me the

* The apostle speaks with strong emotion, and it seems not necessary, or just, to explain away the expression. The language is not to be taken as a sober, reasonable wish, but as a burst of feeling, uttered, as usual, in hyperbole. Ed.

CHAP. IX. The apostle, having asserted, and proved, that justification and salvation are to be had by faith only, and not by the works of the law, comes, in this and the following chs. to anticipate an objection. If this be so, then what becomes of the Jews, especially those that do not embrace Christ, nor believe the Gospel? Must they not come short of happiness; and then, what becomes of the promise to the fathers, which entailed salvation on the Jews? Is not that promise nullified, and made of none effect? Which is not a thing to be imagined concerning any word of God. That doctrine therefore, might they say, is not to be embraced, from which flows such a consequence. That the consequence of the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, follows from Paul's doctrine, he grants, but endeavors to soften and mollify, vs. 1—5. But that from thence it follows, that the Word of God takes no effect, he denies, v. 6. and proves the denial in the rest of the ch.; which serves likewise to illustrate the great doctrine of predestination, which he had spoken of, ch. 8:28. as the first wheel, which, in the business of salvation, sets all the other wheels a going.

V. 1—5. We have here the apostle's solemn profession of a great concern for the Jews: that he was heartily troubled, that so many of them were enemies to the Gospel, and out of the way of salvation. And, lest this should be thought only a copy of his countenance, to flatter and please them,

I. He asserts it with a solemn protestation, v. 1. 'I speak it as a Christian, one of God's people, that will not lie: as one that knows not how to give flattering titles.' Or, 'I appeal to Christ, who searches the heart.' He appeals likewise to his own conscience, which was instead of a thousand witnesses. What he was going to assert, was not only a great and weighty thing, but likewise secret; it was concerning a sorrow in his heart, to which none was a capable, competent witness, but God and his own conscience. That I have great heaviness, v. 2. He does not say for what; the very mention of it was unpleasant and invidious; but it is plain he means for the rejection of the Jews.

II. He backs it with a very serious imprecation, which he was ready to make, out of love to the Jews. I could wish; he does not say, I do wish, for it was no proper means appointed for such an end; but if it were, I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren,—a very high pang of zeal and affection for his countrymen. He would be willing to undergo the greatest misery to do them good. Love is apt to be thus bold and venturesome, and self-denying. Because the glory of God's grace in the salvation of many, is to be preferred before the welfare and happiness of a single person, Paul, if they were put in competition, would be content to forego all his own happiness, to purchase theirs.

1. He would be content to be cut off from the land of the living, in the most shameful and ignominious manner, as an anathema, or a devoted person. 'Abuse me as much as you will, count and call me at your pleasure; your unbelief, and rejection, create in my heart a heaviness, so much greater than all these troubles can, that I could look on them not only as tolerable, but as desirable, rather than this rejection.'

2. He would be content to be excommunicated from the society of the faithful, to be separated from the church, and from the communion of saints, as a heathen man and a publican, if that would do them any good.

that 'in the world we should have tribulations,' and have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, before we 'be glorified together' with Him.—Indeed, sin has filled the world with suffering, yea, with unspeakable disorder and misery; all creatures seem to proclaim man's fatal apostasy, and to recommend the inestimably precious salvation of Christ.—But the Gospel opens a brighter prospect; a glorious crisis approaches, of which all things seem in anxious expectation. May we then give diligence to ensure our interest in this redemption, and to possess 'the first-fruits of the Spirit, the earnest and pledge' of our inheritance.

One cause of the obscurity, Grot. says, is 'because, impartial to Jews and Gentiles he, in speaking secret and bitter things to both, passes, without due notice, from one to the other, and often loves to imply more than he says.' See Bloomf. Ed.—In chs. 9—11. [and so Chrys. and the Gr. comtrs., see BL.], the apostle argues with Jewish Christians. For at that time the Jewish state was fast tending to ruin, and God might seem to have forsaken his people, and to have taken others, (the Christians,) from all nations as his people, which indeed would appear extraordinary, and God, who had made so firm a covenant with the Jews, might be accused of inconstancy. It must, therefore, especially be borne in mind, that here the apostle is not speaking of the election of individuals to eternal salvation, but of the election of a whole nation, or nations, to be the people of God. For one nation's being the people of God never hinders the individuals of another from being converted to the one true God, and attaining salvation.—To remove, then, this scruple, Paul enters upon a separate treatment of this subject, of which the following are the contents: 1. We have a pre-occupatio, which was necessary, lest any one should think, from his having abandoned their religion, that certain things were said against them from a hostile feeling. (9:1—3. repeated in 10:1, 2.) 2. He shows that God had alone, of his good pleasure, chosen Jacob, rather than Esau; and that, therefore, the Israelites had not, by nature, any superiority, (9:4—33.) 3. That the Jews must submit to the divine dispensation; or otherwise, though they are the people of God, they will not be saved. (10:3—15.) 4. That they had always been disobedient. (V. 16—21.) 5. Therefore God justly rejected them, though He reserved to Himself some. (11:1—32.) 6. After which the apostle utters an exclamation of wonder, and praises God in his works. (V. 33—36.)—In 11:11—24. is introduced an admonition to the Gentile converts, not to suffer their reception into the divine favor to puff them up, and lead them to neglect the will of God.' SCHOETT.—'This v. will supply us with full authority, for the use of oaths. In.] By. In.] Under the guidance of' BL.

It may be, some of the Jews had a prejudice against Christianity for Paul's sake ; such a spleen they had at him, that they hated the religion that he was of ; ' If that stumble you,' says Paul, ' I could wish I might be cast out, not embraced as a Christian, so you might but be taken in.' Thus Moses, Ex. 32:32. in a like holy passion of concern, Blot me, I pray Thee, out of the book which Thou hast written.

3. Nay, some think the expression goes further, and that he could be content to be cut off from all his share of happiness in Christ, if that might be the means of their salvation. It is a common clarity, that begins at home ; this is something higher, and more noble and generous.

III. He gives us the reason of this affection and concern.

1. Because of their relation to him ; My brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh. It shows him to be a man of a forgiving spirit, Acts 28 : 19. My kinsmen. Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations, our brethren and kinsmen.

2. Especially because of their relation to God, v. 4, 5. Who are Israelites, the seed of Abraham, God's friend, and of Jacob his chosen ; taken into the covenant of peculiarity, dignified and distinguished by visible church-privileges ; many of which are here mentioned. (1.) The adoption ; not what is saving, and entitles to eternal happiness, but what was external and typical, and entitled to the land of Canaan. Israel is my son, Ex. 4:22. (2.) The glory ; the ark and the mercy-seat, over which God dwelt, between the cherubims, was the glory of Israel, 1 Sam. 4:21. The many symbols and tokens of the divine presence and guidance, the cloud, the Shechinah, the distinguishing favors conferred on them, these were the glory. (3.) The covenant ; that made with Abraham, and often renewed with his seed on divers occasions ; at Sinai, Ex. 24. in the plains of Moab, Deut. 29. at Shechem, Josh. 24. and often afterward ; and still these pertained to Israel. Or, the covenant of peculiarity, and in that, as in the type, the covenant of grace. (4.) The giving of the law, the ceremonial and judicial, and the moral law pertained to them. It is a great privilege to have the law of God among us. Ps. 147:19, 20. This was the grandeur of Israel, Deut. 4:7, 8. (5.) The service of God ; the ordinances of God's worship, the temple, altars, priests, sacrifices, feasts, and the institutions relating to them. They were in this respect greatly honored, that, while other nations were worshipping and serving stocks, stones, devils, [deified lusts,] and they knew not what other idols of their own invention, the Israelites were serving the true God, in the way of his own appointment. (6.) The promises ; particular promises added to the general covenant ; promises relating to the Messiah and the gospel-

state. Observe, The promises accompany the giving of the law, and the service of God ; for the comfort of the promises is to be had in obedience to that law, and attendance on that service. (7.) The fathers ; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, those men of renown, that stood so high in the favor of God. But the greatest honor of all, was, that of them as concerning the flesh, i. e. as to his human nature, Christ came, Heb. 2:16. As to his divine nature, He is the Lord from heaven ; but as to his human nature, He is of the seed of Abraham. This was the great privilege of the Jews, that Christ was of kin to them.

Mentioning Christ, he interposes a very great word concerning Him, that He is over all, God blessed for ever. Lest the Jews should think meanly of Him, because He was of their alliance, Paul here speaks thus honorably of Him : and it is a very full proof of the Godhead of Christ ; He is not only over all, as Mediator, but He is God blessed for ever.

V. 6—13. The apostle, having made his way to what he had to say, concerning the rejection of the body of his countrymen, with a protestation of his own affection for them, and a concession of their undoubted privileges, comes, in these vs. and the following part of the ch., to prove, that the rejection of the Jews, by the establishment of the gospel-dispensation, did not at all invalidate the word of God's promise to the patriarchs, v. 6. This he does four ways. 1. By explaining the true meaning and intention of the promise, v. 6—13. 2. By asserting and proving the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of men, v. 14—24. 3. By showing how this rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the O. T., v. 25—29. 4. By fixing the true reason of the Jews' rejection, v. 30. to the end.

And Paul here makes it out, that, when God said He would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed, He did not mean it of all

(3.) ' Even myself to be devoted to destruction by Christ, instead of my, &c., i. e. that (eternal) destruction which threatens them. It is not a possible, only a supposed case, comp. Gal. 1:8. [4:15.] . . Who can draw the line where benevolence would stop short ? . . But the inference, that Paul " was willing to be damned," or that Christians must come to such a state of willingness, is made without any ground from this v. If Paul's being cast off by the Savior could occasion the reception and salvation of the whole Jewish people, this apostle expresses his readiness to submit to it. But as such a thing was impossible ; and as he really knew it to be so ; all that we can well suppose the passage teaches, is, that Paul possessed such a feeling of benevolence toward the Jewish nation, that he was ready to do or suffer anything whatever, provided their salvation might be secured by it. In other words, this is a high and glowing expression, springing from an excited state of feeling, which the use of common language could not at all satisfy. And in making use of such an expression, Paul did not depart from a mode of speaking which is still very common in the E. The Arabs, for example, very commonly, in order to testify strong affection, say, [nafsy 'yfalha leka,] let my soul be a ransom for thee. So Maimon., in explaining the Talmudic expression [hareyny kapparaka,] see, I am thy ransom, states, that this is a common expression of strong affection.' STUART.

V. 4. Adoption.] ' This privilege of being the children of God, the Israelites derived from their progenitor, Seth, Gen. 4:26. 6:2. renewed to Shem, Gen. 9:26.—Glory.] The glory of God resided in Seth's family till the flood. BOWYER.—Service.] ' Rites of the temple, priesthood, etc.' ID.

V. 5. ' Christ (descended) in respect to the flesh, who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen! St. The expr., ' come, the flesh,' implies that Christ had a far higher and nobler nature ; as when Paul used it concerning the Jews, his brethren, he intimated his sorrow, that they were not his brethren, as the children of God, born of the Spirit, and believers in Christ. This, with various other considerations, undeniably proves, that the apostle here meant, in the most decided manner, to attest the Deity of Christ, as One with the Father, and equally the Object of universal and everlasting adoration. 1 John 4:1—3. — There is no example, either in the N. T., or in the Gr. tr. of the O. T., in which the doxology, ' Blessed be God,' is expressed in the same words, and arranged in the same manner, as in this place. So that the only way, in which the Socinians and Arians have attempted to evade the conclusion, unavoidably deducible from this text, namely, by rendering the clause, ' Who is over all ; God be blessed for evermore ;' rests on a most harsh, unnatural, and unclassical construction, of which no example can be adduced ; at the same time that it destroys the antithesis, without which the v. would be wholly destitute of propriety and animation. SCOTT.

(5.) ' The words [according to the flesh] are plainly emphatical, and unquestionably refer to the other or celestial origin of Christ. The Jews maintained, that the Messiah would be man, and the more enlightened, that He [is also] God. See Kop. And of whom, as concerning the flesh, (i. e. his human capacity,) Christ came, who is (in that human capacity) Lord of, supreme over, all (created beings) ; being indeed God, (and claiming of right the appropriate title of Godhead,) the blessed for ever. " This memorable text [is] a proof of Christ's proper Deity, which all the opposers of that doctrine have never been, nor ever will be able to misver." DODD. For, 1. As to the unauthorized cancelling of Theos [God] (found, contrary to what Schoett. says, in all the MSS. ; also, in all the versions and nearly all the fathers, see Koppe), it is so desperate a measure, that few, even of Socinians, have ventured on it ; and for others, who have scribbled at the words, it cuts, not unties, the knot. 2. Crellins, Wnkefeld, &c. would take Theos for Kurios [Lord] ; as in Acts 10:36. But this sense rests in mere assumption, without a shadow of proof, and is so evidently formed for the nonce, that none could have resorted to it but those who were so persuaded of the impossibility of Christ's Divinity, that they were ready to take up with any ground of objection, however weak : 3. They propose a change in the reading ; viz. (as Schlichting conject.) hōn ho for ho ōn. But this is totally destitute of MS. authority, and merely rests on the supposition, that the one reading was confounded with the other ; but this the contrary testimony of many hundreds of MSS. may be sufficient to refute : and how improbable, the mistake, not easily made, should have occupied every known MS ! Further, " whose is the Lord," (so it would be) would represent the Almighty as God of the Jews only, contrary to Paul, at 3:3. Again, it would be very incorrect Greek, and at all events would require a kaí and another ōn subjoined. What but a [sectarian] stomach could digest such a mixture of improbability and harshness ! 4. As to the attempt to convert the words, by a change of punctuation, into a doxology, it has the least to plead, for such would be out of place, and, in his sorrowful state of mind, Paul would use an intercession rather ; moreover, wherever it is found, the Theos follows the eulogias [blessed], because the strongest expression is put in the strongest place, at least, according to Jewish ideas. The article, too, would be requisite ; it would require a most harsh transposition ; nay Schlicht., Crell., and even Socinus himself, reject this plan. Besides, the context requires the common interpretation ; since, " by referring these words to the Father, the sense is abruptly broken ; but if to Christ, the consistency is preserved, and the climax rises." BLOOMF., whom see, as also St. and Hodce. ED.

V. 6—9. The apostle evidently speaks of a true Israel, among the descendants of Israel ; a remnant, as distinguished from the nation at large ; and he introduces the case of Abraham and his two sons, and afterwards that of Esau and Jacob, not as examples, but as illustrations, of his main subject. Gal. 4:21—31. 6:15, 16. If this were carefully noted, the perplexity which involves the reasonings of many learned men on this passage, would in a great measure vanish. ' The children of the promise,' are those ' whom God gives to Abraham, by a spiritual generation, whether alone, as in the case of us Gentiles ; or added to the carnal generation, as in the case of Isaac, and of all believing Jews. . . . They who interpret " the children of promise," to mean those, who by faith embrace the promise ; say indeed what is fact, but 7 Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children: but, In ° Isaac shall thy seed be called.

8 That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children ° of the promise are counted for the seed.

9 For this is the word of promise, At ° this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son.

10 And not only this; but when Rebecca ° also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac;

his seed according to the flesh, as if it were a necessary concomitant of the blood of Abraham; but that He intended it with a limitation, only to such and such. And as from the beginning it was appropriated to Isaac, and not to Ishmael; to Jacob, and not to Esau; and yet for all that, the Word of God was not made of no effect; so now the same promise is appropriated to believing Jews that embrace Christ and Christianity, and, though it throw off multitudes that refuse Christ, yet the promise is not therefore defeated and invalidated, any more than it was by the typical rejection of Ishmael and Esau.

I. He lays down this proposition,—that they are not all Israel, which are of Israel, v. 6. neither because they are, &c. v. 7. Many, descended from the loins of Abraham and Jacob, and surnamed by the name of Israel, were very far from being Israelites indeed, interested in the saving benefits of the new covenant. It does not follow, that, because they are the seed of Abraham, therefore they must needs be the children of God; though they themselves fancied so, boasted much of, and built much on, their relation to Abraham, Mat. 3:9. John 8:38, 39.

II. He proves this by instances; and therein shows, not only that some of Abraham's seed were chosen, and others not, but that God therein wrought according to the council of his own will; and not with regard to that law of commandments, which the present unbelieving Jews were so strangely wedded to.

1. He specifies the case of Isaac and Ishmael, both of them the seed of Abraham; yet Isaac only taken into covenant with God. For this he quotes Gen. 21:12. which comes in there as a reason why Abraham must be willing to cast out the bond-woman and her son, because the covenant was to be established with Isaac, ch. 17:19. And yet the word God had spoken, that He would be a God to Abraham and to his seed, did not therefore fail; for the blessings wrapt up in that great word, being communicated by God as a benefactor, He was free to determine on what head they should rest, and accordingly entailed them on Isaac, and rejected Ishmael. This he explains further, v. 8, 9. and shows what God intended to teach us by this dispensation.

(1.) That the children of the flesh, as such, by virtue of their relation to Abraham according to the flesh, are not therefore the children of God, for then Ishmael had put in a good claim. This remark comes home to the unbelieving Jews, who boasted of their relation to Abraham according to the flesh, and looked for justification in a fleshly way, by these carnal ordinances which Christ had abolished. They had confidence in the flesh, Phil. 3:3. Ishmael was a child of the flesh, and there was nothing extraordinary or supernatural in his conception, as there was in Isaac's; he was born after the flesh, Gal. 4:29. representing those that expect justification and salvation by their own strength and righteousness.

(2.) That the children of the promise are counted for the seed. Those that have the honor and happiness of being counted for the seed, have it not for the sake of any merit or desert of their own, but purely by virtue of the promise, in which God hath obliged Himself of his own good pleasure to grant the promised favor. Isaac was a child of promise; that he proves, v. 9. quoted from Gen. 18:10. He was conceived and born by force and virtue of the promise, and so a proper type and figure of those who are now counted for the seed, even true believers, who are born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; of the incorruptible seed, even the word of promise; by virtue of the special promise of a new heart: see Gal. 4:20. It was through faith that Isaac was conceived, Heb. 11:11. Thus were the great mysteries of salvation taught under the O. T., not in express words, but by significant types and dispensations of providence, which to them then were not so clear as they are to us now, when the veil is taken away, and the types are expounded by the antitypes.

2. In the case of Jacob and Esau, v. 10—13. which is much stronger to show that the carnal seed of Abraham were not, as such, interested in the promise, but only such of them as God in sovereignty had appointed. There was a previous difference between Ishmael and Isaac, before Ishmael was cast out: Ishmael was the son of the bond-woman, born long before Isaac, was of a fierce and rugged disposition, and had mocked, or persecuted Isaac; to all which it might be supposed God had regard, when He appointed Abraham to cast him out. But in the case of Jacob and Esau, it was neither so nor so, they were both the sons of Isaac by one mother: they were conceived by one conception, so some copies. The difference was made between them by the divine counsel, before they were born, or had done any good or evil. Both lay struggling alike in their mother's womb, when it was said, The elder shall serve the younger; without respect to good or bad works done or foreseen; that the purpose of God according to election might stand; that this great truth may be established, that God chooses some and refuses others, as a free agent; by his own absolute and sovereign will, dispensing his favors, or withholding them, as He pleases.

This difference, that was put between Jacob and Esau, he further illustrates by a quotation from Mal. 1:2, 3. where it is said, not of Jacob and Esau the persons, but the Edomites and Israelites, their posterity; Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated. The people of Israel were taken into the covenant of peculiarity, had the land of Canaan given them, were blessed with the more signal appearances of God for them in special protections, supplies, and deliverances, while the Edomites were rejected, had no temple, altar, priests, or prophets; no such particular care taken of them, or kindness showed to them. Such a difference did God do not speak with suitable precision; for the apostle does not in this place distinguish the children of Abraham from others, by their faith as known; but he discourses concerning the primary cause, i. e. the fountain of their faith itself, namely, the eternal purpose of gratuitous election. Beza.—Isaac was promised some time before his birth; and the faithfulness and power of God having fulfilled that promise, he was 'the child of promise,' in whom Abraham's 'seed should be called,' and in whose 'Seed the nations should be blessed'; but Ishmael was not thus previously promised; and it was foretold, that the chosen nation, which was to inherit Canaan, and from whom the Messiah was appointed to spring, would not descend from him, but from Isaac. In like manner, all the descendants of Israel were not entitled to the spiritual blessings of the covenant; but only 'the remnant according to the election of grace,' which was found among them: and these, being regenerated and having believed in Christ, were brought into the family of believing Abraham, as the children of promise, in whom the promises to him, concerning his numerous posterity and their extraordinary privileges, should be especially fulfilled. 4:9—17. 11:1—6. Mat. 3:7—10. Gal. 3:26—29. Heb. 6:13—15.—In thus adducing the case of Isaac and Ishmael, the apostle certainly did not decide on the eternal state of either of these individuals; yet the subject which he thus illustrated, namely, a remnant of believers among an unbelieving nation, must refer, not to outward advantages and disadvantages, but to eternal salvation or damnation; for 'he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned.' And this is equally clear, whether it be held, that this remnant believed, in consequence of their being elected; or that they were chosen, in consequence of their faith, either as foreseen, or as actually exercised.—(7) In Isaac, &c. From the Sept. who accord with the Heb. (Gen. 21:12.)—(9) At this time, &c. Not exactly according to the Sept., or the Heb.; though it agrees more nearly with the latter. The cl. tr. in Gen., 'according to the time of life,' is changed by the apostle, from the Sept. for 'according to this time.' Gen. 18:10.

(6.) 'However, it is not so that the Word of God has been rendered void; for, &c.' St. Taken none effect. 'Missed: a metaphor, apparently, from archery.'

(7, 8.) 'Neither are all the seed of Abraham children, but, &c.' St. 'The apostle gives us not the whole of the texts he intends should be taken into his argument, he only hints them, as the Jews were generally well versed in the SS.' Taylor. 'In making the natural seed the type of the spiritual, and the temporal blessings the emblems of the eternal, there was the greatest wisdom, not only because the emblematical method of representing things was usual in the early ages, but because the birth of Isaac was a pledge of the birth of the spiritual seed, and because, when the temporal blessing promised to the natural seed, particularly their introduction into Canaan, was accomplished by the most extraordinary exertions of the divine power, it was such a pledge and proof of the introduction of the spiritual seed into the heavenly country, as must in all ages, till that event happen, strengthen their faith, and give them the greatest consolation.'

(9.) At. 'According to.' St. 'God is said to "come unto men," when He is bestowing on them great benefits.'

V. 10—14. As Isaac was Abraham's only son, by Sarah his wife; it might have been supposed, that the covenant blessings were limited to him on that account. Yet not only Ishmael, Abraham's son by Hagar, the bond-woman, and his children by Keturah, were excluded; but even Esau and his posterity, though the elder son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin-brother to Jacob, was set aside; and this not subsequent to any crime by which he forfeited the birthright, but previously. This clearly indicated, that 'the purpose of God,' in respect of 'the heirs of promise,' would be established according to his sovereign election; who calls men to partake of the blessing as He pleases; and not in the foresight of any works which they would perform. Doubtless, God foresaw, that Esau's works would be profane and evil; Gen. 25:31—34. 27:41, 42. Heb. 12:15—17. and Jacob's, in a measure, pious and holy; but the good works of Jacob could only be foreseen, as the effect of his election and consequent regeneration; and thus foreseen as the effect, they could not be the cause of these blessings. Marg. and Eph. 1:3—8. God foresaw both Esau and Jacob as 'born in sin, and by nature the children of wrath, even as others?' Eph. 2:3. and He knew that, if left to themselves, they would continue in sin through life; but (for wise and holy reasons, known to Himself, but not revealed to us), He purposed to change Jacob's heart, and to leave Esau to his native perverseness; because He freely loved Jacob, but did not in the same manner love Esau. Wickedness foreseen is doubtless the cause of the Lord's purpose to condemn; because it is of a man's self by nature, and God condemns none, who do not justly deserve it; but holiness foreseen in a fallen creature, cannot be the cause of his election; because it is the effect of new-creating grace, and never comes from any other source. Thus preterition, or non-election, of a fallen creature, is not gratuitous, but merited: election, shown in regeneration, is gratuitous. This instance of Esau and Jacob was intended as an illustration of the divine conduct towards the fallen race of man. It has often been urged, that Jacob and Esau were not so much personally intended, as their posterity; and that temporal, and not eternal things, are spoken of; and this is certainly true. Jacob never had put between those two nations, that both descended from the loins of Abraham and Isaac; as at first there was a difference put between Jacob and Esau, the distinguishing heads of those two nations.

12 It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger :

14 What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid.

So that all this choosing and refusing was typical, and intended to shadow forth some other election and rejection.

(1.) Some understand it of the election and rejection of conditions or qualifications. As God chose Isaac and Jacob, and rejected Ishmael and Esau, so He might and did choose faith to be the condition of salvation, and reject the works of the law. Thus Arminius understands it, De reiectis et assumptis talibus, certa qualitate notatis.—Concerning such as are rejected and such as are chosen, being distinguished by appropriate qualities; so John Goodwin. But this very much strains the Scripture; for the apostle speaks all along of persons,* He has mercy on whom, He does not say on what kind of people He will have mercy. Besides, against this sense, those two objections, v. 14, 19.

dominion over Esau, personally, but his posterity ruled over Esau's. Gen. 25:22, 23. 27:27—29, 39, 40. Mal. 1:2—5.—The election, the prediction, the birthright, and the blessing, secured to Jacob and his seed the same religious advantages, which the promise of God secured to Isaac and his seed; and excluded Esau, as well as Ishmael, from them; and this, without determining anything of Esau's eternal state, though his character, and the epithet profane, annexed to his name by the apostle, seem to indicate, that he was not a believer. It is, however, evident, that the subject illustrated related to individuals and to their eternal state, whether as believers or unbelievers. As Esau, that 'the purpose of God according to election might stand,' had no inheritance in Canaan, and was not the progenitor of Christ; so those Israelites, who did not belong to 'the election of grace,' were excluded from the true church, had no part in Christ, and no inheritance in heaven. But the reverse was true of 'the election of grace;' those who belonged to this election were 'called,' and in consequence believed; they were 'justified' in Christ and 'glorified;' 8:28—31. and the same is the case in respect of men, in all other ages and nations. If, indeed, there were any of our race, not fallen like other men, or not 'by nature dead in sin, and children of wrath, even as others; if there were any inclined, without preventing grace, to repent and to believe the humbling, holy Gospel of Christ, to love God and obey his will; then indeed the election might be made, with respect to their foreseen faith and obedience. But on this supposition, what ground would there be for the objections, which the apostle evidently supposes would be made to his doctrine? or what reason to silence them, in the manner he afterwards does; when he might easily, and consistently with truth, have given an answer far more satisfactory to the objectors, by clearly explaining his meaning? It is then inquired, First, Are all men, as born of Adam, equally depraved? and secondly, Is man willing of himself to do what is spiritually good; or does the grace of God make him willing? When these questions are answered, according to the Scriptures, and the articles and liturgy of our church, it will readily be perceived, that no good, foreseen, either in the hearts or lives of sinners, could be the cause of their election to eternal life.—If then God loved Jacob, and hated Esau, (or showed him less favor than Jacob,) without any reference to their works, as comparatively good or bad, then the grand principle is established, that God does show more favor to one man, than to another, independently of their righteousness or unrighteousness. And, 'is there unrighteousness with God?' could any injustice be objected to Him? By no means: He did Esau no wrong in leaving him to his own choice; and he, and his posterity, received more favors than they deserved; nor did the unmerited love of God to Jacob, and his posterity, in any measure injure Esau.—Even in respect of holy creatures, we must either allow, that God may justly permit them to sin, and punish them for it, and so at least foreknow, both the permission and the punishment; or else we must deny that He can act as a moral Governor of the universe. For, if this were not just, God would be bound to prevent all his creatures from sinning; and if any were left to sin, He only would be the cause of it. Indeed, men are not aware what blasphemy is involved, in their bold do not at all arise; and his answer to them, concerning God's absolute sovereignty over the children of men, is not at all pertinent, if no more be meant than his appointing the conditions of salvation.

(2.) Others understand it of the election and rejection of particular persons; some loved, and others hated, from eternity. But the apostle speaks of Jacob and Esau, not in their own persons, but as ancestors; Jacob the people, and Esau the people; nor does God condemn any, or decree so to do, merely because He will do it, without any reason taken from their own deserts.

(3.) Others therefore understand it of the election and rejection of people, considered complexly. His design is, to justify God, and his mercy and truth, in calling the Gentiles and taking them into the church, and into covenant with Himself, while He suffered the obstinate part of the Jews to persist in unbelief, and so to unchurch themselves: thus hiding from their eyes the things that belonged to their peace.

The apostle's reasoning for the explication and proof of this, is, however, very applicable to, and, no doubt, (as is usual, in Scripture,) was intended for the clearing of the methods of God's grace toward particular persons; for the communication of saving benefits bears some analogy to the communication of church-privileges.

The choosing of Jacob the younger, and preferring him before Esau the elder, (so crossing hands,) were to intimate, that the Jews, though the natural seed of Abraham, and the first-born of the church, should be laid aside; and the Gentiles, who were as the younger brother, should be taken in in their stead, and have the birthright and blessing.

The Jews, considered as a body politic, a nation and people knit together by the bond and cement of the ceremonial law, the temple and priesthood, the centre of their unity, had for many ages been the darlings and favorites of heaven, a kingdom of priests, a holy nation, dignified and distinguished by God's miraculous appearances among them and for them. Now that the Gospel was preached, and Christian churches planted, this national body was thereby abandoned, their church-polity dissolved, and Christian churches (and in process of time, Christian nations) embodied in like manner, become their successors in the divine favor, and those special privileges and protections which were the products of that favor. To clear up the justice of God in this great dispensation, is the scope of the apostle here.

V. 14—24. The apostle, having asserted the true meaning of the promise, comes here to maintain and prove the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of men, with reference to their eternal state. And herein God is to be considered, not as Rector and Governor, distributing rewards and punishments according to his revealed laws and covenants, but as a [Creator,] Owner and Benefactor, giving to men such grace and favor as He has determined in and by his secret and eternal will and counsel: both the favor of visible church-membership and privileges, which is given to some people and denied to others, and the favor of effectual grace, which is given to some particular persons and denied to others.

Now this part of his discourse is in answer to two objections.

I. It might be objected, Is there unrighteousness with God? This the apostle startles at the thought of; God forbid! Far be it from us to think such a thing; shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Gen. 18:25. ch. 3:5, 6. He denies the consequences, and proves the denial.

1. In respect of those to whom He shows mercy, v. 15, 16. He quotes that scripture, to show God's sovereignty in dispensing his favors, Ex. 33:19. All God's reasons of mercy are taken from within Himself. All men being plunged alike into a state of sin and misery, equally under guilt and wrath, objections on this subject.—Much more than may God righteously leave fallen creatures to themselves, to proceed in rebellion, and sink into destruction. He might justly have thus left all: it is of infinite mercy that any are saved; their salvation can be no injury to those, who are punished only according to the desert of their own sins; and it is evident, that most of the objections, brought against these doctrines, originate from the want of a deep conviction, that God would have been just, had he left our whole fallen race under final condemnation; as the supposition that He leaves a large proportion of them thus to perish, excites in numbers the same opposition, and leads them to the same exclamations and objections, as the doctrine of personal election. Indeed, the sentence to be denounced at the last day, on the unnumbered millions of the wicked, is as dreadful, as anything in this doctrine can be. 3:5—8. Mat. 25:41—46.—The election of nations, to special privileges and religious advantages, not vouchsafed to other nations, which some expositors suppose to be here meant, (contrary to the whole tenor of the context,) is liable to all the same objections, as personal election; and can be vindicated only in the same way. All nations might justly be left without them; and when some are mercifully favored with them, 'that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth;' no wrong is done to the others.—(12) The elder, &c.] Gen. 25:23.—(13) Jacob, &c.] From the Sept. which both accord with the Hebrew. V. 15—18. 'Mercy presupposes misery and sin, or the voluntary corruption of the human race; and this corruption presupposes a creation in purity and uprightness.' Beza.—Believers greatly desire the salvation of Christ, and labor to secure it; yet these desires are strains from the fountain of electing love. They 'were by nature children of wrath, even as others; but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love where-with He loved them, even when they were dead in sins, hath quickened them together with Christ.' God, in a way of sovereignty, without giving us any reason, according to his own good pleasure, pitches on some to be monuments of mercy and grace, preventing grace, effectual grace, while He passes by others. The expression is very emphatical, and the repetition makes it more so; I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy. It imports a perfect absoluteness in God's will; He will do what He will, and giveth not account of any of his matters, nor is it fit He should. Therefore God's mercy endures for ever, because the reason of it is fetched from within Himself; therefore his gifts and callings are without repentance.

Hence he infers, v. 16. It is not of him that willeth. Whatever good comes from God to man, the glory of it is to be ascribed only and purely to the free grace and mercy of God. In Jacob's case, it was not the earnest will and desire of Rebecca, that Jacob might have the blessing; not Jacob's haste to get it, (for he was fain to run for it,) made partakers of salvation, the sinfulness attending their very diligence, being graciously forgiven. Phil. 2:12, 13. Whereas they, who are not thus willing and diligent, are not made unwilling by any positive act of God; but their unwillingness is the consequence of their own pride, self-will, love of sin, and aversion to God and holiness. It springs from innate depravity, and is increased and strengthened by habits of disobedience; and can never be removed, except by an act of almighty power, which God cannot be bound in justice to perform for any of his rebellious creatures. Men are indeed naturally willing to be saved from misery, and made happy; and are often very diligent in proud and unbelieving endeavors to obtain their object: 10:1—4. but this is widely different from [supreme love to God and his will] a cordial willingness to be saved from sin as well as misery, and made holy and happy, in the humbling method of the Gospel: diligently to use all the means, freely to submit to all the privations, and patiently to endure all the self-denial, requisite in order to obtain it.—This hardening, also, is voluntary, because the Lord, offended by their depravity, makes use of their own will, in executing this judgment on those whom He hardens. Then follow the fruits of this hardening, namely, unbelief and sins, which are the real causes of the condemnation of the reprobate. Beza.—(15) I will have mercy, &c. From the Sept. (Ex. 33:19).—(17) Even for this same, &c. This varies considerably from the Sept. and gives a far more energetic tr. of the Heb. Ex. 9:16.

V. 19—21. The unhumiliated opposer would be sure here to object and cavil.—As if the secret purpose of God were, or possibly could be, a that procured him the blessing, but only the mercy and grace of God. Wherein the holy, happy people of God differ from other people, it is God and his grace that makes them differ.

Applying this general rule to the particular case Paul has before him; the reason why the unworthy, undeserving, ill-deserving Gentiles are called, and grafted into the church, while the greatest part of the Jews are left to perish in unbelief, is not because those Gentiles were better deserving, or better disposed for such a favor, but because of God's free grace that made that difference. The Gentiles did neither will it, nor run for it, for they sat in darkness, Mat. 4: 16. In darkness, therefore not willing what they knew not; sitting in darkness, a contented posture, therefore not running to meet it, but prevented with these invaluable blessings of goodness. Such is the method of God's grace towards all that partake of it, for He is found of them that sought Him not, Is. 65: 1. In this preventing, effectual, distinguishing grace, He acts as a benefactor, whose grace is his own. Our eye therefore must not be evil, because his is good; but of all the grace that we or others have, He must have the glory: Not unto us, Ps. 115: 1.

2. In respect of those who perish, v. 17. God's sovereignty, manifested in the ruin of sinners, is here discovered in the instance of Pharaoh, quoted from Ex. 9: 16.

(1.) God raised him up, brought him into the world, made him famous, gave him the kingdom and power; set him up as a beacon on a hill, as the mark of all his plagues, comp. Ex. 9: 14. hardened his heart, as He had said He would, Ex. 4: 21. I will harden his heart, i. e. withdraw softening grace, [and] leave him to himself, [as in that tremendous sentence, Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone! Hos. 4: 17. 'This is of itself enough to insure the ruin of an impenitent sinner.] Or, by raising him up, may be meant the intermission of the plagues which gave Pharaoh respite, and the reprieve of Pharaoh in those plagues. In the Hebrew, I have made thee stand, continued thee yet in the land of the living. Thus doth God raise up sinners, make them for Himself, even for the day of evil, Prov. 16: 4. raise them up in outward prosperity, external privileges, Mat. 11: 23. sparing mercies.

rule of duty to his creatures! Or, as if a man could intend to do the will of God, by breaking his express commandments, out of enmity to Him, and to gratify his own lusts!—The apostle could not mean, as it is plain from the whole context, that God might justly make innocent creatures [perfectly, entirely, utterly] miserable by prerogative, which some seem at least to suppose; for he goes on the supposition, that the sovereignty of God is that of infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness; and that He always decrees to do what is the most proper to be done. The words, 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy,' imply, that all deserved wrath; so that 'the lump of clay, in the hands of the potter,' must refer to men already existing in God's foreknowledge as fallen creatures. But the apostle intended to repress the arrogance of ignorant, presumptuous worms, who venture to speak about injustice, enmity, and tyranny, in discoursing of their offended Creator and Judge; who decide, by vain reasoning in their own minds, how the infinite God ought to act; and then forgetting who He is, and who they are, charge Him foolishly, and say, that if such and such doctrines be indeed true, then God is,—but their words ought not to be repeated. This very common practice is such a compound of arrogance, irreverence, and folly, that it seems the most glaring proof of human depravity, which even this wicked world exhibits; especially when it is added, that pious men sometimes appear, in the violence of controversy, to be betrayed into it.—It is wonderful, that the great Mr. Loeke should confidently assert, that the apostle here speaks of men nationally, and not personally, in reference to their eternal state; when the rejection of the Jewish nation, with the reservation only of 'a remnant according to the election of grace,' was the apostle's main subject, to illustrate which all the other examples are introduced. This remnant consisted of a small number of individuals, not of a nation; and the Gentile converts were individuals out of their several nations, forming, with the Jewish converts, the Christian church; and not whole nations, or one whole nation, chosen as a collective body, to succeed to the external advantages, which the nation of Israel had forfeited; and surely 'the vessels of mercy before prepared unto glory,' which the apostle next mentions, must have been chosen, not to external advantages, but to eternal life! 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. 1 Pet. 1:1—5.

He find fault with those to whom He denies it? If He hath rejected the Jews, and hid from their eyes the things that belong to their peace, why doth He find fault with them for their blindness? If it be his pleasure to discard them as not a people, and not obtaining mercy, their knocking off themselves was no resistance of his will.

This objection he answers at large

1. By reproving the objector, v. 20. This is not an objection fit to be made by the creature against his Creator, by man against God. The truth, as it is in Jesus, is that which abases man as nothing, less than nothing, and advances God as sovereign Lord of all. Observe how contemptibly he speaks of man, when he comes to argue with God his Maker; 'Who art thou, so foolish, so feeble, so short-sighted, so incompetent a judge of the divine counsels; art thou able to fathom such a depth, dispute such a case, to trace that way of God which is in the sea, his path in the great waters?' That repliest against God? It becomes us to submit to Him, not to reply against Him; to lie down under his hand, not to fly in his face, or to charge Him with folly. That answerest again. God is our Master, and we his servants; and it does not become servants to answer again, Tit. 2:9.

2. By resolving all into the divine sovereignty. The rude and unformed mass of matter, hath no right to this or that form, but is shaped at the pleasure of Him that formeth it. [Man has no claim on his Creator.] God's sovereignty over us is fitly illustrated by the power that the potter hath over the clay; compare Jer. 18:6. where, by a like comparison, God asserts his dominion over the nation of the Jews, when He was about to magnify his justice in their destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. He gives us the comparison, v. 21. and the application, v. 22—24. Two sorts of vessels God forms out of the great lump of fallen mankind:

(1.) Vessels of wrath; vessels filled with wrath, as a vessel is with wine, Is. 51:20. In these, God is willing to show his wrath, i. e. his punishing justice, and his enmity to sin. This must be showed to all the world; God will make it appear that He hates sin. He will likewise make his power known, a power of strength and energy, an inflicting power, which works and effects the destruction of those that perish, 2 Thess. 1:9. preying as it were on guilty consciences, and yet at the same instant wonderful to preserve the being of the creature. In order to this, God endured them with much long-suffering; exercised a great deal of patience toward them, let them alone, to fill up the measure of sin, to grow till they were ripe for ruin. When Christ said to the Jews, Mat. 23:32. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers, that on you may come all the righteous blood, v. 35. He did, as it were, endure them with much long-suffering, that they might, by their own obstinacy and wilfulness in sin, fit themselves for destruction.

(2.) Vessels of mercy; filled with mercy. The happiness bestowed on the saved remnant, is the fruit, not of their merit, but of God's mercy. Observe, 1st. What He designs in them; to make known the riches of his glory, i. e. of his goodness; for God's goodness is his greatest glory, especially when communicated with the greatest sovereignty, Ex. 33:18, 19. God makes known his glory, this goodness of his, in the preservation and supply of all the creatures; the earth is full of his goodness, and the year crowned with it; but when He would demonstrate the riches of his goodness, un-searchable riches, He does it in the salvation of the saints, [who] will be to eternity glorious monuments of divine grace. 2dly. What He does for them; He does before prepare them to glory. Sanctification is God's work; sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven; and all those that God designs for heaven hereafter, He prepares and fits for heaven now: He works them to the self-same thing, 2 Cor. 5:5.

And would you know who these vessels of mercy are? Those whom He hath called, v. 24. and these not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles; and the question is not now, whether of the seed of Abraham or no, but whether or no called according to his purpose.

V. 25—29. Having explained the promise, and proved the divine sovereignty, the apostle here shows how the rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the O. T. and therefore must needs be very well consistent with the promise made to the fathers under the O. T.

I. Hosea speaks of the taking in of a great many of the Gentiles, Hos. 2:23. and 1:10. The Gentiles had not been the people of God; not owning Him, or owned by Him in that relation: 'But,' says He, 'I will call them my people, make them such, and own them as such, notwithstanding all their unworthiness.' And lest it might be supposed they should become God's people only by being proselyted to the Jewish religion, and made members of that nation, he adds, from Hos. 1:10. In the place where it was said, &c. there shall they be called. They need not be embodied with the Jews, nor go up to Jerusalem to worship; but wherever they are scattered over the face of the earth, there will God own them.

II. Isaiah speaks of the casting off of many of the Jews, in two places.

1. One is Is. 10:22, 23. which speaks of the saving of a remnant, i. e. but a remnant; which, though, in the prophecy, it seems to refer to the preservation of a remnant from the destruction and desolation coming on them by Sennacherib, yet is to be understood as looking further; and sufficiently proves that it is no strange thing, for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet maintain his word of promise to Abraham in full force and virtue. In this salvation of the remnant we are told, v. 28. from the prophet, (1.) That He will complete the work. The rejection of the un-

Paul's doctrine [see Bl.], yet it was necessary to take from the Jews every opportunity of evading and contradicting.' Ros. This temerity was disdained by all pious Jews; see Schoett.

(21.) 'In such similitudes we ought to choose such parts as are useful and apposite, and let alone the rest.' CHRYS. 'God has plainly a right to place the object his power has produced in any rank among his creatures, and to give it as many or few advantages as He pleases.' TURN.

V. 22, 23. Suppose that God was pleased, (as in the instance of Pharaoh,) in order more conspicuously to display his powerful wrath against his enemies, to endure their provocations with patience and forbearance for a long time, till they had acted out the desperate wickedness of their hearts, and filled up the measure of their sins, and so become ripe for signal vengeance; what injustice could there be in this? ... On the other hand, should the Lord choose to display the abundance of his glorious power, truth, and love, in his dealings with some; and what was this to others? These were not in themselves more meet for holy felicity than the former; but He was pleased to prepare them before for it, by his regenerating and sanctifying grace; as well as to make them capable of actively glorifying Him here on earth. But did his free love to them imply injustice to others? Their cause for gratitude was immense; but had those, who suffer no more than they deserve, any ground for complaint? while He withholds from none their due, He has surely a right 'to do what He will with his own.' Mat. 20:1—16, vv. 10—16.—The different language used concerning 'the vessels of wrath,' and 'the vessels of mercy,' is of the greatest importance in stating this doctrine solidly and scripturally; the former are 'fitted for destruction:' it is not said, that God had fitted them. For He saw them, in themselves, both deserving wrath, and fit for the place of torment, and the society of fallen angels; but God Himself 'had afore prepared the vessels of mercy,' for that glory to which He intended to advance them. The term 'vessels of mercy,' implies, that they too had deserved wrath; and the 'preparation for glory,' shows, that in themselves they had been unprepared. Eph. 2:1—10. Tit. 3:3—7.—The words used in these verses uniformly relate to eternal perdition or felicity.

(22.) Willing, &c. 'Purposing to manifest his indignation, &c. . . fitted, &c.' St. 'Fit for.' Grot. 'But if God, when He might have displayed his wrath, and shown his power, still bore with those men who were fitted for destruction, will you be so unreasonable as to complain, or to find fault on this account?'

(23.) On.] 'Toward. Unto, &c.] For glory, (shewed mercy,) even to us whom He hath called, not only of the Jews, but, &c.' St. Glory. 'That of being made the church and people of God.' Mackn. BL.

V. 24—29. A remnant of Israel, reserved by God for Himself, while the rest were given up to just punishment, demonstrates, that the election, however understood, was personal, not national.—I will call, &c. 25, 26. Hos. 1:9. 2:23.—Not exactly, either from the Sept., or from the Heb.: but the variations are immaterial as to the general meaning; yet, on the whole, more nearly according to the Heb.—Though the number, &c. 27—29. The case is the same in these quotations. Is. 1:9. 10:21—23. Nothing can be more clear, than that the inspired writer intended to give the general sense of the Scriptures, in such a tr. into the Gr. as was proper; yet, as the Romans were chiefly conversant in the Sept., he used the words of that version, except when there was a good reason for varying from them.—'From comparing the original with the Sept., no one can deny, that the Gr. interpreters have in fact rendered the passage very negligently, as far as words are concerned. Should any one ask, why the apostle nevertheless used that tr.; I answer, that he did this very properly, because those to whom he wrote had been used to that tr.; and that, as far as the sentiment is concerned, in support of which Paul adduced this testimony, the Gr. interpreters had preserved it sufficiently faithful. Nor does it signify any other, either in the Heb. or the Gr., than that God had determined to render the number of an ungrateful people extremely small.' Beza.

(25.) 'If the apostle thought fit to accommodate what was originally said of the restoration of the Jews, to the calling of the Gentiles, he would take the further liberty of slightly altering the words, so as to adapt them the better to his purpose.' BL. 'Indeed, that great event [the calling of the Gentiles] might with some probability be inferred, partly from the temporary rejection of the Jews from the privileges of his people, of which this text spake, (for it was not to be imagined God would have no people in the world,) and partly as it was in the nature of things more probable He should call the heathen, than restore [that ungrateful nation].'

believing Jews, God would finish in their utter ruin by the Romans, who soon after this quite took away their place and nation. The assuming of Christian churches into the divine favor, and the spreading of the Gospel in other nations, was a work which God would likewise finish, and be known by his name JEHOVAH. Margin, He will finish the account. God, in his eternal counsels, has allotted men to such or such a condition, as they come into being, and He will finish the account, complete the mystical body, call in as many as belong to the election of grace; and then the account will be finished. (2.) That He will contract it; not only finish it, but finish it quickly. Under the O. T. He seemed to tarry, and to make a longer and more tedious work of it; but now He will cut it short, and make a short work on the earth. Gentile converts were now flying as a cloud. But He will cut it short in righteousness, both in wisdom and in justice. Men, when they cut short, do amiss; but when God cuts short, it is always in righteousness. So the fathers generally apply it. Some understand it of the evangelical law and covenant; which Christ has introduced: He has in that finished the work, put an end to the types and ceremonies of the O. T. And He will cut it short, the work, the word: the law under the O. T. was very long, a long train of institutions, ceremonies, conditions: our duty is now, under the Gospel, summed up in much less room, religion is brought into a less compass; and in righteousness, in favor to us, in justice to his own design and counsel.

2. Another is Is. 1:9. where the prophet is showing how, in a time of general calamity and destruction, God would preserve a seed. This is to the same purport with the former: and the scope of it is, to show that it was no strange thing for God to leave the greatest part of the Jews to ruin, and to reserve to Himself only a small remnant: so He had done formerly, as appears by their own prophets; and they must not wonder if He did so now. He is the Lord of Sabaoth, of hosts, a Hebrew word retained in the Greek, as Ja. 5:4. When God sees a seed to Himself out of a degenerate, apostate world, He acts as Lord of Sabaoth. It is an act of almighty power and infinite sovereignty. His people, too, are a seed, a small number; as the corn reserved for next year's seedings, but little, compared with what is spent and eaten; yet useful, the seed, the substance, of the next generation, Is. 6:13.

It is so far from being an impeachment of the justice and righteousness of God, that so many perish and are destroyed, that it is a wonder of divine power and mercy that all are not destroyed, that any are saved: for even those that are left to be a seed, if God had dealt with them according to their sins, had perished with the rest. This is the great truth here taught.

V. 30—33. The apostle comes here at last to fix the true reason of the reception of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews. There was a difference in the way of their seeking, and therefore that different success; though still it was the free grace of God that made them differ.

I. Concerning the Gentiles, observe, 1. They had been alienated from righteousness, they followed not after it, knew not their guilt and misery, and therefore were not at all sollicitous to procure a remedy. In their conversion, preventing grace was greatly magnified, Is. 65:1. free grace alone disposed them for such a favor. Thus God delights to dispense grace in a way of sove-

PRACT. OBS. The command of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' and the example of Christ, require us to mourn over obstinate transgressors, especially when near to us 'according to the flesh;' at the same time, that we vindicate the justice of God in his dealings with them. Lu. 13:41-44.—Those who know nothing of a change of heart, ought to be far otherwise employed, than in disputing either for or against this doctrine of free electing love. Let them 'strive to enter in at the strait gate,' before the door be for ever shut; and leave the discussion of these abstruse questions to those, who are walking with God in the way to heaven.—We cannot at present know the purposes of God respecting others: it will be soon enough for us to be 'without natural affection,' when perfected in holiness; and to rejoice in the destruction of the enemies of God individually, when the event makes them known to us. In the mean time, insensibility to the eternal condition of our fellow-creatures, is contrary both to the love required by the law, and the mercy of the gospel; and the more we sincerely pity, pray for, and are ready to suffer anything to save, our most virulent despisers and persecutors, the greater confidence we may use, in affectionately warning them of their danger, and of the delusions into which they are fallen.—There is abundant encouragement to the diligent use of the means of grace, which God has appointed; and where there is a willing mind, and humble diligence in seeking Him, the blessing will certainly be given; and the happy believer will, in due time, ascribe even this willingness to electing love. But if men wilfully harden themselves in disobedience and impenitence,

God will show his power and vengeance in their destruction, and cause all their abused prosperity to increase their condemnation, and his own glory in it.—Who could have previously thought, that any of our race would have presumed to say, that 'there is unrighteousness with God?' to quarrel with his judgments, and plead, that 'none hath resisted his will' or counsel! Shall criminals cite their offended Sovereign to their blasphemous tribunal? If they do, let them see to it, for 'evil is before them.' He will proceed with his own plan, exercising his holy sovereignty as He sees good; and distinguishing between those who adore, and those who blaspheme, the depths which they cannot fathom; and He will number with the latter, all those who profess to believe the doctrines in question, and then take occasion from them to sin with greater presumption. But surely, all who love and fear God, however such truths may dazzle and dismay them, should reverently keep silence before Him. And even if they hear them stated unscripturally or licentiously; they should take care what words they use in disputing against those who pervert the truth; that they may not appear to countenance the impieties of infidels and ungodly men. In short, modesty, caution, humility, and profound awe of the holy Majesty of God, should restrain and guide the tongues and pens of all, who speak or write on these subjects, however satisfied they may be with their own views of them; and every sentence which is written or spoken, in a manner, which, on any supposition, imputes injustice to God, is a proof of the pride and irreverence of the writer or speaker. V. 30—33. The apostle having shown, that both the purposes and predictions of God were fulfilled, in the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, here proceeds to show by what means the things had been effected; for this also illustrated the argument, that the Lord had acted righteously, and the Jews wickedly, in the whole concern. The Gentiles, who before lived in the grossest religious ignorance, idolatry, and vice, without at all 'following after righteousness,' had suddenly, through the surprising grace of God, been brought into a state of acceptance with Him, being called to partake of 'the righteousness of God by faith.' 1:17. 3:21—26. 4:9—12. Gal. 3:26—29. Phil. 3:—3 11. Heb. 11:7. 2 Pet. 1:1, 2.—But Israel, who had the law, both that which contained the rule of righteousness, and that which shadowed forth the way of justification; and who had sedulously paid regard to it as 'the law of righteousness,' had not attained to the law of righteousness. Not living up to their law, they were not justified, but condemned by it; yet, eluding to it, they rejected Christ and his salvation. 10:1—4. Wherefore then had they failed of acceptance? Was it merely through God's decree? Or did He refuse to receive them, in the same way as the Gentiles were justified? By no means; but they refused to seek the blessing 'by faith,' as an unmerited favor; and persisted in claiming it 'by the law,' as a matter of right. This they did, 'as it were, by the works of the law;' they did not think that they perfectly kept the law, but they expected to make up their deficiencies in one respect, by abound- ing in others; or by repentance, and amendment, and the legal sacrific- es; or by superstitious additions, and observing the traditions of men. Thus they sought the blessing from that law, which denounced a curse on them; and refused to trust in Him who was raised up to bless them. Their obstinate pride and unbelief were the immediate cause of their ruin; and God had decreed, in righteousness, nothing more than to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts. Is. 3:11—15. 23:16. 1 Pet. 2: 7, 8.—Some expositors think, the apostle had reference to a race, in which the Jews, with all their advantages, were so far from coming in before the Gentiles, that they were left at a great distance behind; 'for the last shall be first, and the first last.' 19:29, 30.—Mr. Locke and many others argue, that the apostle only meant, that the Gentiles here spoken of, as those whom God had called (24), had embraced the true religion; not that they were actually and individually brought into a state of sal- vation; but surely, if they 'attained to righteousness, even the right- eousness which is of faith,' they were justified persons, 'children of Abraham,' children of God, and heirs of heaven; and they had before been spoken of 'as vessels of mercy, prepared before unto glory.' Though all, who professed the Gospel, were not of this character, yet none else were partakers of 'the righteousness which is of faith.'—It is also granted, as these learned expositors maintain, that the dealings of God with the Jews, and not his general conduct towards mankind at large, as to their eternal concerns, is the primary subject of the chap.; but the dispensations of God with Israel are explained, illustrated, and justified, on such principles, as establish, in the clearest manner, the method of his dealings with mankind at large. And if we are not allowed to infer general conclusions, from the commands, testimonies, promis- es, and dispensations of God to Israel, in respect of individuals; it does not appear, how we can use the Scriptures, or a great proportion of them, at least, either for doctrinal or practical purposes; either for encourage-

CHAP. X.

5 The Scripture sheweth the difference betwixt the righteousness of the law, and this of faith, 11 and that all, both Jew and Gentile, that believe, shall not be confounded, 13 and that the Gentiles shall receive the Word and believe. 19 Israel was not ignorant of these things.

BRETHREN, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.

2 For I bear them record, that they have a zeal<sup>a</sup> of God, but not according to knowledge.

3 For they being ignorant<sup>b</sup> of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves<sup>c</sup> unto the righteousness of God.

reignty and absolute dominion. 2. They attained to righteousness, notwithstanding; by faith, not by being proselyted, but by embracing Christ, believing in Christ, and submitting to the Gospel.

II. Concerning the Jews, observe,

1. They missed their end; they followed after the law of righteousness, v. 31. they talked much of justification and holiness, seemed very ambitious of being the people of God, and the favorites of heaven, but they did not attain to it, i. e. the greatest part of them did not.

2. They mistook their way, which was the cause of their missing the end, v. 32, 33. They sought, but not in the right way, not by faith, (depending on Christ, and submitting to the terms of the gospel, the very life and end of the law;) but by the works of the law; as if they were to expect justification by their observance of the law of Moses, a corrupt principle, which, having espoused, they could by no means get over, and so could not be reconciled to the doctrine of Christ, which brought them off from that, to expect justification through the merit and satisfaction of another. Christ, Himself, is to some a stone of stumbling, Is. 8: 14. 28: 16. It is sad He should be set for the fall of any, yet it is so, Luke 2: 34. But still there is a remnant that do believe on Him; and they shall not be ashamed, their hopes and expectations of justification by Him shall not be disappointed, as theirs are, who expect it by the law.

So that, on the whole, the unbelieving Jews have no reason to quarrel with God, for rejecting them; they had a fair offer of righteousness, and life, and salvation, made them on gospel-terms, which they did not like, and would not come up to; therefore if they perish, their blood is on their own heads.

CHAP. X. The dissolving of the peculiar church-state of the Jews, and the substituting and erecting of a catholic [general, or universal] church-state among the Gentile nations; though to us, now, they may seem no great matter; yet to them who lived when they were doing, who knew how high the Jews had stood in God's favor, and how deplorable the condition of the Gentile world had been for many ages, it appeared very great and marvellous, and a mystery hard to be understood. The apostle in this ch. as in the foregoing and that which follows, is explaining and proving it; but with several very useful digressions, which a little interrupt the thread of his discourse.

V. 1—11. The scope of this part of the ch. is to show the vast difference between the righteousness of the law and that of faith, and the great pre-eminence of the latter; that he might induce and persuade the Jews to believe in Christ, aggravate the folly and sin of those who refused, and justify God in their rejection.

I. Paul here professes his good affection to the Jews, with the reason of it, v. 1, 2. where he gives them,

1. A good wish, v. 1. that they might be saved—from the temporal ruin and destruction coming on them; from the wrath to come, eternal wrath, hanging over their heads. It is implied, that they might be convinced and converted; he could not pray in faith, that they might be saved in unbelief. It is our duty, truly and earnestly to desire the salvation of the souls of others, next to the salvation of our own. This, he says, was his heart's desire and prayer: which intimates its strength and sincerity.

2. A good witness, as a reason of his good wish, v. 2. The unbelieving Jews were his most bitter enemies, yet he gives them as good a character as the truth would bear. We should say the best we can, even of our worst enemies; this is blessing them that curse us. We should notice what is commendable even in bad people. They have a zeal of God. Their opposition to the gospel, is from a principle of respect to the law, which they knew to have come from God. There is such a thing as a blind, misguided zeal: such was that of the Jews, they hated Christ's people and ministers, and cast them out, saying, Let the Lord be glorified, Is. 66: 5. nay, they killed them, and thought they did God good service, Jn. 16: 2.

II. He here shows the fatal mistake the unbelieving Jews were guilty of; which was their ruin. Their zeal was not according to knowledge. It is true, God gave them that law which they were so zealous for; but they might have known that, by the appearance of the promised Messiah, an end was put to it. He gave the most convincing evidence that could be of his being the Messiah, the Son of God; yet they did not know, and would not own Him, but shut their eyes against the clear light, so that their zeal for the law was blind. This he shows further, v. 3. where observe,

1. The nature of their unbelief; not submitting to the righteousness of God, not yielding to gospel-terms, not accepting the tender of justification by faith in Christ, made in the Gospel. In true faith, there is need of a great deal of submission, therefore the first lesson Christ teaches, is, to deny ourselves; it is a great piece of condescension for a proud heart to be content to be beholden to free grace.

2. The causes of their unbelief, and those are two, ignorance of God's righteousness, pride, and conceit. They did not understand, and believe, and consider, the strict justice of God, and what need we have of a righteousness, wherein to appear before Him; or, God's way of justification now appointed, revealed by Jesus Christ. They did not know it, because they would not; they shut their eyes against the discoveries of it, and loved darkness, rather. They thought they needed not to be beholden to the merit of Christ, and therefore depended on their own performances, as sufficient to make up a righteousness wherein to appear before God. See an instance of this pride in the Pharisee, Luke 18: 10, 11. Comp. v. 14.

III. He here shows the folly of that mistake, and how unreasonable it was for them to be seeking justification by the works of the law, now that Christ was come, and had brought in an everlasting righteousness; considering,

1. The subserviency of the law to the gospel, v. 4. The design of the law was to lead people to Christ. The moral law was for the searching of the wound; the ceremonial for the shadowing forth of the remedy;

ment, warning, or 'instruction in righteousness.'—'Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning.'—'All these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come. Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.' 15:4—7. 1 Cor. 10: 1—12.—The Jews, as a nation, had outward privileges; and so have Christians, as a collective body. Most of them trusted in these outward privileges, and rejected the salvation of Christ; and so do the bulk of professed Christians. A remnant, however, believed and were saved, while the rest were hardened and rejected: the case is the same with professed Christians. This remnant was 'the election of grace;' and so is the remnant of true Christians.

NOTES. CHAP. X. V. 1—4. Aware of the offence which his doctrine would give the Jews, and even many of the Jewish Christians, the apostle repeated his protestation of his earnest desires, and fervent prayers, for the salvation of his people; notwithstanding their prejudices against him, and the persecutions which he had endured from them. 9: 1—3.—The expression, 'establish their own righteousness,' seems to be taken from a person, who allows that his house is out of repair, and in some danger of falling; but will not be convinced that the foundation is destroyed, and that it must come down, and be entirely rebuilt on a new foundation. He therefore endeavors, by props and buttresses, and various repairs, to make the house stand; but all his expense and labor are thrown away; and if he persist in his vain endeavor, it will be likely to fall down, and bury him in its ruins. Mat. 7:24—27. Thus the Jews, (and immense numbers in every age do the same, for substance, though in varied forms,) when convinced of defects in their moral righteousness, endeavored to repair them, by ceremonial or superstitious observances; nor would they be convinced, that they were building on a false foundation; that they must totally give over these vain and perilous endeavors; and come for a gratuitous salvation to Christ by faith, even as the poor Gentiles did.—Some argue, that if the apostle had in the preceding ch. meant, that the rejection of the Jewish nation was absolutely decreed, he would not have prayed for them; but it may be answered, that he knew a remnant was excepted; he did not know to what number this remnant might extend, and his 'good-will,' or benevolence, towards them was so strong, that he prayed for the conversion of Israelites, in a way which implied a longing desire that they all might be saved. Had it depended on him, this would have been the case; he prayed according to the knowledge which he had, and left secret things to God; adoring his wisdom and justice, even in those events which were contrary to the feelings and desire of his heart.—The author of these notes can answer for one, that his firm belief of personal election and the divine decrees, does not in the least interfere with his joining heartily in that prayer of our excellent liturgy, 'That it may please God to have mercy upon all men.' 4 For Christ is the end ° of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

5 For Moses describeth a the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them.

6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say ° not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above:)

7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.)

8 But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith which we preach;

9 That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus; and shalt believe in thine heart ° that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

11 For the Scripture saith, h Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

Christ the end of both; see 2 Cor. 3:7. and comp. Gal. 3:23, 24. Christ is the end of the ceremonial law; the sacrifices, offerings, and purifications appointed under the O. T. prefigured Christ, and now He had come, they were at an end. Christ is the end of the moral law, in that He did what the law could not do, ch. 8:3. and secured the great end of it: viz. to bring men to perfect obedience, and so to obtain justification; this is now impossible, by reason of the power of sin, and the corruption of nature; yet the law is not destroyed, nor the intention of the Lawgiver frustrated; but full satisfaction being made by the death of Christ, for our breach of the law, the end is attained, and we put in another way of justification. Christ is thus the end of the law for righteousness, for justification; but only to every one that believeth; on our believing, our humble consent to the terms of the Gospel, we become interested in Christ's satisfaction, and so are justified through the redemption that is in Jesus.

2. The excellency of the gospel above the law: proved by showing their different constitution.

(4.) 'I. e. belief in Christ, receiving Him by faith, and thus attaining to dikaiosunē Theou [justification that is of God], accomplishes the end or object of what the law would accomplish, viz. which perfect obedience to the law would accomplish. In this simple way, and consonant with the context, I interpret this long agitated and much controverted text. That telos [tr. end] has often substantially the same meaning here given it, may be abundantly shown. St., whom see. 'The most favorite tr. is, (so Cypr., Crell., Kop.,) Christ has put an end to the law. But this is not agreeable to the context. The most simple and satisfactory interpr. seems that of Chrys., Theoph., Gec., Phot., and Theod., also Carpz. "The words are meant for the Jews, and Jewish Christians, to assure them, that nothing is lost by abandoning the law. Paul shows there is only one justification, and that what the law attempted, the gospel fulfils; and, therefore, he who chooses the one by faith, fulfils the other; whereas, he who aims at the other, must miss of this; q. d. The intent and end of the law, viz. justification, is fulfilled and perfected in Christ.'" BLOOMF.

V. 5-11. Moses had repeatedly shown the righteousness, which the law demanded of a man, in order to his justification; and his statement proved, that, without a sinless obedience to every precept, no man could be accepted according to the law; and thus it effectually cut off all transgressors from every hope, in this way. Lev. 18:5. Deut. 27:26. Ez. 20:11. Luke 10:25-29. Gal. 3:10-14. But 'the righteousness of faith' might be introduced, as using the words of Moses, on an especial occasion. Deut. 30:11-14.—The self-condemned sinner is not called on to perplex himself with inquiries, how this righteousness may be found. For Christ has already come down from heaven, and finished his work of righteousness. He had, too, come back from the grave, or the place of departed spirits, and was exalted at the right hand of the Fa-

(1.) What is the righteousness which is of the law? v. 5. The tenor of it is, Do, and live, i. e. be happy, not only in Canaan, but in heaven: abstracted from its respect to Christ and the gospel, the law owneth nothing as a righteousness sufficient to justify a man, but that of perfect obedience. For this he quotes Lev. 18:5. See, likewise, Gal. 3:12. Now, was it not extreme folly in the Jews, to adhere so closely to this way of justification and salvation, which was in itself so hard, and by the corruption of nature now become impossible, when there was a new and a living way opened?

(2.) What is that righteousness which is of faith, v. 6, &c. This he describes in the words of Moses, Deut. 30:11-14. and shows that it is not at all hard or difficult. We need not go to heaven, to search the records there, or to inquire into the secrets of the divine counsel. It is true, Christ is in heaven, but we may be justified and saved without going thither, to fetch Him thence, or sending a special messenger to Him. Nor need we go to the deep, to fetch Christ out of the grave, or from the state of the dead. It is true, Christ was in the grave, and it is as true, He is now in heaven: but we need not perplex and puzzle ourselves with fancied difficulties, nor must we create to ourselves such gross and carnal ideas of these things, as if the method of salvation was impracticable, and the design of the revelation only to amuse us. No, salvation is not put at so vast a distance from us.

But it is very plain and easy; The Word is nigh thee; Christ in the promise, Christ exhibited to us, and offered, in the Word. Christ is nigh thee, for the Word is nigh thee: nigh thee indeed: it is in thy mouth, and in thy heart; there is no difficulty in understanding, believing, and owning of it. The work thou hast to do lies within thee; the kingdom of God is within you, Luke 17:21. There is nothing now to be done, but a work in us; that must be our care, to look to our heart and mouth. The Word is very nigh us, in our mouth, we are reading it daily; it is in our heart, we are, or should be, thinking of it daily—even the Word of faith; the Gospel and the promise of it; called the Word of faith, because it is conversant about the object of faith, makes faith the great condition of justification, and is the ordinary means by which faith is wrought and conveyed.

Now what is this Word of faith? We have the tenor of it, v. 9, 10. the sum of the Gospel, which is plain and easy enough. Observe the promise; Thou shalt be saved. What the Gospel exhibits and tenders, is, salvation, and this on two conditions. [1.] Confessing the Lord Jesus; openly professing relation to Him, and dependence on Him, as our Prince and Savior; owning his religion in the face of all the allurements and affrightments of this world, standing by Him in all weathers, a very great thing, especially when the profession of Christ and Christianity hazarded estate, honor, preferment, liberty, life, and all that is dear in this world; which was the case in the primitive times: and, [2.] Believing in the heart, that God raised Him from the dead. The profession of faith with the mouth, if there be not the power of it in the heart, is but a mockery; the root of it must be laid in an unfeigned assent to the revelation of the Gospel concerning Christ, especially concerning his resurrection, which is the fundamental article of the Christian faith; for thereby He was declared to be the Son of God with power, and full evidence was given, that God accepted his satisfaction.

This is further illustrated, v. 10. and the order inverted, because there must first be faith in the heart, before there can be an acceptable confession with the mouth. 1st. Concerning faith; it is with the heart that man believeth; which implies more than an assent of the understanding, and takes in the consent of the will, an inward, hearty, sincere, and strong consent. This is unto righteousness, the righteousness of justification, and the righteousness of sanctification. Faith is the condition of our justification, ch. 5:1. and the root and spring of our sanctification; in it, it is begun; by it, it is carried on, Acts 15:9. 2dly. Concerning profession; it is with the mouth that confession is made; confession to God in prayer and praise, ch. 15:6. confession to men, owning the ways of God before others, especially when called to it in a day of persecution. It is part of the honor of Christ, that every tongue shall confess, Phil. 2:11. And this is said to be unto salvation; because it is the performance of the condition of that promise, Mat. 10:32. Comp. Luke 21:15. Justification by faith lays the foundation of our title to salvation; but by confession we build on that foundation, and come at last to full possession.

So that we have here a brief summary of the terms of salvation; and they are very reasonable; in short, this, that we must devote, dedicate, and give up to God, our souls and our bodies; our souls in believing with the heart, and our bodies in confessing with the mouth. This do, and thou shalt live. For this, v. 11. he quotes Is. 28:16. He that believeth will not make haste, so the prophet has it; will not make haste to run away from the sufferings he meets with in the way of his duty; will not be ashamed of a despised religion; will not be ashamed to own that Christ in whom he trusts; it is sinful shame that makes people deny Christ, Mk. 8:38. He shall not be ashamed of his hope in Christ; nor disappointed of his end. It is our duty that we must not, and our ther, to confer the blessing on all who in true faith applied to Him for it.—The distinction between 'confessing with the mouth,' and 'believing in the heart,' shows that the apostle was discoursing, not of a mere profession of Christianity, but of the genuine sincerity of him, who made that profession. (9.) That if. 'For if. It is not the simple fact of a resurrection of Jesus' body from the tomb, which, in the apostle's view, is the great and distinguishing feature of Christian belief; it is the exaltation, glory, and saving power that are consequent on the resurrection, which he evidently connects with this event. So in Phil. 2:8-11. Acts 2:24, 31-33. Comp. Heb. 2:9. 2 Cor. 4:14. Acts 17:31. Rom. 4:25. 1 Cor. 15:17-20.' In.

privilege that we shall not be ashamed of our faith in Christ.

V. 12—21. The first words express the design of the apostle through these vs., that there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles. See Col. 3:11. For the proof of this, he urges,

1. That God is the same to all; not one God to the Jews, that is more kind, and another to the Gentiles, that is less kind; but a common Father to all mankind; the same Lord, not only good, but rich, plenteous in goodness to all, to all that call upon Him; so that we have nothing to do but to draw out by prayer, as there is occasion, Ez. 36:37.

11. That the promise is the same to all, v. 13. Whoever shall call; one as well as another, without exception. Calling on the name of the Lord, is here put for all practical religion.

For further illustration, he observes,

1. How necessary it was the Gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, v. 14, 15. This was it the Jews were so angry with Paul for. Now, he shows how needful it was, to bring them within the reach of the forementioned promise, an interest in

V. 12—17. The Christian church seems, during many ages, to have forgotten her obligation to send the Gospel to the nations; but it has in our days been brought to remembrance. May it be acted on more and more!—The manner in which the apostle applies the words to Christ, which Isaiah spoke of JEREMIAH, forms a strong proof of our Lord's Deity.—(15) Feet, &c. 'The feet of those who have travelled far, in a hot country, through rough and dusty roads, present a spectacle naturally offensive: ... nevertheless, the consideration, that the persons themselves are, to us, the messengers of peace and felicity, would make us behold with delight this indication of their embassy. Haud indecoro putvere sordidos. Horace.' Campbell.—The whole passage most clearly shows, that without calling on Christ none can be saved; that without faith none can call on Him; and without the preaching, or publication in some way, of the Gospel, none can believe in Him.—The awful state of the heathen nations, and our imperious [imperative?] duty towards them, can hardly be more strongly stated, nor the opinion of those who argue that multitudes will be saved by Jesus, who never heard of his name, more energetically reprobated.—(15) How beautiful, &c. From the Heb., omitting 'upon the mountains.' 'The Sept. seems much corrupted here.' Raulolph. (Is. 52:7.)—(16) Lord, who, &c. Verbatim from the LXX, which add, 'Lord,' not found in the Heb. Is. 53:1. Sc.

(12.) For there is. 'There is, then. . . For there is the same Lord of all, who is rich (in mercy) unto, &c.' The quotation from Is. 23:16, which in Heb. contains the word all, gives Paul occasion to bring in what he had often taught, especially in chs. 3 and 4, that salvation is proffered to all men, without distinction, and on the same terms. The for (Gr. gar) is "illustrative," i. e. of the word all. In fact, there is here a singular succession of 5 clauses, arising one out of another, to all of which gar [for] is prefixed. This is altogether characteristic of which they should not envy to any of their fellow-creatures. (1.) They cannot call on Him in whom they have not believed. Except they believe that He is God, they will not call on Him by prayer; to what purpose should they? He that comes to God, by prayer, must believe, Heb. 11:6. (2.) They cannot believe in Him of whom they have not heard. Some way or other the divine revelation must be made known to us, before we can receive it and assent to it. In hearing, is included reading, which is tantamount, and by which many are brought to believe, Jn. 20:31. But hearing only is mentioned, as the more ordinary and natural way of receiving information. (3.) They cannot hear without a preacher; how should they? Preachers and hearers are correlates, and imply each other. (4.) They cannot preach except they be sent, be both commissioned, and in some measure qualified. This proves, that to the regular ministry there must be a regular mission and ordination. It is God's prerogative to send ministers; therefore to Him we must pray, that He would send forth laborers, Mat. 9:38. He only can qualify men for, and incline them to, the work of the ministry. But the competency of that qualification, and the sincerity of that inclination, must needs be referred to the judgment of a competent number of those of approved wisdom and experience in that office; who, as in all other callings, are presumed the most able judges; and who are empowered to set apart such as they find so qualified and inclined, to this work of the ministry; that by this preservation of the succession, the name of Christ may endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. And they that are thus set apart, not only may, but must preach, as those that are sent.

2. How welcome the Gospel ought to be to those to whom it was preached; because it showed the way to salvation, v. 15. For this he quotes Is. 52:7. The like passage we have, Na. 1:15, which, if it point at the glad tidings of the deliverance of Israel out of Babylon, in the type, yet looks further to the Gospel, the good news of our salvation by Jesus Christ. Observe, (1.) What the Gospel is: the Gospel of peace; the Word of reconciliation between God and man. Luke 2:14. Or, peace in general, for all good, so explained here; glad tidings of good things, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth. (2.) What the work of ministers is; to preach this Gospel, to bring these glad tidings; to evangelize peace, so the original, to evangelize good things. Every preacher is in this sense an evangelist: they are not only messengers to carry the news, but ambassadors to treat; and the first gospel-preachers were angels, Luke 2:13, &c. (3.) How acceptable they should therefore be for their work's sake; How beautiful are the feet, how welcome are they! When Christ was sending forth his disciples, He washed their feet. Those that preach the Gospel of peace, should see to it that their feet, their life and conversation, be beautiful: the holiness of ministers' lives is the beauty of their feet. How beautiful, in the eyes of them that hear them! Those that welcome the message, cannot but love the messengers. See 1 Thess. 5:12, 13.

3. He answers an objection against all this, which might be taken from the small success the Gospel had in many places, v. 16. All the Jews, all the Gentiles, have not obeyed; for the greater part of both remain in unbelief and disobedience. Observe, The Gospel is given us, not only to be known and believed, but to be obeyed. It is not a system of notions, but a rule of practice. This little success of the Word was likewise foretold by the prophet, Is. 53:1. Very few have believed, to the many that persist in unbelief. Under such a melancholy consideration, it is good for us to go to God and make our complaint to Him. Lord, who hath, &c. In answer to this,

(1.) He shows that the Word preached is the ordinary means of working faith, v. 17. So then,—however; though many that hear do not believe, yet those that believe have first heard. Faith cometh by hearing. It is the summary of what he had said before, v. 14. God gives faith, but it is by the Word, as the instrument. See 1 Thess. 2:13.

(2.) That those who would not believe the report of the Gospel, yet, having heard it, they were thereby left inexcusable, and may thank themselves for their own ruin, v. 18. to the end. [1.] The Gentiles have heard it, v. 18. Yes, more or less, they have either heard the Gospel, or heard of it. The commission the apostles received, runs thus; Go ye into all the world, preach to every creature, disciple all nations; and they did, with indefatigable industry and wonderful success, pursue that commission. See the extent of Paul's province, ch. 15:19. even to Britain, one of the utmost corners of the world, not only the sound, but the words of the Gospel came within a few years after Christ's ascension. In order to this, the gift of tongues was at first poured so plentifully on the apostles, Acts 2. In the expression, here, he plainly alludes to Ps. 19:4. which speaks of the notices, which the visible works of God in the creation give to all the world, of the power and Godhead of the Creator. As under the O. T. God provided for the publishing of the work of creation, by the sun, moon, and stars; so now for the publishing of the work of redemption to all the world, by the preaching of gospel-ministers, who are therefore called stars. [2.] The Jews have heard it too, v. 19—21. For this, he appeals to two passages of the O. T. to show the manner of Paul; who, in the course of making a single declaration, often throws out words, which suggest whole trains of thought that are but indirectly connected with the main object of the declaration, but which the apostle stops to express; and in expressing them, he is often led to other thoughts connected with these subordinate ones; and these other thoughts again lead to a third series (if they may be so named); and, after expressing all these, the writer returns again, and resumes his main subject; comp. for example, 1:1—7. where vs. 1, and 7. belong together; 5:12—18. where v. 18. resumes the subject of v. 12. and completes the comparison there begun. So in Eph. 3:1—4:1. where 3:1. is immediately connected with 4:1. while there is a parenthesis (so to speak) of 20 verses between.

(13.) 'Is the principle [comp. on v. 6.] the same under the Christian, as under the Jewish dispensation, viz. that those who are exposed to danger and distress, and who put their trust in God, shall obtain deliverance? Is this true in a spiritual, as well as temporal respect? Or, rather, is there not a plerösis [fulfilling] to this promise, under the Gospel? Paul did not expect his readers to deny this; consequently his appeals, vs. 11, 13. apply specialty to Christ; (though the passages, in their original connexion, do not seem to;) thus authorizing us to apply to Christ the same divine worship and honor, which the saints of ancient days applied to Jehovah.'

Id. (15.) Preach, &c. 'Publish salvation, who proclaim good tidings. Yet all, &c.'

V. 18—21. The Jews, especially, had almost universally heard the Gospel. Very few of that nation, therefore, could plead, that they had had no opportunity of hearing this report; and their unbelief was the effect, not of ignorance or want of instruction, but of obstinate enmity against the truth. Again, could Israelites plead, that no intimations had 19 But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, 'I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you.

how inexcusable they are too. Did not Israel know that the Gentiles were to be called in? They might have known it from Moses and Esaias. 1st. One is taken from Deut. 32:21. The Jews had the offer first, Acts 3:26. and the Gentiles had but their leavings. If one would not, another would. Now this provoked them to jealousy, as the elder brother in the parable, Luke 15. The Gentiles are here called no people, and a foolish nation, not the professing people of God. Such was the state of the Gentile world, who yet were made the people of God, and Christ to them the Wisdom of God. What a provocation it was to the Jews, to see the Gentiles taken into favor, we may see, Acts 13:45. 17:5, 13. and especially 22:22. It was an instance of the great wickedness of the PRACT. OBS. Faithful ministers bear most affectionate good will to those, from whom they receive the greatest injuries; and offer their fervent and persevering prayers for the salvation of the very persons, against whom they denounce the wrath of God, if they persist in unbelief.—Careless and shameless profligates, infidels, and blasphemers are not the only persons who through the broad road to destruction, but many also who have 'a zeal for God' and religion. Mat. 7:13, 14. While, therefore, we should inculcate earnestness in that most important concern; we must also insist on the absolute necessity of its being regulated by the Word of God; without which even the most self-denying earnestness can do no more, than speciously deceive and ruin the souls of men.—Manifold are men's devices and endeavors to 'establish their own righteousness;' but all their labor is lost, and their souls continue in the most imminent danger; for, in opposition to all other methods of obtaining the divine favor, whether devised by ignorance, superstition, philosophy, enthusiasm, or grave morality, we must still insist on it, that 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth;' and that every unbeliever remains under 'the curse of the law,' and 'the wrath of God.' If a man object to this, let him take the moral previously been given, that God intended to cast them off for their unbelief and disobedience, and to take others in their stead? Even Moses, in that prophetic song, which all the people were commanded to learn throughout their generations, had represented JEHOVAH declaring, that He would excite them to jealousy by those who had been no people to Him, and raise their indignation by his favors shown to a nation, which had been despised as foolish, because idolatrous. Deut. 31:19. 32:21. This had been most remarkably accomplished, in the virulent opposition to the Gospel, which the calling of the Gentiles had excited in the Jews; when it should have stirred them up to a pious emulation, not to be surpassed in faith and holiness by those who had before been so ignorant and far from God.—(18) Their sound, &c. From the LXX, which vary from the Heb., having sound instead of line. (Ps. 19:4)—(19) I will provoke, &c. From the Sept. (Deut. 32:21).—(20, 21) I was found, &c. This agrees with the LXX, only transposing the words.—It varies little from the Hebrew. Is. 65:1, 2.

(18.) 'Paul uses the words (of Ps. 19:5) in this place, simply as the vehicle of his own thoughts, as they were very convenient and appropriate.' Sr. Sound. 'The words agree with the Sept. Also with the Heb., if Paul read gol for gom.' Koppe, whom see. Ep.

(19.) 'I say, moreover: Doth not Israel know? Provoke. Moves,' St., 'i. e. to envy, by conferring favors on those you regard as despicable.'

Jews, that they were thus enraged; and this in Deuteronomy, is the matter of a threatening. God often makes people's sin their punishment. A man needs no greater plague than to be left to the impetuous rage of his own lusts. 2dly. Another is taken from Is. 65:1, 2. which is very full, and in it Esaias is very bold; bold, indeed, to speak so plainly of the rejection of his own countrymen. Those that will be faithful need be bold, and those who resolve to please God, must not be afraid to displease any man.

Now Esaias speaks boldly and plainly, 1. Of the preventing grace and favor of God, in the reception and entertainment of the Gentiles, v. 20. The prescribed method is, Seek and find; that is a rule for us, but not for God, who is often found of those that do not seek. Thus He manifested Himself to the Gentiles, when they were so far from seeking Him and asking after Him, that they were following after lying vanities, and serving dumb idols.

2. Of the obstinacy and perverseness of Israel, notwithstanding the fair offers and affectionate invitations they had, v. 21. Observe, (1.) God's great goodness to them; his offers; I have stretched forth my hands; his patience in making them, All day long. Stretching forth the hands, is the gesture of those that require audience, Acts 26:1. or desire acceptance, Prov. 1:24. Stretched forth my hands as offering reconciliation; come, let us shake hands and be friends; and our duty is, to give the hand to Him, 2 Chr. 30:8. The time of God's patience is here called a day, fiftysome as a day, and fit for work and business; but limited as a day, and a night at the end of it. He bears long, but will not always. (2.) Their great badness to Him. They were a disobedient, gainsaying people. One word in the Heb. in Esaias, is here well explained by two; not only disobedient to the call, not yielding to it, but gainsaying and quarrelling with it, which is much worse. It is a wonder of mercy in God, that his goodness is not overcome by man's badness; and it is a wonder of wickedness in man, that his badness is not overcome by God's goodness.

CHAP. XI. The apostle, having reconciled that great truth of the rejection of the Jews, with the promise made unto the fathers, is, in this ch. further laboring to mollify the harshness of it, and to reconcile it to the divine goodness in general. It might be said, Hath God then cast away his people? The apostle therefore sets himself, in this ch., to make a return to this objection.

V. 1—22. The apostle proposes here a plausible objection, which might be urged against the divine conduct in casting off the Jewish nation, v. 1. 'Hath God cast away his people? Is the rejection total and final?' In opposition to this, he shows, that there was great goodness and mercy expressed along with this seeming severity; particularly, he insists on three things. That though some of the Jews were cast off, yet not all; though the body of them were, yet the Gentiles were taken in; and that, though cast off at present, yet in God's due time the Jews should be taken in again.

I The Jews, it is true, were many of them cast off, but not all. God forbid.

1. A chosen remnant, of believing Jews, had obtained righteousness and life by faith in Jesus Christ, v. 1—7. said to be such as He foreknew, v. 2. i. e. had thoughts of love to, before the world was; for whom He thus foreknew He did predestinate. There lies the ground of the difference. They are called the election, v. 7. the elect, God's chosen ones: whom He calls the election, because, what first distinguished them from, and dignified them above others, was, God's electing love. Believers are the election. Now, (1.) He shows himself one; for I also am an Israelite; as if he had said, 'Should I say all the Jews are rejected, I should cut off my own claims, and see myself abandoned.' Paul was a chosen vessel, Acts 9:15. (2.) He suggests, that, as in Elias' time, so now, this chosen remnant was really more and greater than one would think it was: which intimates, likewise, that it is no new or unusual thing for God's grace and favor to Israel to be limited and confined to a remnant of that people; for so it was in Elijah's time. The Scripture saith it of Elias,—in the story of Elias, the great reformer of the O. T. Observe,

[1.] His mistake concerning Israel; as if their apostasy in the days of Ahab was so general, that he himself was the only faithful servant God had in the world. He refers to 1 K. 19:14. where (it is here said)

'law of God,' (for rules which men prescribe, to themselves and to each other, are out of the question,) and, having produced a sinless obedience to it, through the whole of his continuance here, in thought, word, and deed, let him then demand the reward as a debt. But if this be a desperate attempt; let him submit to the degradation of a criminal, and apply for pardon to the clemency of his offended Lord, and for eternal life as his free gift through Jesus Christ, and by faith in Him. 6:21—23. Pract. Obs. 16—23.—The humble, trembling sinner has, however, no cause for discouragement. 'The righteousness of faith,' as it were, invites him to accept of it; the Surety has finished his obedience and atonement, and is risen and exalted to be our all-prevailing Advocate. 8:32—39. Heb. 7:23—28. 9:24—26. 1 John 2:1, 2.—As faith (whence all true prayer proceeds) comes 'by hearing the Word of God,' we should take care to be found among those who hear, believe, and obey the Gospel; and we should zealously and diligently endeavor to communicate the same blessing to others, even to 'the ends of the earth,' with all the influence and talent which we possess; and with every self-denying exertion of which we are capable. SCOTT.

Not a people. 'I. e. not peculiarly so, by any covenant or relation. Foolish. Also, as idolatrous, impious; since the knowledge of God is alone true wisdom. Grot. Moses meant the Philistines; Paul applies it also to the Greeks, the Gentiles in general. The Jews themselves (as Salomo, Bechai, Abarbanel, so Wets.) understand, by foolish nations, the Christians, whom they call Idumeans or Romans, so Alting. Bl. (20.) 'I made myself manifest to those who did not inquire for Me. The Sept. here, as expressing the general idea of the prophet, Paul uses, as fully adequate to his purpose.' Sr. Found .. sought. Koppe and Ros. observe, that God is said to be found, and to become manifest, when He by his benefits excites men to worship and obey Him: and the terms zētein [seek] and eperōtan [inquire for], like the Heb. bksh and shal, are synonyms used to denote devout worship of God.' Id.

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. An entirely free favor must be absolutely distinct from a reward, conferred in consequence of some work performed; as the price of one farthing, paid for what is worth a thousand pounds, must, in exact propriety of speech, essentially distinguish it from an entirely free gift.—This text is so decisive on the subject, that great pains have been taken to explain it away; but really the arguments of the most able and learned men, on the other side, prove nothing so much as the weakness of their cause. I shall, therefore, only observe in general; that in fact, those are not always or even generally

8 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal.

5 Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace.

6 And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

7 What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded,

8 (According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear,) unto this day.

he maketh intercession to God against Israel. A strange kind of intercession. He deals with God against Israel; so it may be read; so the word is tr. Acts 25:24. Now Elijah in this prayer spake as if there were none left faithful in Israel but himself only. The powers of Israel were then persecuting powers; They have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars, and they seek my life. The multitude of Israel were then idolatrous: I am left alone. The few faithful were not only lost in the crowd of idolaters, but crushed and driven into corners by the rage of persecutors. When the wicked rise, a man is hidden, Prov. 28:12. God's altars were not only neglected, and let go out of repair, but digged down, when altars were set up for Baal. This was his intercession against Israel; as if he had said, 'Lord, is not this a people ripe for ruin, worthy to be cast off? What else canst Thou do for thy great name?'

[2.] The rectifying of this mistake by the answer of God, v. 4. I have reserved. Things are often much better with the church of God, than wise and good men think. In times of general apostasy, there called, who, to our apprehension, are best disposed to perform good works, but the contrary, as the examples recorded in Scripture alone undeniably demonstrate; Mat. 19:29, 30. 21:28—32. Luke 13:22—30. that every truly good disposition, in a fallen creature, must be the effect, and cannot, therefore, be the cause, of the grace of God bestowed on him; that God did not act without reason in choosing one rather than another, though we are not made acquainted with his reasons; and that the display of the infinite riches of his mercy, the omnipotence of his grace, and the glory of his own sovereignty, in converting the most unlikely persons in the world, are far more probable reasons of his choice, than any foreseen comparative goodness of natural disposition in those who are saved, above those that perish.—(5) The election of grace. [Not those who chose grace, but those whom grace chose; that is, those whom God freely chose. Neither would "grace be grace," if we were in the smallest degree chosen for our foreseen good works; nor would "work be work," if in any measure it needed the help of grace.] Beza.—(3, 4) They have killed, &c.] The first part comes nearer to the Heb. than to the LXX; and the second, is plainly another tr., 'and seems to be a better one, of the Hebrew.' is usually a remnant that keep their integrity; God reserves them to Himself, otherwise, they had gone down the stream with the rest: his free and almighty grace makes the difference. Seven thousand: a competent number to bear testimony against the idolatry of Israel; yet, compared with the many thousands of Israel, a very small number. The description of them is, that they have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. The best evidence of integrity is freedom from present, prevailing corruptions, to swim against the stream when it is strong. 2 Pet. 1:12. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity.

[3.] The application of this instance to the case in hand, v. 5—7. As it has been, so it is. In Elijah's time there was a remnant, and so there is now; nay, much more now under the Gospel, when the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, appears more illustrious. A remnant, a few of many; a remnant of believing Jews, when the rest were obstinate in their unbelief; called a remnant according to the election of grace; concerning which, observe, 1st. Whence it takes its rise; from the free grace of God, v. 6. that grace which excludes works: works done, or foreseen; if so, it would not be grace. It is not grace, properly so called, if it be not perfectly free. Election is purely according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. 1:5. Paul's heart was so full of the freeness of God's grace, that in the midst of his discourse he turns aside, as it were, to make the remark, If of grace, then not of works. And some observe, that faith itself, which in the matter of justification is opposed to works, is here included in them; for faith has a peculiar receptivity to receive the free grace of God for our justification, but not to receive that grace for our election. 2dly. What it obtains: that which Israel, i. e. the body of that people, in vain sought for, v. 7. justification, and acceptance with God; see ch. 9:31. Such was the favor of God to the chosen remnant. But,

2. The rest were blinded, v. 7. left to perish in their unbelief; nay, made worse by that which should have made them better: blinded; hardened, so some; were seared, and made braway and insensible. Blindness and hardness are expressive of the same senselessness and stupidity of spirit. They shut their eyes and would not see; that was their sin: and then God, in a way of righteous judgment, blinded their eyes, that they could not see; there was their punishment. This seemed harsh doctrine: to qualify it, therefore, he vouches two witnesses out of the O. T., which speak of such a thing.

(1.) Isaiah, who spake of such a judgment in his day, ch. 29:10. 6:9. The spirit of slumber, i. e. an indisposedness to mind either their duty or interest. The following words explain what is meant; eyes, that they should not see, and ears, that they should not hear. They were quite infatuated, saw Christ, but did not believe in Him; heard his Word, but did not receive it; so both their hearing and their seeing were in vain. It was all one as if they had neither seen nor heard. Of all judgments spiritual judgments are the sorest, and most to be dreaded, though they make the least noise. Ever since Esaias prophesied, this hardening work hath been in the doing unto this day; some among them have been blind and senseless. Or, rather, ever since the first preaching of the Gospel; multitudes of them, even to this day in which we live, are hardened and blinded; the obstinacy and unbelief go by succession, from generation to generation, according to their own fearful imprecation, which entailed the curse; His blood be upon us, and upon our children.

(2.) David, v. 9, 10. quoted from Ps. 69:22, 23. where David having, in the Spirit, foretold the sufferings of Christ, from his own people the Jews, particularly that of their giving Him vinegar to drink; in the next words, under the form of an imprecation, foretells the dreadful judgments of God on them for it; Let their table become a snare: which the apostle here applies to the present blindness of the Jews, and the offence they took at the Gospel, which increased their hardness. The passage speaks, [1.] Of the ruin of their comforts; Let their table be made a snare, i. e. an occasion of sin and misery. [2.] Of the ruin of their powers and faculties, v. 10. their eyes darkened, their backs bowed down; that they can neither find the right way, nor, if they could, be able to walk in it. The Jews, after their national rejection of Christ and his Gospel, became infatuated in their politics, so that their very counsels turned against them, and hastened their ruin by the Romans. Or, it may be understood spiritually; their backs are bowed down in carnality and worldly-mindedness,—Curva in terris animarum,—an exact description of the state and temper of the present remainder of that people; they are manifestly to this day under the power of this curse. Divine curses will work long. It is a sign we have our eyes darkened, if we are bowed down in worldly-mindedness.

masc. form is general in the O. T., yet the fem. occ. Hos. 2:8. Wisd. 1:4. Tob. 1:5. where, from the Vulg., it seems the idol was of both sexes. It is commonly supposed to designate the sun and moon, but what it was is uncertain. Kop. See Selden. 'Ros. remarks, that the image was of a bull, or female calf, or cow, the former designating the sun, the latter the moon: the first worshipped (so Abarbanel) by the men, the last by the women.' Bloomf.

(6.) And if, &c. Some reject this clause, but, as Bloomf. shows, on insufficient authority. Id.

V. 7—10. 'The election' here mentioned, as distinct from Israel, God's chosen people, (i. e. an election within an election,) clearly marks the difference between an election of a people to special external privileges, and a personal choice of individuals to eternal life: and it refutes unanswerably the reasonings of those, who would confine all these Scriptures to the former kind of election, and exclude the latter. O—q.—This judicial blindness of the enemies of Christ, had been clearly foretold; and might have been previously expected. Deut. 29:4. Ps. 69:22—28. Is. 6:9, 10. 29:9—12. Acts 1:20—22. These Scriptures have already been explained in this sense; but we may add, on the version here given of David's words, that the provision made for the souls of the Jews (as well as their temporal plenty), was, in righteous judgment, made the occasion of their being more deeply ensnared in guilt, and sinking under more dreadful condemnation, as the recompense of their unbelief; till at length they were totally blinded, and given up as slaves to the oppression of their enemies, to be bowed down [cut, page 34, Vol. III.] continually with the heavy burdens laid on them; an emblem of their base and ruinous bondage to sin and Satan. Lev. 26:31—45. Deut. 28:15—68. Dan. 9:25—27. Mat. 21:40—44. 23:29—36. 27:24, 25. Acts 3:22, 23. 7:51—53. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.—(8) God hath given, &c.] 'This by no means implies, that God infuses any new viciousness; but that He, as a just Judge, delivers up those, who are destitute of his grace, unto Satan, and to their own lusts, to be more and more blinded.' Beza. This venerable reformer certainly adopts, what is generally called the supralapsarian doctrine; and ventures on expressions, which few mod-

10 Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway.

11 I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the <sup>n</sup> Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy.

12 Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the <sup>n</sup> diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness?

13 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I <sup>o</sup> am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office;

14 If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save <sup>p</sup> some of them.

15 For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?

II. Another thing which qualified this doctrine of the rejection of the Jews, was, that though they were cast off and unchurched, yet the Gentiles were taken in, v. 11—14, which he applies by way of caution to the Gentiles, v. 17—22.

1. The rejection of the Jews made room for the reception of the Gentiles, v. 11. Not but that salvation might have come to the Gentiles if they had stood; but by the divine appointment it was so ordered, that the Gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, on the Jews' refusal of it. Thus in the parable, Mat. 22:8, 9. Luke 14:21. And so in the history, Acts 13:46, 18:6. The fall of them, v. 12, hastened the Gospel so much the sooner into the Gentile world; which was its greatest riches, better than thousands of gold and silver. Or, The riches of the Gentiles was the multitude of converts among them. True believers are God's jewels. To the same purport, v. 15. The casting away of them is the reconciling of the world. God's displeasure toward them made way for his favor toward the Gentiles. God was in Christ reconciling the world, 2 Cor. 5:19.

2. The use he makes of this.

(1.) As a kinsman to the Jews, here is a word of excitement and exhortation to them; to stir them up to receive and embrace the gospel-offer. This God intended in his favor to the Gentiles, to provoke the Jews to jealousy, v. 11. and Paul endeavors to enforce it accordingly, v. 14. See an instance of such an emulation in Esau, Gen. 28:6—9. There is a commendable emulation in the affairs of our souls: why should not we be as holy and happy as any of our neighbors? In this emulation there needs no suspicion, undermining, or counterming; for the church hath room enough, and the new covenant grace and comfort enough, for us all. The blessings are not lessened by the multitude of the sharers. See what was Paul's business, to save souls; and yet the utmost he promises himself is but to save some: though he were such a powerful preacher, and spoke and wrote with such evidence and demonstration of the Spirit. Ministers must think their pains well bestowed, if they can but be instrumental to save some.

(2.) As an apostle to the Gentiles, here is a word of caution for them: take heed, you Gentiles, believing Romans, lest you do anything to forfeit it. Paul takes this, as other occasions, to apply his discourse to the Gentiles, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, Acts 22:21. compare Acts 9:15. It was likewise the intention of his ordination, Gal. 2:9. Comp. Acts 13:2. we must particularly mind our own work. I magnify mine office. There were those that vilified it, and him because of it: for this the Jews were so outrageous against him, Acts 22:21, 22. It is a sign of true love to Jesus Christ, to reckon that service and work for Him truly honorable, which the world looks upon with scorn, as mean and contemptible. The office of the ministry is an office to be magnified. Mine office, —my ministry, my service, not my lordship and dominion. It was not the dignity and power, but the duty and work of an apostle, that Paul was so much in love with.

Two things he exhorts the Gentiles to, with reference to the rejected Jews. [1.] To respect the Jews, notwithstanding, and to desire their conversion. This is intimated in the prospect he gives them of the advantage that would accrue to the church by their conversion, v. 12, 15. [2.] To take heed to themselves, lest they also should stumble and fall, v. 17—22. Where observe,

1st. The privilege the Gentiles had by being taken into the church. They were grafted in, v. 17, as a branch of a wild olive into a good olive. It is applicable to a saving union with Christ; all that are by a lively faith grafted into Christ, partake of Him as the branches from the root; receive from his fulness. But it is here spoken of as a visible church-membership, from which the Jews were as branches broken off; and so the Gentiles were grafted in, among them that continued, or in the room of them that were broken off, and partake of the same privileges the Jews did, the root and fatness. The olive-tree is the visible church, called so, Jer. 11:16. the root was Abraham; not the root of communication, so, Christ only is the Root; but the root of administration, he being the first with whom the covenant was so solemnly made. Now the believing Gentiles partake of this root, Luke 19:9. Gal. 3:14. the same fatness of the olive-tree, the same for substance, special protection, lively oracles, means of salvation, a standing ministry, instituted ordinances; and, among the rest, the visible church-membership of their infant seed, which was part of the fatness of the olive-tree that the Jews had, and cannot be imagined to be denied to the Gentiles.

2dly. A caution not to abuse these privileges. 1. 'Be not proud, vs. 18, 19. Do not therefore trample on the Jews as a reprobate people, nor insult over them that are broken off, much less over those that do continue.' Grace is given, not to make us proud, but to make us thankful. The law of faith excludes all boasting, either of ourselves or against others. 'But remember, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee; though thou art grafted in, thou art still but a branch borne by the root; nay, and an engrafted branch, brought into the good olive contrary to nature, v. 24. not free-born, but by an act of grace enfranchised and naturalized.' 2. 'Be not secure, v. 20. Be not too confident of your own strength and standing.' A holy fear is an excellent preservative against high-mindedness: happy is the man that thus feareth always. The church of Rome now boasts of a patent of perpetual preservation; but the apostle here, in his epistle to that church when she was in her infancy and integrity, enters an express caveat against that boast, and all claims of that kind. But fear,—what? 'Why, lest thou commit a forfeiture, as they have; lest thou lose the privileges thou now enjoyest, as they have lost theirs.'

Consider, (1.) 'How they were broken off. It was not undeservedly, by an act of absolute sovereignty and prerogative, but because of unbelief.' It seems, then, it is possible for churches that have long stood by faith, to fall into such a state of infidelity as may be their ruin. Further, observe, they were natural branches, v. 21. not only interested in Abraham's covenant, but descending from Abraham's loins; and so born on the promises, and thence had a kind of tenant-right: yet when they sunk into unbelief, God did not spare them; called here severity, v. 22. a word that sounds harsh; and I do not remember it anywhere ern Calvinists (as they are called) would subscribe; yet he by no means admits those consequences, which numbers, who speak evil of what they understand not, indiscriminately charge on all who hold the doctrine of personal election to eternal life. Ex. 4:21. 2 Thes. 2:8—12. The apostle seems to have given the sense of the several prophecies to this effect referred to, rather than the exact words from the Sept., or a lit. tr. from the Heb. 'The Sept., after the usual way of this tr., puts the optative, (or rather, the imperative,) 'for what is, in the Heb., the future.' Randolph. This is, I apprehend, often done very improperly; but here the context requires it; as several verbs, in the same passage, are imperative. Ps. 69:22—23.

(7, 8.) Seeketh.] 'Sought. Election.] Elect .. Eyes that see not, ears that hear not.' St. Blinded.] 'The best comtrs., both ancient and modern, are agreed, that this [επιρωθῆσαν], like many other passive verbs, must have a reciprocal sense; as in John 12:40. So Grot. induerunt; i. e. with their prejudices, adds Ros. The verb properly signifies, calto obducere [to cover over with callosity], and [the passive] is therefore used to denote being fat, stupid, and also blind; and since, in these cases, the natural sense is either lost or weakened, the word comes to denote being (as we say) callous to any sense or virtue, hardened in conscience, and consequently vicious in conduct. V. 11—15. For this [in order to acknowledge in one full body their long despised Messiah] they [the Jews] have ever since been preserved a distinct people, almost by a continued miracle: Num. 23:9. Jer. 30:10, 11. and as their conversion will fulfil so very many ancient prophecies concerning their restoration, and will probably be effected by the fulfilment of many other prophecies; so it will doubtless exceedingly conduce to the conversion of the remaining heathen nations. Heb. 10:23—25.—This event [the restoration] will accomplish so many prophecies, in so open and signal a manner, that infidelity in every form must be finally confuted and silenced; and the attention of the most heedless must be excited to the astonishing display of the power of God, in performing his Word: and, as 'He delighteth in mercy,' He will effectually concur with these impressions, by pouring out his Holy Spirit to convert the nations, and to render genuine Christianity universally triumphant; probably to a very great degree by ministers and missionaries of converted Israel. else in Scripture ascribed to God ; and here applied to the unchurching of the Jews. God is most severe toward those that have been in profession nearest to Him, if they rebel against Him, Amos 3:2. Patience, and privileges abused, turn to the greatest wrath. Of all judgments, spiritual judgments are the sorest ; for of those he is here speaking, v. 8.

was now working among the Jews, as well as that of Marcion among the Gentiles : against both the apostles had strenuously to contend ; and these remarks tend to prevent a separation of Christian Jews and Gentiles, because the former were addicted to the rites of the law. So difficult is it to preserve a medium. Grotius. Ed.

V. 16-21. The attentive reader will readily perceive, that relative holiness, or consecration to God, is here exclusively meant. Abraham was, as it were, the root of the visible church in all subsequent ages. After Ishmael and the sons of Keturah had been broken off, the tree grew up in Isaac ; then Esau being broken off, it shot forth abundance of branches, in Jacob and his twelve sons. When any Gentiles were converted, or proselyted, they were 'grafted into this tree,' by circumcision, as long as the legal dispensation lasted ; (but by baptism after the Christian dispensation entered) ; and they, with their posterity, were from that time considered as branches of the tree, a part of the visible church as springing from Abraham. Notwithstanding all former rebellions, the Jews were the branches of this tree, till as a nation they rejected the Messiah ; (though the most of the ten tribes had long before been broken off) ; but after that, their relation to Abraham and to God, was, as it were, suspended. They were broken off from the olive-tree in immense multitudes ; neither they, nor their posterity, any longer retained even the outward seal of the covenant ; for circumcision lost its validity, and baptism became the sign of regeneration, and 'the seal of the righteousness of faith ;' and they were, thenceforth, deprived of the ordinances of God. 4:9-12. John 15:1-5. At the same time the Gentiles 'were grafted' into this tree, in their room ; by professing faith in Christ, and being baptized into his name, they were admitted into the visible church of God, and attained a relative holiness ; they were favored with the means of grace, and the ordinances of God, 'for their good, and that of their children after them,' as the Jews formerly had been ; and multitudes, who had been the branches of the wild, unfruitful olive-tree, were thus made heirs of Abraham's faith, holiness, and blessedness. Gal. 3:28-29. Heb. 6:16-20.—This [20] doubtless refers to the collective body of professing Christians, and not to individual believers ; though the latter are preserved, through humility and holy fear. It has also a peculiar churches in general ; though perhaps tacitly reflecting on some particular person, who might have expressed some such pride and triumph in the Jews' rejection. 'Consider then, [1.] By what means thou standest ; by faith, a depending grace, and not in any strength of thine own, of which thou mightest be confident.' [2.] 'On what terms, v. 22. continuing in a dependence on, and compliance with, the free grace of God, the want of which ruined the Jews ; if thou be careful to keep up thine interest in the divine favor, by being continually careful to please God, and fearful of offending Him.' The sum of our duty, the condition of our happiness, is, to keep ourselves in the love of God. Fear the Lord and his goodness, Hos. 3: 5.

III. Another thing that qualifies this doctrine, is, that the rejection is not final ; but when the fulness of time is come, the Jews will be taken in again. Observe,

1. How this conversion of the Jews is here described, (1.) As their fulness, v. 12. i. e. the addition of them to the church, the filling up again of that place which became vacant by their rejection. (2.) As the receiving of them. The conversion of a soul is the receiving of that soul, so of a nation. Christ's arms are stretched out to receive all that will come to Him. And this will be as life from the dead ; so strange and surprising, and yet withal so welcome and acceptable. (3.) As the grafting of them in again, v. 23. into the church, from which they had been broken off. That which is grafted in, receives sap and virtue from the root ; so does a soul, truly grafted into the church, from Christ the quickening Root. They shall be grafted into their own olive-tree, v. 24. i. e. into the church, of which formerly they had been the most eminent and conspicuous members. (4.) As the saving of all Israel, v. 26. True conversion may well be called salvation ; it is salvation begun. See Acts 2:47.

2. What it is grounded upon, and what reason we have to look for it.

(1.) Because of the holiness of the first-fruits and the root, v. 16. Some, by the first-fruits, understand those Jews already converted to the faith of Christ, and received into the church ; which were, as the first-fruits, dedicated to God, as earnest of a more plentiful and sanctified harvest. Others, by the first-fruits, understand the same with the root, the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from whom the Jews descended, and with whom, as the prime trustees, the covenant was deposited : and so they were the root of the Jews, not only as a people, but as a church. Holy, is not meant so much of inherent as of federal holiness ; the Jews are in a sense a holy nation, Ex. 19: 6. being descended from holy parents. Now it cannot be imagined, that such a holy nation should be totally and finally cast off. This proves, that the seed of believers, as such, are within the pale of the visible church, and verge of the covenant, till they do, by their unbelief, throw themselves out ; for if the root be holy, so are the branches. Though real qualifications are not propagated, yet relative privileges are. Look how they will answer it another day, that cut off the entail, by turning the seed of the faithful out of the church, and so [in so far] not allowing the blessing of Abraham to come on the Gentiles. The Jewish branches are reckoned holy, because the root was so. This is expressed more plainly, v. 28. In this love to the fathers, the first foundation of their church-state was laid, Deut. 4:37. And the same love would revive their privileges, for still the ancient loving-kindness is remembered ; they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. It is God's usual method of grace. Kindness to the children for the father's sake, is therefore called the kindness of God, 2 S. 9: 3, 7. Though, as concerning the Gospel, i. e. in the present dispensation of it, they are enemies to it for your sakes, for the sake of the Gentiles, against whom they have such an antipathy ; yet when God's time is come, that will wear off, and God's love to their fathers will be remembered. See a promise that points at this, Lev. 26:42. Many fare the better for the sake of their godly ancestors. On this account, the church is called their own olive-tree. That which hath been may be again. Though particular persons and generations wear off in unbelief, yet there having been a national church membership, though for the present suspended, we may expect it will be revived again.

(2.) Because of the power of God, v. 23. The conversion of souls is a work of almighty power ; and when they seem most hardened, and blinded, and obstinate, our comfort is, that God is able to work a change, able to graft those in, that have been long cast out and withered. The condition of their restoration is, faith ; If they abide not still in unbelief : nothing is to be done but to remove that unbelief, and God is able to take that away, though nothing less than an almighty power will do it ; the same power that raised up Christ from the dead, Eph. 1: 19, 20. Otherwise, can these dry bones live ?

(3.) Because of the grace of God manifested to the Gentiles. Those that have prophetic energy, when we consider it as addressed to the Roman church, which so soon after, attempting to domineer over other churches, to be the metropolis of the Christian world, and at length to be infallible, fell through pride and presumption ; till it became 'the mother of harlots, and of abominations of the earth.' Rev. 17:1-6.—It is obvious to observe, that though the illustration of grafting, excellently suited the apostle's purpose, yet the effect, in the case before us, is the reverse of that in natural grafting ; for there, the good scion communicates its changing efficacy to the [juices of the] wild stock ; here, the stock imparts its efficacy to the corrupt branches, which by divine power are grafted into it.—The apostle's reasoning, in this place, strongly evinces the oneness of the visible church, under every dispensation ; and the change of the initiatory ordinance since the coming of Christ is manifest ; his statement therefore implies more substantial arguments in favor of infant-baptism, than has generally been supposed. SCOTT.

(17.) Among them. 'Engrafted in their stead.' Sr. It was usual to graft the olive with the oleaster, (wild olive,) to promote the fecundity of the former. So Columella. See B1. Ed.

(18.) 'Glory not over . . . thou dost not support.' STUART. Ed.

(21.) 'Then surely He will not spare thee.' V. 22-24. This was spoken prophetically, both respecting the apostasy of the Roman church, and the future conversion of the Jews. 2 Thes. 2:3, 4.—'This "grafting in again," seems to import, that the Jews shall be a flourishing nation again, professing Christianity in the land of promise ; for that is to be reinstated again in the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This, Paul might, for good reasons, be withheld from speaking out here ; but in the prophets there are very plain intimations of it.' Locke. SCOTT.

25 For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.

26 And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, 'There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob:

27 For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins.

28 As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes.

29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

30 For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief:

31 Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

themselves experienced the grace of God, preventing, distinguishing grace, may from thence take encouragement to hope well concerning others. This is his argument, v. 24. and a suggestion very proper to check the insolence of those Gentile Christians, that looked with disdain and triumph on the condition of the rejected Jews, and trampled on them; as if he had said, 'Their condition, bad as it is, is not so bad as yours was, before your conversion; therefore why may it not be made as good as yours is?' This is his argument, v. 30, 31. It is good for those that have found mercy with God, to be often thinking what they were in time past, and how they obtained that mercy. Further, 'You have obtained mercy through their unbelief; much more shall they obtain mercy through your mercy, that they may be beholden to you, as you have been to them.' He takes it for granted, that the believing Gentiles would do their utmost endeavor to work on the Jews; that when God had persuaded Japhet, he would be laboring to persuade Shem. True grace hates monopolies.

(4.) Because of the promises and prophecies of the O. T., which point at this. He quotes a very remarkable one, v. 26. from Is. 59:20, 21. Where observe, [1.] The coming of Christ promised; in Isaiah He is called the Redeemer; here the Deliverer. [2.] Its end and purpose. Christ's errand into the world was to turn away ungodliness, especially from Jacob; which is that for the sake of which Paul quotes the text, as a proof of the great kindness God intended for the seed of Jacob. In Is. it is, The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob: which shows who in Zion were to share in, and to reap benefit by, the deliverance promised those, and those only, that leave their sins, and turn to God; to them Christ comes as a Redeemer, but as an Avenger to them that persist in impenitence. See Deut. 30:2, 3. Those that turn from sin, will be owned as the true citizens of Zion, Eph. 2:19. the right Jacob, Ps. 24:4, 6. Putting both these readings together, we learn, that none have an interest in Christ, but those that turn from their sins, nor can any turn from their sins but by the strength of the grace of Christ.

For this is my covenant with them; this, that the Deliverer shall come to them; this, that my Spirit shall not depart from them, as it follows, Is. 59:21. The apostle adds, when I shall take away their sins; which some think, refers to Is. 27:9. or only to the foregoing words, to turn away ungodliness. Pardon of sin, is laid as the foundation of all the blessings of the new covenant, Heb. 8:12. Now from all this, he infers, that certainly God had great mercy in store for that people, something answerable to the extent of these rich promises: and he proves his inference, v. 29. by this truth, For the gifts and callings of God are without repentance. Repentance is sometimes taken for a change of mind, and so, God never repents, for He is in one mind, and who can turn Him? A change of way is here understood. We find God repenting that He had given man a being, Gen. 6:6. and repenting that He had given a man honor and power, 1 S. 15:11. but never that He had given man grace, or effectually called him; those gifts, and callings, are without repentance.

3. The time and extent of this conversion, when and where it is to be expected. It is called a mystery, v. 25. as not obvious, and what one would not expect on the view of the present state of that people; who appeared generally so obstinate against Christ and Christianity, that it was a riddle to talk of their unanimous conversion. The conversion of the Gentiles is called a mystery, Eph. 3:3, 6, 9. The case of the rejected Jews, seemed as bad now as that of the Gentiles had been. Observe, (1.) Their present state v. 25. a remnant see the things that belong to their peace; but part, the far greater part, are in blindness, v. 7, 8. To the same purport, v. 32. Shutting up, is sometimes put for conviction, as Gal. 3:22. They all stand before God convicted of unbelief. They would not believe; which refusal of theirs was, as it were, entered on record in the court of heaven, and was conclusive against them. (2.) When this blessed change should be; when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, when the Gospel has had its intended success, and made its progress in the Gentile world; comp. v. 12. The Jews shall continue in blindness, till God hath performed his whole work among the Gentiles, and then their turn will come next to be remembered. (3.) The extent of it, v. 26. He will have mercy on all, v. 32. Not every individual person, but the body of the people. Not that ever they should be restored to their covenant or peculiarity again, to have their priesthood and temple, and ceremonies again; but they should be brought to believe in Christ, the true Messiah, whom they crucified, and be incorporated in the Christian church, and become (11—24.) From these vs. we gather the doctrine, that 'all organized communities, civil and ecclesiastical, have a common responsibility, a moral personality in the sight of God, and are dealt with accordingly, (in this world, where alone their organized existence is) rewarded or punished according to their conduct, as such. Witness the state of the Jewish and eastern churches, in consequence of their fathers' sins. Christians, then, should not feel as though they were isolated beings, as if each one need be concerned for himself alone, having no joint responsibility with the community to which he belongs. God will deal with our church and country as a whole [and terrible omens hang over us], and visit our sins upon those who are to come after us [as well as ourselves]. We should feel, therefore, that we are one body, members one of another, having common interests and responsibilities. We ought 'to weep over [and labor to reform] the sins of the community to which we belong, as being in one sense, and in many of their consequences, our sins.' HOOGE, slightly varied. Ed.

V. 25—32. Perhaps the apostle was aware, that 'the mystery of iniquity already wrought' in the church at Rome; and therefore labored the more to check its fatal progress. 2 Thes. 2:5—7.—In the intermediate ages, immense numbers would be gathered into the church; but, about the time of the last great harvest of the nations, 'the blindness' will be removed from Israel, and the nation saved from its rejected and dispersed state, and be brought in a body to embrace the Gospel; probably it will be restored to the holy land, and most of the Jews at least will become true believers. 11—15.—The principal conversion of Jews, in the times of the apostles, had taken place before this epistle was written; and it is evident the conversion predicted is yet future.—(26, 27) There shall come, &c. Not exactly, either from the Sept. or the Heb.; yet the general meaning is the same, and the variation does not at all affect the argument. It is, however, most evident, that the apostle, even when writing to the Gentiles, who in general had no copy of the Scriptures but the Sept., did not uniformly quote from it. Is. 59:20, 21. SCOTT.

(25.) Fulness, &c. The Ed. is at a loss to conceive, how an attentive reader of the prophecies can come to any other conclusion, than that there is yet to be a glorious restoration of the Jews, probably to their own land, certainly to the church and gospel privileges; and this has been, as Whitby shows, the constant doctrine of the church. Nor can this of Paul, apply to aught else, than that, when the heathen shall generally have become Christians nations, the Jews will be converted also; for 'though it be true, that James mentions many thousands or myriads of Jewish converts, all zealous of the law, Acts 21:20. yet were they all converted, at or before Paul wrote this epistle, and so belonged only to the remnant, according to the election of grace here mentioned, not to the residue that were blinded, of whose conversion the apostle here speaks, v. 12—32. Nor could their conversion and salvation be a mystery to be then revealed to the Gentiles. That no such conversion, after this blindness, happened to them, on their seeing the abomination of desolation in the holy place, (Mat. 24.) or soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, has been already showed (for there was an apostasy rather); as that Justin Martyr says nothing of such a remarkable conversion. Nor do we learn of any such since, nor of any such a fulness of converted Gentiles as could be called the riches of the world, v. 12. When, moreover, has the blindness been removed? It evidently has not yet ceased.' Whitby: who proves farther, that a double 'fulness' is mentioned in the SS. viz. (1.) Their evangelization, alluded to in v. 12. before the destruction of Jerusalem, and according to Christ's prediction, Mat. 24:14. Mark 13:10.—(2.) A more glorious conversion, of those who have not embraced, or relapsed from the Gospel, heathens and Mahometans: of which only can we understand the cl. riches, &c. v. 12. also what is said, v. 15, 25. one sheep-fold with the Gentiles, under Christ, the great Shepherd.

But the question is, concerning the accomplishment of all this. [1.] Some think, it is done already; when before, and in, and after, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, multitudes of the Jews were convinced of their infidelity, and turned Christians; and most of this work, they suppose, was done toward the close of the ministry of the apostles, when the Gentiles were generally come in. [2.] Others think, it is yet to have its accomplishment toward the end of the world; that those Jews which yet wonderfully remain distinct from the rest of the nations, shall, by the working of the Spirit with the Word, be convinced of their sin, and brought generally to embrace the Christian faith, and so to join Christian churches; which will contribute much to their strength and beauty. Alas! who shall live when God doeth this?

V. 33—36. The apostle, having insisted so largely on reconciling the rejection of the Jews with the divine goodness, concludes here with the acknowledgment and admiration of the divine wisdom and sovereignty in all this: with great affection and awe, adoring,

I. The secrecy of the divine counsels; O the depth! in these proceedings toward the Jews and Gentiles; or, in general, the whole mystery of the Gospel, which we cannot fully comprehend. Those that know most, in this state of imperfection, cannot but be most sensible of their own weakness and shortsightedness; and that, after all their searches, and all their attainments in those searches, while they are here, they cannot order their speech, by reason of darkness. Praise is silent to Thee, Ps. 65:1.

There is not only depth in the divine counsels, but riches too; which denotes an abundance of the precious and valuable; so complete are the dimensions of the divine counsels, they have not only depth and height, but breadth and length, Eph. 3:18. and that passing knowledge, v. 19.

Riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His seeing by one clear, certain, and infallible view all things that are, or ever were, or ever shall be, is his knowledge. His ruling and ordering all to his own glory, and the bringing about of his own purposes and counsels in all, is his wisdom. And the vast reach of both these is such a depth as is past our fathoming, and we may soon lose ourselves in the contemplation of them. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me, Ps. 139:6. Comp. v. 17, 18.

How unsearchable are his judgments! i. e. his counsels and purposes: and his ways, i. e. the execution of these counsels and purposes. we know not what He designs; it is past finding out. This does not only overturn all our positive conclusions about the divine counsels, [and elective decrees,] but it also checks all our [too] curious inquiries. Secret things belong not to us, Deut. 29:29. God's way is in the sea, Ps. 77:19. Comp. Job 23:8, 9. Ps. 97:2. What He does, we know not now, Jn. 13:7. nor the reason, see Job 5:9. 9:10. Our duty, blessed be God, is plain and easy; but the ways of Providence are dark and mysterious, which therefore we must silently adore and acquiesce in.

The apostle speaks this here, especially with reference to that strange turn, the casting off of the Jews, and the entertainment of the Gentiles, with a purpose to take in the Jews again in due time; these were strange proceedings, the choosing of some, the refusing of others, and neither according to the probabilities of human conjecture. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes.

Past finding out,—cannot be traced. God leaves no prints or footsteps behind Him; but his paths of providence are new every morning; He does not go the same way so often, as to make a track of it. How little a portion is heard of Him! Job 26:14. It follows, v. 34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? There is that vast distance and disproportion between God and man, between the Creator and the creature, as for ever excludes the thought of [our comprehending his mode of being and thoughts, in] such an intimacy and familiarity. The apostle makes the same challenge, 1 Cor. 2:16. yet there adds, But we have the mind of Christ: which intimates, that, through Christ, true believers, who have his Spirit, know so much of the mind of God as is necessary to their happiness.

Or who has been his counsellor? That would be like lighting a candle to the sun. This seems to refer to Is. 40:13, 14. It is the substance of God's challenge to Job, Job 38: and applicable to all the methods of his providence.

II. The sovereignty of the divine counsels. In all these things God acts as a free agent, does what He will, because He will, and gives not account of any of his matters, Job 23:13. 33:13. yet there is no unrighteousness with Him. To clear which,

1. He challenges any to prove God a debtor to him, v. 35. 1 Chr. 29:14. If any can prove [a claim on God, or that He is] their debtor, the apostle here proclaims, in God's name, that payment is ready, It shall be recompensed to him again; but never any one yet durst make a demand of this kind, or attempt to prove it. This is here suggested, to silence the clamors of the Jews. When God took away their visible church-privileges from them, He did but take his own: and may He not do what He will with his own?

2. He resolves all into the sovereignty of God, v. 36. God is all in all; especially those things which relate to our salvation, the things that belong to our peace, are all of Him by way of creation, through Him by way of providential influence, that they may be to Him in their final tendency and result. Of God, as the spring and fountain; through Christ, God-man, as the conveyance; to God as the ultimate end. If all be of Him, and through Him, there is all the reason in the world, that all should be to Him, and for Him. It is a necessary circulation; if the rivers receive their waters from the sea, they return them to the sea again, Eccl. 1:7. And so he concludes with a short doxology; To whom be glory for ever, Amen. God's universal agency as the first Cause, the sovereign Ruler, and the last end, ought to be the matter of our adoration.

He had been discoursing at large of the counsels of God concerning man, sifting the point with great accuracy; but, after all, he concludes with the acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty, as that into which all

PRACT. OBS. God never 'casts away those, whom He hath fore-known,' and 'predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son'; and if this seal of conformity to Christ be affixed to our souls, we may be assured of his everlasting favor, and all the felicity which springs from it. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Eph. 1:13, 14.—The Lord overrules the fall and ruin of some, to the salvation of others. But what extensive, permanent, and most glorious effects may be produced, in the whole creation of God, through eternal ages, by the fall of angels and men, by redemption in Christ, and by the dispensations of God towards his church and the world, who can tell? However, a hint of this, a glimpse, as it were, of the invisible world, should remind us, that the Lord may have ten thousand wise and gracious reasons, for his most severe and terrible judgments, of which we can form no conception.—We, the ministers of the Gospel, however mean and unworthy in ourselves, should 'magnify our office,' as conducing unspeakably more to enrich and bless mankind, (provided it be faithfully executed,) than all arts, sciences, commerce, or improvements whatever, unitedly, ever have done, or can do.—Alas! how has the once flourishing church of Rome fallen, by neglecting the apostle's caution! And how many other churches, and what an immense number of individuals, have, in a measure, trodden the same path!—As pride is the genuine offspring of ignorance, so an enlarged spiritual knowledge of the mysterious truths and dispensations of God, tends to prevent our being 'wise in our own conceits.' . . . Instead of perplexing our minds about secret things, let us walk in the light the Lord has graciously afforded us.

So Gal. 3:22. This tr. is after the Lat. idiom, and unauthorized. Others, as Pisc., Eng. Vers., and most recent commentators, tr. "has concluded or shut up all (i. e. permitted it) to disobedience, and sin subjected them to its control," which shutting up one thing under or to another means. This tr. is safer: Locke's and Macknight's are contrary to the usage of the language, and utterly inadmissible.'

V. 33—36. Paul had gone as far, in unravelling, illustrating, and vindicating, the mysterious purposes and decrees of God, as was suitable or profitable; yet he well knew, that much darkness and difficulty must still rest on them; and that presumption, pride, and unbelief, would still multiply inquiries and objections. 2 Pet. 3:14—16. Thus he gave no countenance, either to those who, with absurd arrogance, attempt to reduce all possible existence, truth, and knowledge, to the measure of their own intellect, and to believe no more than they can comprehend; or to those, who know no end of speculating, and of arguing from revealed truths to unrevealed causes and consequences, as they suppose them to be. Instead of this, he closed the subject, by breaking forth into admiration and adoration of the unfathomable depth, and infinite treasures, of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His views are immense and eternal; and his reasons, for every part of his vast designs, are taken from Himself. Pr. 16:4. Eph. 1:3—8, 13, 14. 2:4—10. 3:9—12. His judgments and decrees, and his wisdom in them, cannot be fully investigated, or comprehended, by any created being, much less by us fallen creatures. We should then be satisfied to understand, and receive by faith, the information which He graciously reveals; and to believe, that He acts with perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, when we cannot comprehend what He is doing; or when his dispensations seem to us not reconcilable to these his essential perfections. ## CHAP. XII.

1 God's mercies must move us to please God. 3 No man must think too well of himself, 6 but attend every one on that calling wherein he is placed. 9 Love, and many other duties, are required of us. 19 Revenge is specially forbidden.

I BESEECH you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

2 And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

3 For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.

4 For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office;

5 So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another.

these things must be ultimately resolved, and in which alone the mind can safely and sweetly rest. This is, if not the scholastic way, yet the Christian way, of disputation. WHATEVER ARE THE PREMISES, LET GOD'S GLORY BE THE CONCLUSION; ESPECIALLY WHEN WE COME TO TALK OF THE DIVINE COUNSELS AND ACTINGS, IT IS BEST FOR US TO TURN OUR ARGUMENTS INTO AWFUL AND SERIOUS ADORATIONS. THE GLO-RIFIED SAINTS, THAT SEE FURTHEST INTO THESE MYSTERIES, NEVER DISPUTE, BUT PRAISE TO ETERNITY.

CHAP. XII. The apostle, having at large cleared and confirmed the prime, fundamental doctrines of Christianity, comes in the next place to press the principal duties. Religion is eminently practical, and is designed NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1. The body with its members, senses, and organs, is the instrument of the carnal mind, in executing its purposes, and gratifying its evil inclinations; when, therefore, the mind is made spiritual, the body should, in like manner, execute its holy purposes, and express its spiritual affections. (6:12-19.) Thus the soul becomes the consecrated priest, and the body 'the living sacrifice unto God through Jesus Christ.' Phil. 4:14-20. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:4-6. Rev. 1:4-6.

(1.) 'Here is the compendium and synopsis of moral theology. It extends up to 15:13. and consists of three sections. The first inculcates the general duties of Christianity, which respect all Christians, of whatever rank or degree, station or dignity. (ch. 12.) Sect. 2 treats of political or social duties, such as are to be observed by Christians with respect to their superiors, their equals, and themselves. (ch. 13.) Sect. 3 treats of private duties, economical and ceremonial, such as are to be attended to by Christians in their social intercourse with each other, especially towards those who have not hitherto been convinced, but are as yet weak in the faith. (ch. 14: 15:13.) CARPZOV.—'Consecrate your bodies, i. e. yourselves, (so Beza and Koppe, rightly,) as at 6:13. Ja. 3:6. It is said, in accommodation to the preceding metaphor from sacrifices, "by a Hebraism," says Schoett., who gives examples on 8:27. Rom. 6:3, 4, 6, 8, and 13.' BLOOMF.

V. 2. In thus wholly dedicating themselves to the service of God, Christians must not seek happiness from the world, or conform to the maxims, customs, and fashions of mankind in general. They must not comply with common usages, as to their pursuits or employments, in any respect, where such usages are contrary to the holy commands of God, the spirit of the Gospel, the interests of piety, the prosperity of their own souls, and the improvement of their talents. In all these things the reproach of singularity is honorable, the want of it suspicious: and to be fashionable is to be unchristian.—A serious regard to this, and a few other maxims of a similar nature, would soon show men, in what things they must 'not be conformed to this world;' and would convince them that, on the one hand affected singularity, in things minute or indifferent, comes far short of the spirituality of the exhortation; and on the other hand, that they excuse their vain amusements, splendid not only to inform our judgments, but to reform our hearts and lives. From the method of the apostle's writing in this, as in some other of the Epistles, the stewards of the mysteries of God may take direction how to divide the Word of truth: not to press duty abstracted from privilege, nor privilege abstracted from duty; but let both go together, the duties drawn from the privileges, by way of inference. The particular exhortations of this ch. are reducible to the three principal heads of Christian duty; our duty to God, to ourselves, and to our brother. The grace of God teaches us, in general, to live godly, soberly, and righteously, and to deny all that which is contrary hereunto. Now this ch. will give us to understand what godliness, sobriety, and righteousness are, though somewhat intermixed.

V. 1-21. I. Concerning our duty to God: godliness is,

1. To surrender ourselves to God, and so lay a good foundation, 2 Cor. 8:5. This is here pressed as the spring of all duty and obedience, v. 1, 2. Man consists of body and soul, Gen. 2:7. Eccl. 12:7.

(1.) The body must be presented to Him, v. 1. 1 Cor. 6:13, 14. The exhortation is very pathetic. Though he might with authority command, yet for love's sake he rather beseeches, Philem. v. 8, 9. This is to insinuate the exhortation, that it might come with the more pleasing power. Many are soonest wrought upon, if accosted kindly; more easily led than driven.

[1.] The duty pressed. To present our bodies a living sacrifice; alluding to the sacrifices under the law, which were presented or set before God at the altar, ready to be offered to Him. Our bodies and spirits are designed. Sacrifice is here taken for whatsoever is by God's own appointment dedicated to Himself; see 1 Pet. 2:5. There were sacrifices of atonement, and sacrifices of acknowledgment. Christ is the only Sacrifice of atonement; but our persons and performances, tendered to God through Christ our Priest, are as sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honor of God. Presenting, denotes a voluntary act, and implies, not only the avoiding of the sins that are committed with or against the body, but the using of the body as a servant of the soul in the service of God. Bodily exercise alone profits little, yet in its place is a proof and product of the dedication of our souls to God. They are to be a living sacrifice; not killed as the sacrifices under the law. A body sincerely devoted to God is a living sacrifice. It is called living by way of allusion; that which was dead of itself might not be eaten, much less sacrificed, Deut. 14:21. and by way of opposition; 'The sacrifice was to be slain, but you may be sacrificed, and yet live on,' an unbloody sacrifice. A living sacrifice, inspired with the spiritual life of the soul. Christ living in the soul by faith, makes the body a living sacrifice, Gal. 2:20. Holy love kindles the sacrifices, puts life into the duties; see ch. 6:13. Alive, i. e. to God, v. 11.

They must be holy. The soul is the proper subject of holiness: but a sanctified soul communicates a holiness to the body it acts and animates. That is holy which is according to the will of God; [even as revealed in his natural laws;] when the bodily actions are so, the body is holy. They are the temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. 6:19. Possess the body in sanctification, 1 Thess. 4:4, 5.

[-2.] Three arguments to enforce this. 1st. Consider the mercies of God; I beseech you by the mercies of God. An affectionate obtestation, which should melt us into a compliance, an argument most sweetly cogent. There is the mercy that is in God, and the mercy that is from God; mercy in the spring, and mercy in the streams: both are included here; but especially gospel-mercies, mentioned, ch. 11. the transferring of what the Jews forfeited and lost by their unbelief unto us Gentiles, Eph. 3:4-6. the sure mercies of David, Is. 55:3. 2dly. It is acceptable to God. The great end we should all labor after, is, to be accepted of the Lord, 2 Cor. 5:9. to have Him well pleased with our persons and performances. 3dly. It is our reasonable service. There is an act of reason in it; for it is the soul that presents the body. There is all the reason in the world for it, and no good reason can possibly be produced against it. God does not impose on us anything hard or unreasonable, Is. 1:18. but that which is altogether agreeable to the principles of right reason: your service according to the Word, so it may be read. The Word of God does not leave out the body in holy worship. That is a reasonable service, which we are able and ready to give a reason for; in which we understand ourselves. Thus must the body be presented to God.

(2.) The mind must be renewed for Him. This is pressed, v. 2. 'See to it that there be a saving change wrought in you, and that decorations, expensive feasting, eager pursuits of wealth, power, or distinction, waste of time, and other parts of their conduct, because they love the friendship of the world, 'savor earthly things,' and cannot endure self-denial, or the cross; not because they can fairly prove that the maxims and customs of the world, in these respects, are so agreeable to the spirit of the Gospel, that they may safely conform to them.—This 'transformation' of the soul into the holy image of Christ; this daily renovation of the understanding, judgment, and affections, by the power of the Holy Spirit, is the only effectual cure of 'conformity to this world;' because it produces conformity to 'the spirits of just men made perfect;' and a capacity for delighting in such society and employments, as most resemble the inhabitants, worship, and joys of heaven. Animated, urgent, and affectionate exhortations to seek this inward transformation, as essential to duty and happiness, are the appointed and proper means of leading Christians to plead the promises, and attend on the ordinances of God, in order to attain unto it more and more.—There does not appear in these vs. any distinction intended between the Jewish and Gentile converts; or any reason to conclude, as some have done, that the Gentiles were especially addressed. The customs and practices of the unbelieving Jews were as little to be conformed to by Christians, as those of the heathen were; and the case is exactly the same in respect of a vast majority, in countries called Christian. SCOTT.

(2.) 'Learn what the will of God is, even that which is good, and acceptable, and perfect.' ST. Prove.] Dokimazein: prove, try, examine, experience, approve, not speculatively only, but practically. Paul mentions it as one of the most remarkable effects of regeneration. So Bl. Ed.

V. 3-5. The preceding general exhortation was in the affectionate style of brotherly love, but this is in that of apostolical authority.—The measure of faith.] It is commonly said, that faith is here put for those spiritual gifts, which were conferred on believers, and exercised in proportion to the measure of their faith. Yet it is evident, that in some instances even miraculous powers were possessed by those, who had not saving faith. Mat. 7:21-23. 17:19-21. 21:21, 22. 1 Cor. 13:1-3.—'For faith, in one MS. we find grace.' Beza.

(3.) Sobriety.] 'Modestly, according to the measure of faith God hath imparted to him.' ST. 'Grace: i. e. an inspired and supernatural faculty from God; this, in Paul's case, would be the highest measure of inspiration. See Macknight

6 Having then gifts, differing<sup>1</sup> according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith;

7 Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching;

8 Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that<sup>1</sup> giveth, let him do it<sup>k</sup> with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with<sup>m</sup> cheerfulness.

it be carried on.' Conversion and sanctification are the renewing of the mind; a change not of the substance but of the qualities [or habits] of the soul; the same with making a new heart and a new spirit; new dispositions and inclinations; new sympathies and antipathies; the understanding enlightened, the conscience softened, the thoughts rectified, the will bowed to the will of God, and the affections made spiritual and heavenly: so that the man is not what he was; old things are passed away, all things are become new; he acts from new principles, by new rules, with new designs. The mind is the acting, ruling part of us; so that the renewing of that is the renewing of the whole man; for out of it are the issues of life, Prov. 4:23. The progress of sanctification, dying to sin more and more, and living to righteousness more and more, is the carrying on of this renewing work, till it be perfected in glory.

This is called the transforming of us; it is like putting on a new shape and figure. The transfiguration of Christ is expressed by this word, Mat. 17:2. when He put on a heavenly glory, which made his face to shine like the sun; and the same word is used, 2 Cor. 3:18. where we are said to be changed into the same image from glory to glory. This transformation is here pressed as a duty; not that we can work such a change ourselves; we could as soon make a new world as make a new heart by any power of our own; it is God's work, Ez. 11:19. 36:26, 27. But be ye transformed, i. e. 'use the means which God hath appointed and ordained for it.' It is God that turns us, and then we are turned; but we must frame our doings to turn, Hos. 5:4. 'Lay your souls under the changing, transforming influences of the blessed Spirit; seek unto God for grace, in the use of all the means of grace.' Though the new man be created of God, yet we must put it on, Eph. 4:24. and be pressing forward toward perfection.

In this v. we may further observe,

[1.] The great enemy to this renewing, which we must avoid, conformity to this world; all the disciples and followers of the Lord Jesus must be nonconformists to this world, to the things of the world, [to selfishness, the rule of the world,] to the men of the world; true Christianity consists much in a sober singularity. Yet we must take heed of the extreme of affected rudeness and moroseness, which some run into. In civil things, the light of nature and the custom of nations take place for our conduct; and the rule of the Gospel in those cases is a rule of direction, not a rule of contraries.

[2.] The great effect of this renewing, which we must labor after; That ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. By the will of God, here, we are to understand his revealed will concerning our duty, what the Lord our God requires of us. It is good, acceptable, and perfect; three excellent properties of a law. It is good, Mic. 6:8. exactly consonant to the eternal reason of good and evil, good in itself, good for us; the evangelical law, so some, in distinction from the ceremonial. Ez. 20:25. It is acceptable, pleasing to God, and prescribed by Him. It is perfect, containing all things which tend to the perfection of the man of God, to furnish us thoroughly to every good work, 2 Tim. 3:16, 17. This it concerns Christians to prove, to know it with judgment and approbation, experimentally; those are best able to prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, who are transformed by the renewing of their mind. A living principle of grace is in the soul, disposes the soul to [search for,] receive, and entertain the revelations of the divine will, John 7:17. Thus to be godly, is to surrender ourselves to God.

2. When this is done, to serve Him in all manner of gospel-obedience. Some hints of this we have here, v. 11, 12. (1.) We must make a business of it, and not be slothful in that business. Those that would approve themselves Christians indeed, must make religion their business, must choose it, and learn it, and give themselves to it; they must love it, and employ themselves in it, and abide by it, as their great, main [and only] business. (2.) We must be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. God must be served with the spirit, ch. 1:9. John 4:24. Whatever we do in religion, it is pleasing to God no further than it is done with our spirits, wrought upon by the Spirit of God. And there must be fergency, a holy zeal, and warmth, and ardency of affection, in all we do; as those that love God not only with their heart and soul, but with all our hearts, and with all our souls. Serving the Lord. Some copies read it, -serving the time, improving your opportunities, and making the best of them; complying with the present seasons of grace. (3.) Rejoicing in hope. God is worshipped and honored by our hope and trust in Him, especially when we rejoice in that hope, take a complacency in that confidence; which argues a great assurance of the reality, and a great esteem of the excellency, of the good hoped for. (4.) Patient in tribulation. Thus also God is served, not only by working for Him when He calls us to work, but by sitting still quietly when He calls us to suffer. Patience for God's sake, and with an eye to his will and glory, is true piety. Observe, Those that rejoice in a believing hope, are likely to be patient in tribulation. (5.) Continuing instant in prayer. Prayer is a friend to hope and patience, and we do in it serve the Lord. It signifies both fervency and perseverance in prayer. We should not be cold in the duty, nor soon weary of it, Luke 18:1. 1 Thess. 5:17. Eph. 6:18. Col. 4:2. This is our duty, which immediately respects God.

II. Concerning our duty which respects ourselves; this is sobriety.

1. A sober opinion of ourselves, v. 3. It is ushered in with a solemn preface; I say, through the grace given unto me: the grace of wisdom, by which he understood the necessity and excellency of this duty, the grace of apostleship, by which he had authority to press and enjoin it. It is said to every one of us, one as well as another. We must not be self-conceited, not think ourselves

V. 6—8. I am aware, that these vs. are explained by many exclusively of the different orders of church-officers and rulers; and so every man endeavors to find his own system of ecclesiastical polity in them; but, though the various duties of the ministry, in all its parts, are principally intended, there is no proof that the apostle meant them exclusively. He seems rather to have inculcated a general improvement of every man's talents, for the common benefit of the church whatever his gifts and place were. And as there were 'saints in Cesar's household' soon after, it is not improbable, that Christians might be called to the lower functions of the magistracy, 16:21—23. Acts 13:6—12. Phil. 4:21, 22. The epistle, however, was intended, by the Holy Spirit, for the edification of the church in all ages; and it may be supposed, that the duties of Christian magistrates, as well as those of church-rulers, are hinted at in the general language used by the apostle.—Some consider the word, rendered 'ministry,' (7) to be a general term for the different orders of ministers in the church, which are afterwards enumerated; but the disjunctive particle or, seems unfavorable to that interpretation. The original word may point out the office of the primitive deacons; but the exhortation to 'give with simplicity,' or liberality, appears more properly addressed to those, who distributed their own property, than to the deacons who were entrusted with the treasures of the church; and to whom, faithfulness, prudence, and impartiality, were especially necessary.—(6) Gifts.] Many seem to think that spiritual, or miraculous, gifts are exclusively intended by this word; but this is evidently different from the general use of the word; and the office of a minister, of whatever order, is itself a distinct thing from a man's qualifications for it. Other endowments were even at that time necessary to the due performance of the ministerial duties, even more so, than supernatural gifts; and the money, which some distributed, whether their own or the church's, was a talent of entirely another nature; yet all were the free gifts of God, and as such to be received and improved. SCOTT.

(6, &c.) 'Whether prophecy, (let it be) according to the proportion of faith; whether ministry, (let there be diligence) in ministration; whether teaching, in instruction; or exhorting, in exhortation. Let the distributor (do his duty) with simplicity; the superintendent, with diligence; he who performs offices of compassion, with cheerfulness. Let benevolence be sincere.' Sr. Proportion, &c. 'If we suppose the prophetic gift to be given in proportion to the exercise of faith, i. e. of [234]

(7) Ministry.] 'Diakonia: Paul first lays down propheteia and diakonia each as a genus, and then proceeds to enumerate their species, viz., of propheteia, two, and of diakonia, three.' CRELL, Phot., &c. 'It is clear, that the words diakonos, diakonein, and diakonia, though they be general terms, and used of the apostles themselves, Rom. 11:13. 1 Cor. 3:5. yet are often, in the N. T., used of some certain kind of offices undertaken for the cause of the Christian religion, (comp. 1 Cor. 12:5. 2 Cor. 9:1.) and appropriated to those Christians who did not so much employ themselves upon the doctrines of the Gospel, as the external affairs of the church, and of individuals. Among these were especially the proestotes, Episcopoi, presbuteroi, as well as others of somewhat inferior rank and dignity, as the deacons properly so called. See Acts 6:1—7. In this passage, however, the proestotes also seem to be comprehended. See on v. 8. and comp. Eph. 4:12. 1 Pet. 4:11.' KOPPE.

to be something, Gal. 6:3. But, on the other hand, we should think soberly, have a humble and modest opinion of ourselves and our own abilities, our gifts and graces, according to what we have received from God, and not otherwise; not be confident and hot in matters of doubtful disputation; not stretch ourselves beyond our line; not judge and censure those that differ from us; not desire to make a fair show in the flesh. These and the like are the fruits of a sober opinion of ourselves. It may be read, That no man be wise above what he ought to be wise, but be wise unto sobriety. There is a knowledge that puffs up, which reaches after forbidden fruit. We must take heed of that, and labor after that knowledge which tends to sobriety, to the rectifying of the heart, and the reforming of the life. Some understand it, of the sobriety which keeps us in our own place and station, from intruding into the gifts and offices of others. See an instance of this, 2 Cor. 10:13—15. To this head refers also that exhortation, v. 16. Be not wise in your own conceits. It is good to be wise, but bad to think ourselves so; it was an excellent thing for Moses to have his face shine, and not know it. Now the reasons are:

(1.) Because whatever we have that is good, God hath dealt it to us; every good and perfect gift comes from above, James 1:17.

(2.) Because God deals out his gifts in a certain measure; according to the measure of faith. Observe, the measure of spiritual gifts he calls the measure of faith; for that is the radical grace: faith and other spiritual gifts are dealt by measure, according as Infinite Wisdom sees meet for us. Christ had the Spirit given Him without measure, John 3:34. But the saints have it by measure; see Eph. 4:7.

(3.) Because God has dealt out gifts to others, as well as to us: to every man. God is a common Father, and Christ a common Root, to all the saints, who all derive virtue from Him; therefore it ill becomes us to lift up ourselves, and to despise others, as if we only were the people in favor with heaven, and wisdom should die with us. This reasoning he illustrates by a comparison taken from the members of the natural body, as 1 Cor. 12:12. Eph. 4:16. v. 4, 5. Here observe, [1.] All the saints make up one body in Christ, who is the Head of the body, and the common Centre of their unity. [2.] Particular believers are members of this body, constituent parts, which proper enough to be done by the same person, at the same time; and when he does the one, let him mind that; when he does the other, let him do that too as well as he can. Pastors and teachers are the same office, Eph. 4:11. but the particular work somewhat different. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and has undertaken that province, let him stick to it, be frequent and constant, and diligent in it; let him abide in that which is his proper work, and be in it as his element. See 1 Tim. 4:15, 16. Let him that exhorteth, wait on exhortation. Let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, as the former of the teacher; to apply gospel-truths and rules more closely to the case and condition of the people, and to press on them that which is more practical. To wait on our work, is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts on it, to lay hold on all opportunities for it; and to study, not only to do it, but to do it well.

2. A sober use of the gifts God hath given us. As we must not on the one hand be proud of our talents, so on the other hand we must not bury them. He specifies the ecclesiastical offices appointed in particular churches; in the discharge of which, each must study to do his own duty, for the preserving of order, and the promoting of edification in the church; each knowing his place, and fulfilling it. There were in the primitive church extraordinary gifts of tongues, of discerning, of healing; but he speaks here of those that are ordinary. Comp. 1 Cor. 12:4. 1 Tim. 4:14. 1 Pet. 4:10. Seven particular gifts he specifies, v. 6—8. which seem to be meant of so many distinct offices, used by the prudential constitution of many of the primitive churches, especially the larger. Two general ones are here expressed by prophesying and ministering; the former the work of the bishops, the latter the work of the deacons; the only two standing officers, Phil. 1:1. The five latter will therefore be reduced to the first two.

(1.) Prophesy; not meant of the extraordinary gifts of foretelling things to come, but the ordinary office of preaching the Word: so prophesying is taken, 1 Cor. 14:1—3. &c. 1 Cor. 11:4. 1 Thess. 5:20. Now those that preach the Word, must do it according to the proportion of faith, i. e., [1.] As to the manner: our prophesying must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith. As people cannot hear well, so ministers cannot preach well, without faith. And we must remember the proportion of faith: that though all men have not faith, yet many have beside ourselves: and therefore we must allow others to have a share of knowledge and ability to instruct, as well as we, even those that in less things differ from us. [2.] As to the matter: our prophesying must be according to the proportion of the doctrine of faith, as it is revealed in the Bible. Truths that are more dark, must be examined by those that are more clear; and then entertained, when found to agree and comport with the analogy of faith; for it is certain, one truth can never contradict another. It is not so necessary that the prophesying be according to the proportion of art, the rules of logic and rhetoric; but it is necessary that it be according to the proportion of faith.

Two particular works he that prophesieth hath to mind,—teaching and exhorting;

proper enough to be done by the same person, at the same time; and when he does the one, let him mind that; when he does the other, let him do that too as well as he can. Pastors and teachers are the same office, Eph. 4:11. but the particular work somewhat different. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and has undertaken that province, let him stick to it, be frequent and constant, and diligent in it; let him abide in that which is his proper work, and be in it as his element. See 1 Tim. 4:15, 16. Let him that exhorteth, wait on exhortation. Let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, as the former of the teacher; to apply gospel-truths and rules more closely to the case and condition of the people, and to press on them that which is more practical. To wait on our work, is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts on it, to lay hold on all opportunities for it; and to study, not only to do it, but to do it well.

(2.) Ministry. If a man hath—the office of a deacon, or assistant to the pastor and teacher, let him use that office well; a churchwarden, (suppose,) an elder, or an overseer of the poor; and perhaps more were in these offices, and more solemnity was in them, and a greater stress of care and business lay on them, in the primitive churches, than we are now well aware of. It includes all those offices which concern the [order] of the church, the outward business of the house of God. See Neh. 11:16. Serving tables, Acts 6:2. Now he on whom this care of ministering is devolved, let him attend to it with faithfulness and diligence; particularly,

[1.] He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity,—liberally and faithfully; not converting what is received to his own use, or distributing it with any sinister design, or with respect of persons. It may be meant of church-officers; but some understand it in general of all almsgiving; He that hath wherewithal, let him give, and give plentifully and liberally; so the word is tr., 2 Cor. 8:2. 9:13. God loves a cheerful, bountiful giver.

[2.] He that ruleth, with diligence. It should seem, he means the assistants to the pastors, in exercising church-discipline; or those ministers that in the congregation did chiefly undertake and apply themselves to this ruling work; for we find those ruling, that labored in the Word and doctrine, 1 Tim. 5:17. Now such must do it with diligence. It denotes both care and industry to discover what is amiss, to reduce those that go astray, to reprove and admonish those that are fallen, to keep the church pure.

[3.] He that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness. Some think it is meant in general of all that in anything show mercy; but it seems to be meant of some particular church-officers, whose work it was to take care of the sick, and strangers; and they were generally widows; deaconesses, 1 Tim. 5:9, 10. though others, it is likely, might be employed [as it is every one's duty]. Now this must be done with cheerfulness. A pleasing countenance, in acts of mercy, is a great relief and comfort to the miserable; when they see it is not done grudgingly and unwillingly, but with pleasant looks and gentle words, and all possible indications of readiness and alacrity.

III. Concerning that part of our duty which respects our brethren, of which we have many instances, in brief exhortations.

Now all our duty towards one another, is summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love; sincere love, John 3:18. 2 Cor. 8:3. more particularly, there is a love owing,

1. To our friends. He that hath friends, must show himself friendly. There is a mutual love that Christians owe, and must pay.

(1.) An affectionate love, v. 10. Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love; it signifies not only love, but a readiness and inclination to love; the most genuine [disinterested] and free affection, kindness flowing out as from a spring. It properly denotes the love of parents to their children; which as it is the most tender, so it is the most natural, of any other; unforced, unconstrained; such must our love be to one another; and such it will be, where there is a new nature, and the law of love is written in the heart.

(2.) A respectful love; In honor preferring one another. This is explained, Phil. 2:3. Let each esteem other better than themselves. And there is this good reason for it, because, if we know our own hearts, we know more evil of ourselves than we do of any one else in the world. We should be forward to take notice of the gifts and graces, and performances of our brethren, and value them accordingly; be more forward to praise another, and more pleased to hear another praised, than ourselves; going before, or leading one another in honor; so some: not in taking honor, but in giving honor. 'So the sense is the same with Tit. 3:14. Let them learn,—to go before in good works. For though we must prefer others (as our tr. reads it), and put on others, as more capable and deserving than ourselves, yet we must not make that an excuse for our lying by, and doing nothing; nor, under a pretence of honoring others, and their serviceableness and performances, indulge ourselves in ease and slothfulness. Therefore he immediately adds, v. 11. Not slothful in business.

(3.) A liberal love, v. 13. Distributing to the necessities of saints. It is no strange thing for saints in this world, to want necessities for the support of their natural life. In those primitive times, prevailing persecutions must needs reduce many of the suffering saints to great extremities; and still, the poor, even the poor saints, we have always with us. It is the duty, therefore, of those who have wherewithal, to distribute, or (as it might better be read) to communicate to those necessities. It is not enough to draw out the soul, but we must draw out the purse, to the hungry. See James 2:15, 16. 1 John 3:17. Communicating intimates, that our poor brethren have a kind of interest in what God hath given us; and that our relieving of them should come from a sense and fellow-feeling of their wants, as though we suffered with them. The charitable benevolence of the Philippians to Paul, is called their communicating with his affliction, Phil. 4:14. We must be ready, as we have ability and opportunity, to relieve any in want; but we are in a special manner bound to communicate to the saints, Gal. 6:10. Communicating,—to the memories of the saints; so some of the ancients read it; a debt is owing to the memory of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises; to value it, to vindicate it, to embalm it. Let the memory of the just be blessed, so some read, Prov. 10:7.

He mentions another branch of this bountiful love; given to hospitality. Nor is it yet an antiquated, superseded duty; as there is occasion, we must welcome strangers, for we know not the heart of a stranger. I was a stranger, and ye took me in, is mentioned as one instance of the mercifulness of those that shall obtain mercy: following or pursuing hospitality. It intimates, not only that we must take, but seek opportunity, thus to show mercy. As Abraham, who sat at the tent-door, Gen. 18:1. and Lot, who sat in the gate of Sodom, Gen. 19:1. expecting travellers, whom they might meet and prevent with a kind invitation, and so they entertained angels unawares, Heb. 13:2.

(4.) A sympathizing love, v. 15. Where there is a mutual love between the members of the mystical body, there will be such a fellow-feeling. See 1 Cor. 12:26. True love will interest us in the sorrows and joys of one another, and teach us to make them our own. Not that we must participate in the sinful mirths or inourings of any, but only in just and reasonable joys and sorrows: not envying those that prosper, but rejoicing with them; truly glad that others have the success and comfort we have not; not despising those that are in trouble, but concerned for them, and ready to help them, as being ourselves in the body. This is to do as God does; who not only has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, Ps. 35:27. but is likewise afflicted in all their afflictions, Is. 63:9.

(5.) A united love; Be of the same mind one toward another, v. 16. labor, as much as you can, to agree in apprehension; and wherein you come short of that, yet agree in affection; endeavor to be all one, not affecting to clash, and contradict, and thwart one another; but keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, Phil. 2:2. 3:15, 16. 1 Cor. 1:10. wishing the same good to others that you do to yourselves; so some understand it. This is to love our brethren as ourselves, desiring their welfare as our own.

(6.) A condescending love; Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate, v. 16. True love cannot be without lowliness, Eph. 4:1, 2. Phil. 2:3. When our Lord Jesus washed his disciples' feet, to teach us brotherly love, John 13:5. 14:34. it was designed especially to intimate to us, that to love one another aright, is to be willing to stoop to the meanest offices of kindness for the good of one another. Love is a condescending grace. Observe how it is pressed here. [1.] Mind not high things. [This is said to those who lived in magnificent Rome,] the imperial city which reigned over the kings of the earth. We must not be ambitious of honor and preferment, nor look upon worldly pomp and dignity with any inordinate value or desire, but rather with a holy contempt. Christians would be ready to look scornfully on other Christians, as some citizens do on the country; therefore the apostle so often cautions them against high-mindedness; comp. ch. 11:20. [2.] Condescend to men of low estate. It may be meant of mean things; Be contented with mean things. Be reconciled to the place God in his providence hath put you in, whatever it be. We should make a low condition, and mean circumstances, more the centre of our desires, than a high condition. It may be meant of mean persons: so we read it; I think both are to be included. We must associate ourselves with, and accommodate ourselves to, those that are poor and mean in the world, if they be such as fear God. The contrary to this condescension is reproved, Jam. 2:1—4. Some think the original word a metaphor taken from travellers, when those that are stronger, and swifter of foot, stay for and take along those that are weak and slow; thus must Christians be tender toward their fellow-travellers.

As a mean to promote this, he adds, Be not wise in your own conceits; to the same purport with v. 3. We shall never find in our hearts to condescend to others, while we find there so great a conceit of ourselves: therefore, that must needs be mortified. Be not wise by yourselves, be not confident of the sufficiency of your own wisdom, so as to despise others, or think you have no need of them, Prov. 3:7. nor be shy of communicating what you have to others. We are members one of another, depend on one another, are obliged to one another; and therefore, Be not wise by yourselves; remembering it is the merchandise of wisdom that we profess; now merchandise consists in commerce, receiving and returning.

(7.) A love that engages us, as much as lies in us, to live peaceably with all men, v. 18. we must be harmless and inoffensive, not giving others occasion to quarrel with us; and we must be gall-less and unrevengeful, not taking occasion to quarrel with them. Observe how the exhortation is limited. It is not expressed so as to oblige us to impossibilities; if it be possible, as much as lies in you. Thus Heb. 12:14. Follow peace. Eph. 1:3. Endeavoring to keep. Study the things that make for peace. If it be possible. It is not possible to preserve the peace, when we cannot do it without offending God and wounding conscience: That is possible, which is possible without incurring blame. The wisdom that is from above, is first pure, and then peaceable, Jam. 3:17. Peace without purity, is the peace of the devil's palace. As much as lieth in you. There must be two words to the bargain of peace. We can but speak for ourselves, and our care must be,

V. 15. 'It requires a more generous and philosophic spirit (says Chrys. in Bloomf.) to rejoice with them that rejoice, than to weep with them that weep; since in the latter case, nature inclines us to sympathy; but, in the former, the baleful passion of envy is apt to rise. So that it is difficult not to envy, and much more so to rejoice with them. And yet there is no stronger cement to love than this sympathetic affection, when genuine.' Comp. on Acts 10:23. Ed.

V. 16, &c. 'Think mutually the same thing; do not regard high things, but suffer yourselves to be influenced by humble ones. . . . Render to no man evil for evil; seek after that which is good in the sight of all.' St. 'The sentiment was not unknown to the Jewish writers: nor to the classics. [The Hindoos sometimes extend hospitality to an enemy, remarking, "the tree does not withdraw its shade even from the wood-cutter."] Certain it is, that to the publication of the N. T. alone, can we usually ascribe that higher tone and more refined purity of ethics, so ob-servable in the moral philosophy of the second and succeeding centuries. But they were unsupported by those all-powerful motives, those divine sanctions, in vain sought for out of Christian theology.' BLOOMF.

V. 17—21. The preceding exhortations had principally respected the behavior of Christians one toward another; but these relate to their conduct among their unconverted neighbors.—When they were insulted, defrauded, or assaulted, even if no redress could be obtained from the magistrate, they must not on any account presume to avenge themselves; but rather give way to the wrath of their enemies, and without opposition endure the effects of it.—(20) Heap coals, &c. 'I believe the sense is rather this, that, if he persevere in his enmity, . . . after these kind offices, thou by thy patience shalt engage the wrath of God to fall upon him, and to maintain thy cause against him. . . . So Prov. 20:22. "Say not thou, I will recompense evil; but wait on the Lord, and He shall save thee."—This is the import of the phrase in the O. T., where 18 If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably<sup>i</sup> with all men.

19 Dearly beloved, avenge<sup>j</sup> not yourselves; but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written,<sup>k</sup> Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

that nothing be wanting on our parts to preserve the peace, Ps. 120:7.

2. To our enemies. Since men became enemies to God, they have been found very apt to be enemies one to another. And of all men, those that embrace religion have reason to expect to meet with enemies, in a world whose smiles seldom concur with Christ's. Now Christianity teaches us how to behave towards our enemies; and in this instruction it quite differs from all other rules and methods, which generally aim at victory and dominion; but this at inward peace and satisfaction. Whoever are our enemies, our rule is, to do them no hurt, but all the good we can.

(1.) To do them no hurt, v. 17. Recompense to no man evil for evil. For that is brutish, and befitting only those animals, which are not conscious either of any being above them, or of any state before them: we have not so learned God, who does so much for his enemies, Mat. 5:45. much less have we so learned Christ, who died for us when we were enemies, ch. 5:8, 10.

To the same purport, v. 19. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves. And why must this be ushered in with such an affectionate compellation, rather than any other of the exhortations of this ch.? Surely, because this is intended for the composing of angry spirits, that are hot in the resentment of a provocation. He addresses himself to such, in this endearing language, to mollify and qualify them. Call him dearly beloved. Such a soft word, fitly spoken, may be effectual to turn away wrath. Avenge not yourselves; when anybody has done you any ill turn, do not desire or endeavor to bring the like mischief or inconvenience on him.' It is not forbidden to the magistrate to execute just and wholesome laws; but it forbids private revenge. Nay, if persons wronged, in seeking the defence of the law, and magistrates in granting it, act from any particular personal pique or quarrel, and not from a concern that public peace and order be maintained, and right done; even such proceedings, though seemingly regular, will fall under this prohibited self-revenging. See how strict the law of Christ is in this matter, Mat. 5:38-40. This is a hard lesson to corrupt nature; therefore he subjoins,

[1.] A remedy against it; Rather give place unto wrath. Not to our own wrath; to give place to that, is to give place to the devil, Eph. 4:26, 27. but, 1st. The wrath of our enemy; do not answer wrath with wrath, but with love rather, Eccl. 10:4. So it explains that of our Savior, Mat. 5:39. Instead of meditating how to revenge one wrong, prepare to receive another. When others are angry, let us be calm; this is a remedy against revenge, and seems to be the genuine sense. But, 2dly. Many apply it to the wrath of God; 'Give place to that, make room for Him to take the throne of judgment, and let Him alone to deal with thine adversary.'

[2.] A reason against it; For it is written, Vengeance is mine. We find it written, Deut. 32:35. God is the sovereign King, the righteous Judge, and to Him it belongs to administer justice. Some of this power He hath trusted in the hands of the civil magistrates, Gen. 9:6. ch. 13:4. their legal punishments therefore are to be looked upon as a branch of God's revengings. This is a good reason why we should not avenge ourselves; for if vengeance be God's, then, 1st. We may not do it. We step into the throne of God, if we do, and take his work out of his hand. 2dly. We need not do it, for God will, if we meekly leave the matter with Him; He will avenge us, as far as there is reason and justice for it; and further we cannot desire it. See Ps. 35:14, 15.

(2.) We must not only not hurt our enemies, but our religion goes higher, and teaches us to do them all the good we can. It is a command peculiar to Christianity, and highly commends it; Love your enemies, Mat. 5:44. We are here taught to show that love to them, both in word and deed.

[1.] In word, v. 14. Bless them who per- secute you; for it has been the common lot of God's people to be persecuted, either with a powerful hand, or spiteful tongue. If there be anything in them that is commendable and praiseworthy, notice it, and mention it to their honor. Speak respectfully to them, according as their place is; not rendering railing for railing, and bitterness for bitterness. Wish well to them, and desire their good; so far from seeking any revenge, pray for them. If it be not in the power of our hand to do anything else for them, yet we can testify our goodwill by praying for them; for which our Master hath given us not only a rule, but an example, Lu. 23:34. Bless, and curse not. It denotes a thorough goodwill in all the instances and expressions of it; not, 'Bless them when you are at prayer, and curse them at other times;' but, 'Bless them always, and curse not at all.'

[2.] In deed, v. 20. If thine enemy hunger, as thou hast ability and opportunity, be ready and forward to show him any kindness, and never the less so for his having been thine enemy, but rather the more, that thou mayest thereby testify the sincerity of thy forgiving of him. It was said of Abp. Cranmer, that the way for a man to make him his friend, was to do him an ill turn. It is quoted from Prov. 25:21, 22. So that, [as] high a precept as it seems to be, the O.T. was not a stranger to it. Feed him abundantly, (the Gr. is very significant,) nay, carefully and indulgently; as we do children and sick people, with much tenderness. Contrive to do it so as to express thy love. So confirm your love to him. Because, in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head; i. e. Thou shalt either melt him into repentance and friendship, and mollify his spirit toward thee; or, it will aggravate his condemnation, and make his malice against thee the more inexcusable. Thou wilt hereby hasten on him the tokens of God's wrath and vengeance. Not that this must be our intention in showing him kindness, but, for our encouragement, such will be the effect.*

To this purpose is the exhortation in the PRACT. OBS. Surely they strangely misunderstand the doctrines which the apostle teaches, who suppose them inconsistent with exhortations, and instruction in all the several duties of Christianity; or as inimical to the practice of them! The same inspired writer, who most fully establishes, and most earnestly argues for, the doctrines of grace, is also most exact and particular in exhorting Christians to their various duties. Those who seem afraid that his doctrine may tend to licentiousness, will be equally averse to the impracticable strictness of his precepts; and many, who profess to be zealous friends to the former, are apt to find fault with the latter as legal, when echoed by the faithful preachers of the Gospel. But the mercies of God, apprehended by faith, and experienced in the heart, and exciting by divine grace reciprocal love and gratitude, form the grand motive to all willing obedience. Luke 7:40-50. 2 Cor. 5:13-15. 1 John 4:19.—Experience will convince us, and this alone can do it effectually, how good and pleasant 'the acceptable and perfect will of the Lord is;' so that the more we refuse conformity to a vain and wicked world, that we may walk with God in his only it occurs. Ps. 140:9, 10. . . Is. 47:14. . . Ez. 10:2. 2 Esdras 16:52. Whitby.—Those commentators, who argue that this cannot be the meaning, for that would be 'applying to revenge, and building upon it,' while it is expressly forbidden, seem not to have duly adverted to some other parts even of the N. T. Luke 18:7, 8. 2 Thcs. 1:5-9. Rev. 6:9, 10. 16:5-7. 18:20. To expect that God will avenge Himself on those who injure us out of hatred to Him, and are not won over by any kindness shown to them, is very different from 'avenging ourselves;' and it is evident, from the texts referred to, that in some cases, to desire that God would deliver his servants, by taking vengeance on their persecutors, or to rejoice when this is done, is not an unholy passion. At the same time, it is asserting far too much to say, that in all cases (or in any case, without the special grace of God), our kindness will melt down our obdurate enemies. On the other hand, Dr. Whitby too readily takes it for granted, that in the passage in Proverbs, which the apostle quotes, 'coals of fire' mean the vengeance of God; and one text, at least, he has overlooked, in which that expression is used of the intense fervor and great strength of love, Cant. 8:6, 7. while he appears to have misunderstood another; Prov. 20:22. Upon the whole, it appears to me, that both interpretations may stand. The line of our duty is clearly holy ways; the more indifferent we shall grow to the former, and the greater delight we shall take in the latter. It is our duty, and should be our constant endeavor, from 'undissembled love,' to exceed in evident benevolence, kindness, and courteousness, all those appearances, which polite selfishness assumes; and to be really as ready to oblige and be serviceable, as polite, worldly people profess to be.—While religion cuts the sinews of that selfish activity, which keeps the world in motion, it supplies its place by still more efficacious principles. Gal. 2:17-21. Love to God and man, with zeal for the honor of the Gospel, will influence the intelligent Christian to be diligent in his worldly business, and in acquiring superior skill, that in it he may 'serve the Lord' with 'fervency of spirit.' The joyful hope, also, of heavenly felicity will better support him, in his labors and trials, and endure his soul with more patient constancy, than the expectation of worldly riches or distinctions can do their deluded votaries: while, by 'instant continuance in prayer,' he will find his hope confirmed, and his alacrity in duty revived from time to time. SCOTT.

marked out; and if our enemies are not melted down by persevering kindness, they will be consumed by the fiery wrath of 'that God to whom vengeance belongeth.' This does not, however, at all deduct from the loving and spiritual import of the exhortation; which being found in the O. T., and not exceeded even in the New, is a full refutation of the opinion held by very many, that a more spiritual rule of duty is established under the Gospel, than had before existed. 1 S. 24:8-15. 25:39-42. 26:8-12. SCOTT.

But, besides that in national quarrels, the retribution falls heaviest on the most innocent, a nation that takes justice into its own hands, like an individual, goes a little further to gratify excited feeling or revenge, and this surplus of punishment must be retaliated, without end, till, as in our Indian tribes, it is checked by the extermination of one party, by duel, murder, or war. last v. which suggests a paradox not easily understood by the world; that in all matters of strife and contention, those that revenge are the conquered; and those that forgive are the conquerors.

1. Be not overcome of evil. Let not the evil of any provocation given you, have such a power over you, or make such an impression on you, as to dispossess you of yourselves; to disturb your peace, to destroy your love, to ruffle and discompose your spirits, to transport you to any indecencies, or to bring you to study or endeavor any revenge. He that cannot quietly bear an injury, is perfectly conquered by it.

2. But overcome evil with good; with the good of patience and forbearance, nay, kindness and beneficence to those that wrong you; learn to defeat their ill designs against you, and either to change them, or however, to preserve your own peace. He that hath this rule over his spirit, is better than the mighty.

To conclude, there remain two exhortations yet untouched, which are general, and which recommend all the rest as good in themselves, and of good report. We must not only not do evil, but abhor it; not only do that which is good, but cleave to it. It denotes a deliberate choice of, a sincere affection for, and a constant perseverance in, that which is good. It is subjoined to the precept of brotherly love, as directive of it; we must love our brethren, but not love them so much as for their sakes to commit any sin, or omit any duty; not think the better of

NOTES. CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. The apostle used the most decisive language on this subject [subjection to rulers]; 'every soul,' or person, whether a Jewish or a Gentile convert, a private Christian or a minister, or however distinguished by miraculous gifts, or by his station in the church, or in any other way, was absolutely required to be subject to the laws and edicts of those who held authority in the state; i. e. in all things lawful.—Nero, who was then emperor, was a monster of cruelty, caprice, and wickedness, almost unparalleled in the annals of mankind; yet no exception was made on that account. Christians were required to look above such concerns; and to consider God as the Source of all authority, and civil government as his appointment for the benefit of mankind: the several forms of government, prevailing in different places, were to be regarded as the effect of his superintending providence; and the persons raised to authority as his deputies. Til. 3:1, 2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.—It is evident, that the apostle did not mean to determine the divine right of absolute monarchy, or exclusively of any form of government; but to inculcate subjection to the ruling powers of every place and time, in which believers lived.—The benefits of civil government are very many and great; and it is the appointment of God for maintaining order among the apostate and selfish race of men; so that any man, who should set himself to oppose the established government of that nation in which he lived, [especially in a republic,] would be considered as resisting the providence and rebelling against the authority of God, who gave the rulers their authority, and will Himself call them to account for the use which they make of it.—'All other governments derived their power from God, as well as that of the Jews; though they had not the whole frame of their government immediately from Him, as the Jews had. . . . Whether we take powers here, in the abstract, for political authority, or in the concrete, for the persons actually exercising political power and jurisdiction, the sense will be the same. . . . How men come by a rightful title to this power, or who has this title, the apostle is wholly silent, and says nothing of it. To have meddled with that, would have been to decide of civil rights, contrary to the design and business of the Gospel, and the example of our Savior, who refused meddling in such cases, with this decisive question, "Who made Me a judge or a divider over you?"' Locke.—The words, rendered 'the powers that be,' or 'the existing authorities,' seem expressly intended to exclude all such inquiries. Perhaps nothing involves greater difficulties, in very many instances, than to ascertain, to whom, either individually, or any sin, for the sake of the person that commits it, but forsake 'all the friends in the world, to cleave to God and duty.' Provide things honest in the sight of all men; do not only do, but study, and forecast, and take care to do, that which is amiable and creditable, and recommends religion to all with whom you converse.' See Phil. 4:8. These acts of charity and beneficence are in a special manner of good report among men; and therefore are to be industriously followed by all that consult the glory of God, and the credit of their profession.

CHAP. XIII. There are three good lessons taught us in this ch. where the apostle enlarges more on his precepts than he had done in the foregoing ch., finding them more needful to be fully pressed. I. A lesson of subjection to lawful authority, v. 1—6. II. A lesson of justice and love to our brethren, v. 7—10. III. A lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves, v. 11—14.

V. 1—6. We are here taught how to conduct ourselves toward magistrates, and those that are in authority over us. He had taught us, in the foregoing ch. not to avenge ourselves, or to recompense evil for evil: lest that should seem to cancel civil government among Christians, he takes occasion to assert the necessity of it, and of the due inflicting of punishment on evil doers, however it looks like recompensing evil for evil. Observe,

I. The duty enjoined; let every soul be subject. Every person, one as well as another, not excluding, as the church of Rome does, the clergy. Not that our consciences are to be subjected to the will of any man. It is God's prerogative to make laws immediately to bind conscience, and we must render to God the things that are God's. But it intimates, that our subjection must be free and voluntary, sincere and hearty. Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought, Eccl. 10:20. To compass and imagine, is treason begun.

The subjection, here required, includes inward honor, 1 Pet. 2:17. and outward reverence and respect, both in speaking to them and of them; obedience to their commands in things lawful and honest, and in other things a patient subjection to the penalty without resistance; a conformity in everything to the place and duty of subjects [or citizens], bringing our minds to the relation and condition, and the inferiority and subordination of it.

Now there was good reason for the pressing of this duty of subjection to civil magistrates: 1. Because of the reproach the Christian religion lay under in the world, as an enemy to public peace, order, and government; Jerusalem was represented as hurtful to kings and provinces, Ezra 4:15, 16. and Jesus was so reproached, though He told them his kingdom was not of this world: no marvel, then, if his followers have been loaded in all ages with the like calumnies; called factious, seditious, and turbulent, and looked upon as the troublers of the land; their enemies having found such representations needful to justify their barbarous rage against them. The apostle, therefore, to obviate that reproach, and clear Christianity from it, shows that obedience to civil magistrates is one of the laws of Christ, whose religion helps to make people good subjects; and it was very unjust to charge on Christianity that faction and rebellion, which its principles and rules are so directly contrary to. 2. Because of the temptations the Christians lay under to be otherwise affected to civil magistrates; some being originally Jews, and so leavened with a principle, that it was unmeet for any of the seed of Abraham to be subject to one of another nation; their king must be of their brethren, Deut. 17:15. Besides, Paul had taught them, that they were not under the law, they were made free by Christ. Lest that liberty should be turned into licentiousness, and misconstrued to countenance faction and rebellion, the apostle enjoins obedience to civil government; which was the more necessary to be pressed now, because the magistrates were heathen and unbelievers; which yet does not destroy their civil power and authority. Besides, the civil powers were persecuting powers; the body of the law was against them.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty.

1. For wrath's sake. Because of the danger we run ourselves into by resistance. The Christians were then obnoxious to the sword collectively, the authority justly belongs; or, in fact, what constitutes a lawful title to authority. If then the most learned and intelligent men find insuperable difficulties, and differ widely in their opinions respecting this subject; how shall the bulk of the people be able to decide it? And if Christians are first to determine concerning the right by which their rulers possess and exercise authority, before they think themselves bound to obedience; they must very commonly indeed be engaged in opposition to 'the existing authorities.' But the apostle's design was, to mark out the plain path of duty to Christians, however circumstanced. [See further at the end of ch. Ed.]—(1) Powers. Mat. 23:18. John 1:12. The word signifies authority, political authority rather than power: but they who argue that it means lawful authority, seem to forget, that it is used for the dominion of the devil. Acts 26:18. Eph. 2:2. Col. 1:13. Scott.

(1.) 'Let every soul be subject to the supreme magistracies; for there is no magistracy except by divine permission, and those which be, are ordained by God.' Sr. 'At that time there were, at Rome, both Jews and Christians, who, from hatred of the tyranny of Claudius and Nero, had, there is reason to believe, plotted against them.' Carpz. 'Well did the apostle know how impatient the Jews were, of the Roman yoke.' Kop.—Of God. 'That to some singular providence of God the origin and whole fortunes of rulers are to be referred, is an opinion so common to, and constantly prevailing among all people, that it may seem to have been instilled by the Almighty Himself.' Kop. 'God having designed mankind to live in society, He has, by the frame of their nature, and by the reason of things, authorized governments to be exercised in every country.'

(1—7.) Nothing in this forbids the exercise of 'political rights.' Indeed, where the elective franchise is so fully enjoyed, as in most of these United States, it is the bounden duty of a Christian, so to inform himself that he may properly exercise it; nor can he bury this precious talent in the earth, and be innocent. The government should act religiously, but how will it, if those who administer it are not religious? And are we to expect that those who are not Christians will elect religious men to office? Is it not rather a disqualification for office in our country? We would hope not, yet how seldom do we hear religious arguments used by statesmen; is it not thought a weakness? Is sectarism so rife among us, that we fear, as Christians, to elect Christians to office, lest we be advancing a sect; giving temporal power to the church? Is the church so unwise, so corrupt? Is pure religion so dead among us? Never was the responsibility of the Christian citizen so great, his duty so momentous, as in these times, and in this country. 3 For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do<sup>a</sup> that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same:

4 For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

of the magistrate for their religion, and needed not make themselves more so by their rebellion. The least show of resistance or sedition, in a Christian, would soon be aggravated and improved, and would be very prejudicial to the whole society; therefore they had more need than others to be exact in their subjection, that those who had so much occasion against them in the matter of their God, might have no other occasion.

To this head must that argument be referred, v. 2. They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation: they shall be called to an account for it. God will reckon with them for it, because the resistance reflects on Him; the magistrate will reckon with them for it, for they will come under the lash of the law, and will find the higher powers too high to be trampled on, all civil governments being justly strict and severe against treason and rebellion; so it follows, v. 3. Rulers are a terror. This is a good argument, but low for a Christian.

2. We must be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience-sake: not so much from the fear of punishment, as from the love of virtue. This makes common civil offices acceptable to God, when they are done for conscience-sake, with an eye to God, to his providence putting us into such relations, and to his precept making subjection the duty of those relations. Thus the same thing may be done from a very different principle. Now, to oblige conscience to this subjection, he argues, v. 1—4, 6.

(1.) From the institution of magistracy; There is no power but of God. By Him kings reign, Prov. 8:15. The usurpation and abuse of power are not of God, for He is not the Author of sin; but the power itself is. The most unjust and oppressive princes in the world, have no power but what is given them from above, Jn. 19:11. the Divine Providence being, in a special manner, conversant about those changes and revolutions of governments which have such an influence on states and kingdoms, and such a multitude of particular persons and less communities. Or, it may be meant of government in general: God has not left men like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less.

The powers that be: whatever the particular form and method of government are, whether by monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy; wherever the governing power is lodged, it is an ordinance of God, and it is to be received and submitted to accordingly; though immediately an ordinance of man, 1 Pet. 2:13. yet originally an ordinance of God. Ordained of God; a military word, signifying not only the ordination of magistrates, but the subordination of inferior magistrates to the supreme, as in an army; for among magistrates there is a diversity of gifts, and trusts, and services. Hence it follows, v. 2. that whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. There are other things from God, that are the greatest calamities: but magistracy is from God, as an ordinance, it is a great law, and it is a great blessing: so that the children of Belial, that will not endure the yoke of government, will be found breaking a law, and despising a blessing. Magistrates are therefore called gods, Ps. 82:6. because they bear the image of God's authority. This is not at all applicable to the particular rights of kings and kingdoms, and the branches of their constitution; nor can any certain rule be fetched from hence for the modelling of the original contracts between the governors and governed; but it is intended for direction to private persons in their private capacity, to behave themselves quietly and peaceably in the sphere which God has set them in, with a due regard to the evil powers which God, in his providence, has set over them, 1 Tim. 2:1, 2.

Magistrates are here again and again called God's ministers. He is the minister of God, v. 4, 6. In the administration of public justice, the determining of quarrels, the protecting of the innocent, the righting of the wronged, the punishing of offenders, and the preserving of national peace and order, that every man may not do what is right in his own eyes; in these things it is, that magistrates act as God's ministers. As the killing of an inferior magistrate, while he is actually doing his duty, is accounted treason against the prince; so the resisting of any magistrates, in the discharge of these duties of their place, is the resisting of an ordinance of God.

(2.) From the intention of magistracy, as designed to be,

[1.] A terror to evil works, and evil workers. They bear the sword, the sword of justice. They are heirs of restraint, to put offenders to shame; Laish wanted such, Judg. 18:7. Such is the power of sin and corruption, that many will not be restrained from the greatest enormities, and such as are most pernicious to human society, by any regard to the law of God and nature, or the wrath to come; but only by the fear of temporal punishments, which the willfulness and perverseness of degenerate mankind have made necessary. Hence it appears, that laws with penalties for the lawless and disobedient, 1 Tim. 1:9. must be constituted in Christian nations, and are agreeable with, and not contradictory to, the Gospel. In this work of restraint, the magistrate is the minister of God, v. 4. He acts as God's agent, to whom vengeance belongs; therefore must take heed of infusing into his judgments any private, personal resentments of his own. To execute wrath upon him that doeth evil:—yet the judicial processes of the most vigilant, faithful magistrates, though some faint resemblance of the judgments of the great day, come far short of the judgment of God, which extends

V. 3—5. If the ruler abuse his authority, God will call him to an account for it; there are, in many countries, legal and constitutional checks on those who attempt to introduce tyranny; and on great occasions, the people will sometimes, with one consent, arise against a cruel oppressor, and subvert his government; as the Romans did against Nero, who was condemned, by the senate, to die, as an enemy to mankind, with the approbation of the whole world. But Christians are seldom called on to take any active or leading part in such transactions; [though their duty at the ballot-box, at least, is imperious, note, 1—7. Ed.] If laws be unreasonably formed, or iniquitously executed, this should be endured as a cross laid on them, till they, who are legally authorized, apply a remedy to the evil; or nothing more be attempted than by [orderly votes and] peaceable and respectful petitions. And if we be required by human authority to sin against God, we must steadfastly refuse obedience, and cheerfully and meekly endure the consequence, well satisfied with the blessings ensured by the promise of God, to those 'who suffer for righteousness' sake.' Mat. 5:10—12. Acts 4:13—22. 5:29—31. 1 Pet. 3:13—16. 4:12—16.

(3—7.) 'And wilt thou not stand in awe of the magistracy? Do good and thou shalt have praise for it; for (the magistrate) is a servant of God for thy benefit. But if thou doest evil, fear; for he beareth the sword not in vain, since he is the minister of God, condemning to punishment the evil-doer. Therefore we ought to yield subjection, not only because of punishment, but for conscience' sake.'—'On the same account, moreover, we should also pay tribute; for they are God's ministers who attend to this matter.' Sr. 'Not the collecting tribute, but the ministrations, as ministers, Gr. leitourgoi: a very strong term, properly denoting (Schl.) "persons who were obliged, either by their own tribe, or the people at large, to perform certain public forms of worship, or, at their own expense, supply the wants of the state, and in a case of necessity, undertake all the most burdensome and irksome offices in the state, yield up their property, nay, even their life and blood, to promote the welfare of the state." See on Luke 1:23. BL., who remarks, that 'according to the most learned philologists and antiquaries, phoros and phorot, [tr. tribute.] denote the land tax and the capitation tax, and are nearly the same with the kensos, Luke 20:21. The telē [tr. customs] were the vectigalia, and the customs levied on the imports and exports.' Ep.

(4.) 'By bearing the sword is meant, having the power of life and death; which was represented by the Roman magistrates' being girded with the sword [as the Turkish Sultan is now], or having it carried before them, (so Sueton.,) a custom which is partly retained [Burder says, in England] in modern times. See Grot., who refers to Tac. (I add Liban., Philoster, and Herodian.) and says, that in the Rabbinical writers frequently occurs the expression, The king who bears the sword. Decapitation, performed (as in Germany now) by the sword, was the most frequent capital punishment.' BL. 'The three designs of penalties being, to promote observance of law (by deterring from crime, and thus general security); restitution, or reformation: does capital punishment for murder best accomplish these designs; and, if so, do the O. and N. T. give the right to take life for murder? Now, as penalties respect a whole community, and their being prevented from crime, if the prevention of a man from becoming a criminal is at least as beneficial as his reformation, prevention of crime in the whole community is millions to one, incomparably, more important than either of the other objects, restitution or reformation, which respects but one or two individuals: and restitution is the next most important. Of the two punishments for murder, then, which best answers the primary design of penalties (the welfare of the whole by) prevention of crime, death, or imprisonment for life (with, of course, meagre diet, hard labor, rigid supervision by day, and solitary confinement at night)? After providing against the abuse of this penalty, considering that the love of life is the strongest principle of the human soul; that the dread of death includes also a dread of the awful retributions of the eternal world, selected by God Himself to deter men from sin; that all generations have regarded death as the greatest punishment; that it accords with the experimental legislation of Pennsylvania, which has greatly decreased the number of murders; that those governments which have abolished capital punishment for murder, were all, after a trial of a few years, compelled to abandon it; that the imprisoned not unfrequently commit other murders, and not unfrequently escape; we are constrained to maintain the position, (to which, indeed, the Prison Discipline Society, after all their investigations, firmly adhere.) "That the punishment of death for murder could not be abolished with safety."—"That," again to use the words of their Report for 1835, "the law of God seems holy, just, and good, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Prof. Schmucker, in Bib. Repos. July, 1837, where see the right of death fully considered. It seems sufficient here, to say, that God has an undoubted right to take life, and Himself asserts, in this v. that He has given governments this right, as his vicegerents. Comp. Ex. 21:11, 14. (5.) 'Hardy well observes, that, from this passage, "it is certain, that human laws, legitimately enacted, are not only binding in foro externo [before men], but in foro conscientie et Dei [before conscience and God], and not only bind the transgressor to punishment, but to blame." [How eminently is this true of popular governments and legislation!] Thus transgression becomes not only a breach of law, but a sin.' BLOOMF.

to the evil thought, and is a discerner of the intents of the heart. He beareth not the sword in vain. It is not for nothing that God hath put such a power into the magistrate's hand; but it is intended for the restraining and suppressing of disorders. It is a good thing when the punishment of malactors is managed as an ordinance of God, instituted and appointed by Him, as a holy God, that hates sin; as King of nations, and the God of peace and order; the Protector of the good, whose persons, families, estates, and names, are by this mean hedged about; and One that desires not the eternal ruin of sinners, but by the punishment of some would prevent the like wickedness, that others, hearing and fearing, may do no more presumptuously.

[2.] A praise to them that do well. Those that keep in the way of their duty, shall have the commendation and protection of the civil powers, to their credit and comfort, v. 3. This is the intention of magistracy, and therefore we must, for conscience' sake, be subject to it, as a constitution designed for the public good, to which all private interests must give way. But pity it is, that ever this gracious intention should be perverted, and that those who bear the sword, while they countenance and connive at sin, should be a terror to those that do well. But so it is, when the vilest men are exalted; and yet even then, the blessing and benefit of a common protection, and a face of government and order, are such, that it is our duty in that case rather to submit to persecution for well-doing, and to take it patiently, than by any irregular and disorderly practices to attempt a redress. Never did sovereign prince pervert the ends of government as Nero did, and yet to him Paul appealed, and under him had the protection of the law, and the inferior magistrates, more than once. Better a bad government, than none at all.

(3.) From our interest in it; 'He is the minister of God to thee for good.' Protection draws allegiance. If we have protection from the government, we owe subjection to it; by upholding the government, we keep up our own hedge. This subjection is likewise consented to by the tribute we pay, v. 6. By paying tribute, you not only own the magistrate's authority, but the blessing of that authority to yourselves. He does not say, 'You give it as an alms,' but, 'You pay it as a just debt, or lend it, to be repaid in all the blessings and advantages of public government, which you reap the benefit of.' This is the lesson the apostle teaches, and it becomes all Christians to learn and practise it, that the godly in the land may be found, (whatever others are,) the quiet and the peaceable in the land.

V. 7—10. We are here taught a lesson of justice and charity.

I. Of justice, v. 7. Render therefore to all their dues; especially to magistrates, for this refers to what goes before; and likewise to all with whom we have to do. He specifies,

1. Due taxes; Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom. Most of the countries where the Gospel was first preached, were subject at this time to the Roman yoke, and were drained by taxes and impositions, to the just and honest payment of which they are here pressed by the apostle.

Some indeed understand by tribute, standing taxes, and by custom, occasional: both which are to be faithfully and conscientiously paid, as they become legally due. Our Lord was born, when his mother went to be taxed; and enjoined the payment of tribute to Cesar. Many, who in other things seem to be just, yet make no conscience of this, but pass it off with a false, ill-favored maxim, that it is no sin to cheat the king; directly contrary to Paul's rule, Tribute to whom tribute is due.

2. Due respect; Fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor. This sums up the duty we owe not only to magistrates, but to all superiors, parents, masters, all that are over us in the Lord, according to the fifth commandment. Comp. Lev. 19: 3. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father; not with a fear of amazement, [or slavishness,] but a loving, reverent, respectful, obediential fear. Where there is not this respect in the heart to our superiors, no other duty will be paid aright.

3. Due payment of debts, v. 8. 'Owe no man anything; do not continue in any one's debt, while you are able to pay it, farther than by, at least, the tacit consent of the person to whom you are indebted. Give every one his own. Do not spend that on yourselves, much less heap it up for yourselves, which you owe to others.' The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again, Ps. 37: 21. Many that are very sensible of the trouble, think little of the sin of being in debt.

II. Of charity; Owe no man anything; you do owe no man anything; so some read it; 'Whatever you owe to any relation, or to any with whom you have to do, it is eminently summed up and included in this debt of love. But to love one another, that is a debt that must be always in the paying, and yet always owing.' Love is a debt; the law of God and the interest of mankind made it so; it is not a thing we are left at liberty about; but it is enjoined us, as the principle

V 6, 7. For similar reasons, it is the duty of Christians to pay taxes also; because as the advantages of government are great, so must its expenses be very large. Rulers are 'the ministers of God,' in providence, who are called 'to attend constantly to this very thing.' It is proper, and for the good of the people, that they, their families, and attendants, should appear in dignity and [in a monarchy, in] splendor: they are, and ought to be, taken from the highest ranks [from the best men. Ed.] in the community; as the temptations of such exalted stations must in general be irresistibly strong, to those who have been educated in comparative indigence, [or not at all.] Prov. 23: 3. 30: 21—23. Ec. 10: 5—7, 16—19.—Both governors and governed are fallen creatures; and therefore selfishness can by no method whatever be excluded. Some excess of expediture, some improper accumulation of treasure, some waste of it, in providing for relatives and dependants, may be expected, though not justified.—Taxes must, therefore, be imposed, and ought to be scrupulously paid. Sometimes they will be oppressive, or very heavy; but this grievance should be patiently endured, till it be constitutionally redressed. So that it is the will of God, that his worshippers and servants render to rulers, the tribute, custom, excise, or impost, demanded legally from [them], with as much exactness as they would pay any other debt. Mat. 22: 15—22. They must use no collusion or fraud; they should not hesitate or murmur; and all smuggling, or dealing in contraband goods; all withholding or evading duties imposed on any commodity, and every species of this kind of imposition, is a direct rebellion against the providence and most express commandment of God. And, however it may be palliated or varnished over, it is not merely a defalcation of the revenue, but likewise a robbery of all who pay taxes. For such collusions will not prevent the sum required from being raised on the public; so that, when one tax falls short another is imposed; and when he, who should pay five [dollars], pays but three, his more conscientious neighbor must pay seven instead of five, and is therefore directly robbed of [two dollars.] At the same time, all the atrocious crimes of the whole body of smugglers, and others who combine to defraud the revenue in a great variety of ways, are abetted by every one, [however gentlemanly,] who puts his hand to such a dishonest business. Ex. 20: 15. In this case, to declaim about the vices and extravagances of rulers, is to add one sin to another, 2 Pet. 2: 10, 11. Jude 5—10. These things never were worse than in the days of Nero; they are inseparable from human nature: the great Lawgiver was aware of them, when He gave the commandment; and if no man paid a tax, till the character and administration of all concerned in managing public business, and the disposal of the public money, and the tax itself, met his full approbation; none would ever be paid, by the selfish and unreasonable part of the community, and the public exigences could never be answered. This subject is the more enlarged on, because the arguments and examples of some avaricious professors of the Gospel, draw in well-meaning people to wound their consciences and disgrace the cause of religion, by evading or refusing taxes, in a disingenuous and fraudulent manner; which is as contrary to simple truth, as to common honesty.—Moreover, the apostle enjoins on Christians, to render 'fear,' or reverence, and 'honor,' to those to whom they are due, on account of their authority, rank, or any other civil distinction; neither supposing, that religion requires a stiff and rude singularity, in refusing customary titles or expressions of honor and respect to superiors; Luke 1: 1—4. nor that it allows that petulance and scurrility, with which many delight to vilify the characters and conduct of their rulers, and those in high stations. Their faults should in general be regarded with candor and silence; (for their situation is conspicuous, and their temptations very great;) and, though the honor due to their rank and authority may consist with disapprobation of their conduct; yet not with reviling and defamation of them [and their families]! The same authority which commands children to honor their parents, commands subjects to honor their rulers; and they should honor them in the same manner. Gen. 9: 20—23. Ex. 20: 12. Luke 20: 19—26. 1 Pet. 2: 13—17.

(7, 8.) How can an honest man (much less a Christian) embark in 'speculations,' foreign from his regular business, that capital, on which his business credit is based, and which is therefore pledged to his creditors, without forfeiting his character? How can he that maketh haste to be rich, be innocent? All 'preference' of creditors is excluded also by the apostle's rule of honesty. Ed.

V. 8—10. It cannot be supposed, that the apostle meant to prohibit the contracting of debts, on any account, which is next to impossible, to the greatest part of mankind. Christians are indeed under the highest obligations to pay all legal demands, without reluctance or needless delay, and with great punctuality; and they should avoid all superfluous expense, and carefully guard against contracting any debts, which they have not a reasonable prospect of discharging. They ought also to stand aloof from all adventurous speculations, or rash engagements as sureties for others, beyond their circumstances; and whatever may needlessly involve them in debts, and expose them to the danger and discredit of not 'rendering to all their dues.' Ex. 20: 15. Pr. 6: 1—5. Yet, when all such demands are answered, and all these rules observed; they still 'owe love' to all men, with the various duties which result from its enlarged exercise.—The learned Erasmus long since remarked, that the first clause might as properly and literally be rendered, 'Ye do owe no man anything, but to love one another;' and though subsequent commentators, almost without exception, take the words imperatively, yet it may be worthy of consideration, whether the indicative construction do not, far more simply and evidently, accord to the context. The apostle was exhorting Christians to render to all their dues; (7) and, having branched out the general precept into a few particulars, he closes, by adding, 'Ye owe no man anything, &c.' as if he had said, 'All that I would inculcate is reducible to this; Obey the law of love to others, in all its branches, and then you will render to all their dues.' Ex. 20: 12—17. The sense in this construction is obvious and important, but the ordinary interpretation, seeming at least to forbid Christians to contract any debts; and to condemn such, as cannot at present discharge those already contracted, may embarrass the minds of the most upright; it requires considerable management in expounding it, so as to prevent this embarrassment; and after all, in the literal import, scarcely any so much as attempt to obey it; indeed to numbers it is, strictly speaking, impracticable. The usual exposition of the next clause, 'but to love one another;' 'Be not a debt-

9 For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

11 And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.

12 The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light.

13 Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying.

and summary of all duty owing one to another; for love is the fulfilling of the law; not perfectly, but it is a good step towards it. It is inclusive of all the duties of the second table, which he specifies v. 9. and those suppose the love of God. See 1 John 4:20. Loving and being loved, is all the pleasure, joy, and happiness of an intelligent being. [This strikes at the root of all evil, selfishness.] God is love, 1 Jn. 4:16. and love is his image on the soul: where it is, the soul is well moulded, and the heart fitted for every good work. Now, to prove that love is the fulfilling of the law, he gives us,

1. An induction of particular precepts, v. 9. He specifies the last five of the ten commandments, which he observes to be all summed up in this royal law, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; with an as of quality, not of equality; [not as much, but in the same manner, says Bl.] On this is built that golden rule, of doing as we would be done by.

2. A general rule concerning the nature of brotherly love; Love worketh no ill, v. 10. he that walks in love, that is acted and governed by a principle of love, he worketh no ill; more is implied than is expressed. It not only worketh no ill, but it worketh all the good that may be, deviseth liberal things. For it is a sin, not only to devise evil against thy neighbor, but to withhold good from them to whom it is due; both are forbidden together, Prov. 3:27-29. This proves, that love is the fulfilling of the law, answers all the end of it; for what else is that, but to restrain us from [selfishness and] evil-doing, and to constrain us to [benevolence and] well-doing? Love is a living, active principle of obedience to the whole law. The whole law is written in the heart, if the law of love be there.

V. 11-14. Four things we are here taught, as a Christian's directory, for his day's work; when to awake, how to dress, how to walk, and what provision to make.

I. When to awake, v. 11. to awake out of the sleep of sin; out of the sleep of carnal security, sloth, and negligence; out of the sleep of spiritual death, and deadness; both the wise and foolish virgins slumbered and slept, Mat. 25:5. We have need to be often excited and stirred up to awake. Considering,

1. The time we are cast into; Knowing the time. It is gospel-time, the accepted time, working time, a time when more is expected than was in the times of that ignorance which God winked at, when people sat in darkness. Know the time to be a busy time, a perilous time; time to awake, for we have slept enough, 1 Pet. 4:3. high time indeed, for Behold, the Bridegroom cometh.

2. The salvation we are on the brink of; Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed; The eternal happiness we chose for our portion is now nearer us, than it was when we became Christians. The nearer we are to our centre, the quicker should our motion be. Is there but a step betwixt us and heaven, and shall we be so very slow and dull in our Christian course, and move so heavily? The more the days are shortened, and the more grace is increased, the nearer is our salvation, and the more quick and vigorous we should be in our spiritual motions.

II. How to dress ourselves. Observe, 1. What we must put off; put off our night-clothes, which it is a shame to appear abroad in. Sinful works are works of darkness; they come from the darkness of ignorance and mistake, they covet the darkness of privacy and concealment, and they end in the darkness of hell and destruction.

2. What we must put on: wherewithal shall our souls be clothed? (1.) Put on the armor of light. The graces of the Spirit are this armor, to secure the soul from Satan's temptations, and the assaults of this present evil world; called the armor of light, some think, alluding to the bright, glittering armor the Roman soldiers used to wear; Christians need this armor, as soldiers exposed; or such armor as becomes us to wear in the daylight: [and which it was considered soldierly to keep bright.] The graces of the Spirit are suitable, splendid ornaments; and are, in the sight of God, of great price. (2.) Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. This stands in opposition to a great many base lusts, mentioned v. 13. Put on Christ, includes all. Put on the righteousness of Christ for justification; he found in Him, Phil. 3:9. as a man is found in his clothes; put on the new man, Eph. 4:24. get the habit of grace confirmed, the acts of it quickened. By baptism we have in profession put on Christ, Gal. 3:27. Let us do it in truth and sincerity. Put Him on as a lord to rule you, as Jesus to save you, and in both, as Christ anointed and appointed by the Father, to this ruling, saving work.

III. How to walk. When up and dressed, we are not to sit still in an affected closeness and privacy, as monks and hermits. What have we good clothes for, but to appear abroad in them?

Let us walk, walk honestly as in the day, 1 Thess. 4:1. as children of light, comp. Eph. 5:8. Our conversation must be as becomes the Gospel; honest, decent, and becoming, so as to credit our profession, adorn the doctrine of God our Savior, and recommend religion in its beauty to others; we must abstain from all excess in eating and drinking; not indulge our sensual appetite in any private excesses. Christians must not walk in any of those lusts of the flesh, those works of darkness, which are forbidden in the seventh commandment. Downright adultery and fornication are the chambering forbidden; lascivious thoughts and affections, lascivious looks, words, books, songs, gestures, dances, dalliances, which lead to, and are degrees of that uncleanness, are the wantonness here forbidden; whatsoever transgresseth the pure and sacred law of chastity and modesty. Strife and envying are also works of darkness; for though the acts and instances of strife and envy are very common, yet none are willing to own the principles, or to acknowledge themselves envious and contentious. Where there are riot and drunkenness, there usually are chambering and wantonness, and strife and envy. Solomon puts them all together, Prov. 23:29, &c. Those that tarry long at the wine, v. 30. have contentions and wounds without cause, v. 29. and their eyes behold strange women, v. 33.

IV. What provision to make, v. 14. make no provision for the flesh. Be not careful about the body: two things are here forbidden;

1. Perplexing ourselves with an inordinate care, in forecasting for the body; be not careful and cumbered about it, do not take anxious thought, Mat. 6:31. It [enjoins content, and] forbids an anxious, incumbering care.

2. Indulging ourselves in an irregular desire. We are not forbidden barely to provide for the body, (it is a lamp that must or to any man of ought, but love and affection, which ye ought so to pay, as that ye should have more to pay; (Bp. Hall) is not, to me at least, satisfactory; for why should we be allowed so to come short, in rendering 'love to whom love is due,' as to be always there in arrears, and there only? If we daily rendered all that love to our neighbor, which is due to him, we should not remain in his debt. The next day would indeed require a fresh payment, but there would be no arrears due. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot but decidedly prefer the indicative construction; 'Ye do owe, &c.' In short, the whole of what the apostle would inculcate was, 'love,' in its various exercises and effects; so that he who loved another, actually 'fulfilled the law,' in respect of its requirements towards his neighbor; and this 'love of our neighbor as ourselves,' in obedience to the command of God, would also be the best evidence of our loving Him with all our hearts, according to the first and great commandment of the law. Ex. 20:1-11. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Mat. 19:16-22. Mark 12:23-34. Luke 10:25-37.—The apostle, by thus appealing to the moral law as the standard of duty, after having so fully shown, that no man can be justified by it, completely establishes the distinction between the law, as a covenant, and the law, as a rule; and proves, that our deliverance from it in the former sense, is in order that we might obey it in the latter.—'Not that the law is exactly fulfilled by doing no evil to our neighbor; but, because, in Christ's interpretation, the neglect of doing any good we are able, and have opportunity to do for Him, is doing evil. (Mark 3:4.) . . . For "charity is also kind," (1 Cor. 13:4.) and engageth us "by love to serve one another." (Gal. 5:13-15.)' Whitby. 1:13-16. 1 Cor. 13:4-7. Gal. 6:1-5. 1 John 3:16, 17.) Perfect love, with all its effects, fulfils the command of 'loving our neighbor as ourselfes;' but imperfect love, for a part of our lives, falls very short of this.

V. 11-14. Some think the apostle here refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the more complete establishment of Christianity which followed; but the ruin of the Jewish nation could not much affect the Christians at Rome; and the situation of believers in this life, as expecting complete and eternal salvation, is evidently intended.—The redemption, by which salvation comes to sinners, was finished with the humiliation of the Savior, and when He expired on the cross. John 19:28-30. Salvation becomes ours, and is begun, when we come to Him by faith; it will be finished as to the soul at the hour of death, and as to the body at the day of judgment; when sin and all its consequences will finally be abolished; and 'death be swallowed up in victory.' 1 Cor. 15:50-53. The life of faith might be called 'day,' in comparison of the darkness of the idolatrous and unconverted state; yet it was but 'night,' or twilight, in comparison of the light of heaven. 1 Cor. 13:8-12. Eph. 5:8-14. Col. 1:9-14, v. 12. But this 'night was far spent,' that 'day was at hand;' it was therefore incumbent on them to anticipate it, and prepare for it.

PRACT. OBS. The grace of the Gospel directs our thoughts to the providence of God, as well as to his promises and commandments; and thus it induces [content], submission, and cheerful composure; where pride and the carnal mind see nothing but cause for murmurs and discontent.—It is far more agreeable to the pride of man, to rise to reputation, by declaiming against kings and princes; than to be employed in humbling ourselves before God for our own sins, and in diligently mortifying our own corrupt inclinations. But surely, there can be no sufficient reason, why ministers of the Gospel, and private Christians, should leave their peaceful duties, and bring the truth into disgrace, by becoming volunteers in such services, as apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, never intermeddled with!—Let then Christians recollect, that 'the world lieth in wickedness,' and that they are 'strangers and pilgrims' in it; that their time here is short; that it is their wisdom and duty to make the best of things as they find them; that submission to the providence and command of God requires their peaceable subjection to governors; and that in refusing this subjection, they rebel against God, and must give an account to Him of it.—At the same time magistrates may hence learn, from whom, and for what, they have their power, and what account they must render of it; that they too may attend to their duty in the fear of God, with 'whom there is no respect of persons;' remembering the solemn and strict account they must render to God.—Let those, who eagerly declaim concerning liberty, without distinguishing it from licentiousness, seriously ask themselves, whether their reasoning can be made consistent with such Scriptures as these? Whether Christ, (14.) Put on.] 'Take his manners, follow his example, as Phil. 2:5. A metaphor from the re vestiaria, or perhaps from the theatre. It is found both in the Hebrew, and in the best Greek writers.' BLOOMF.

Concluding Note. 'The resistance, which consists in non-subjection, or a refusal to yield actual obedience to the law of the superior, can be allowed, only when the matter of the law is sinful, and so forbidden by the higher Power; not when it is judged inexpedient or unprofitable only: for of this, subjects are not to judge, but the law-giver only; in that they lawfully may, and, therefore, to avoid scandal and punishment, and from respect to him who is God's vicegerent, ought to obey; even as servants ought to obey their froward masters, and children their parents, in all lawful things, (Col. 3:20. 1 Pet. 2:13.) and this from conscience towards God. No resistance of the higher powers by force, can be allowed to any who have not the power of the sword. For he that thus uses it, takes the sword without authority, from Him "to whom belongeth vengeance;" and so, without authority from Him to whom this power of the sword originally belongs. Where a people hath conferred not an absolute power, but a government according to the law, they must be supposed to have reserved to themselves a power necessary to preserve their laws.' Whitby.—Thus in mixed governments, there are legal and constitutional methods, by which the encroachments of one part of the government on the rights of the others, may be resisted. But Christians, in private stations, have not much concern in this: [Yet see note, v. 1-7. Ed.] and complicated cases may possibly arise, in which no previous rules or counsels can give adequate direction. Submission in all things lawful, to the 'existing authorities,' is our duty at all times and in all cases; though in civil convulsions, and amid great revolutions, and sudden changes in governments; there may frequently, for a season, be a difficulty in determining which are to be considered as the 'existing authorities.'—To claim the protection of the law, against the illegal violence even of magistrates, is not 'resisting the powers that be.' Acts 13:35-39. 22:28-30. 25:9-11.—The word rendered damnation, properly signifies judgment: and is by many expositors explained exclusively of the punishment inflicted by the magistrate: but the apostle is speaking of our duty to God, in obeying magistrates; which if we neglect, He will call us to account for it, and finally condemn us, except we repent.—Some have urged, against the interpretation here given, that if this be indeed the rule of religion, it lies open to the charge of abetting tyranny, and being inimical to civil liberty. But I apprehend, that this is not the case; for all the crimes committed by usurpers, tyrants, and oppressors, are at least as severely condemned in Scripture, as those committed by rebels and traitors. Now a religion cannot justly be regarded as abetting tyranny, or as inimical to civil liberty, which denounces the severest vengeance of God on those who act tyrannically, and unjustly deprive men of liberty. The apostle was not writing a  treatise on politics; but teaching a company of private Christians their duty. Had he been called on by Nero, or any other oppressive ruler, as he was by Felix, he would doubtless have 'reasoned with him on righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come.' Acts 24:24-27. and had he been sent immediately by God to rulers, as the ancient prophets were; he would doubtless have plainly told them their duty, and protested against particular instances of their tyranny and oppression, in the 'spirit and power of Elijah,' and of John the Baptist, when he said to Herod, concerning Herodias, 'It is not lawful for thee to have her.' 1 K. 21:17-25. Mat. 14:3-5. But it should be very seriously considered, on the other hand, whether the charge of being selfish, and 'hurtful to kings and provinces,' has not in every age been brought against the zealous worshippers of God. Ezra 4:12-24. Luke 23:1-5. Acts 16:19-24. 17:3-9. whether this has not been, and is not at this day, the main pretext of persecutors; and of those who would exclude the preachers of the Gospel out of their several districts: and whether the necessity, which is laid on Christians, 'to obey God rather than man,' is not in many cases likely enough to exasperate the spirit of haughty princes, without openly avowing, that there are other cases, in which we are not bound to obey them.—cases, which in fact call their right to authority in question, and directly impeach their wisdom and justice. Surely this is suited to increase their jealousy against the ministers, missionaries, and professors of the Gospel, in the minds of rulers, in all parts of the world, which to this day forms one grand barrier to the propagation of Christianity; a barrier, insurmountable except by the power of God. Had the primitive Christians explained the apostle's doctrine, with so many exceptions, and limitations, and cautions, as numbers do at present, and acted accordingly; and had Christianity assumed that political aspect, which it has generally borne in latter ages, (arising from the circumstances of the times,) nothing but a constant succession of miracles could have prevented its extirpation, by the rage of its numerous persecutors. But, in this respect, the apostles, and primitive ministers and Christians, and their successors for some ages, when situated 'as lambs amidst wolves,' were indeed 'wise as serpents and harmless as doves.' Yet they did not escape the charge of being seditious; but where do we read of an accusation brought against them as abettors of tyranny and enemies of liberty? Scott.

CHAP. XIV. The apostle having, in the former ch., directed our conduct one towards another in civil things, and prescribed the sacred laws of justice, peaceableness, and order, to be observed by us as members of the commonwealth; he comes, in this and part of the following ch., in like manner to direct our demeanor one towards another in sacred things, which pertain more immediately to conscience and religion, and which we observe as members of the church. Particularly, he gives rules how to manage our different apprehensions about indifferent things; in the management of which, it seems, there was something amiss among the Roman Christians, to whom he wrote, which he here labors to redress. But the rules are general, and of standing use in the church, for the preservation of that Christian love which he had so earnestly pressed in the foregoing ch. as the fulfilling of the law. It is certain, nothing is more threatening, nor more often fatal, to Christian societies, than the contentions and divisions of their members. By these wounds the life and soul of religion expire. Now in this ch., we are furnished with the sovereign balm of Gilead; the blessed apostle prescribes like a wise physician. Why then is not the hurt of the daughter of my people recovered, but because his directions are not followed? This ch., rightly understood, made use of, and lived up to, would set things to rights, and heal us all.

V. 1-23. We have here,

I. An account of the unhappy contention which had broken out in the Christian church.

his apostles, or his primitive disciples, ever spent their zeal about such topics? And whether such declamations and frequent invectives against those, whom the Scripture commands us to honor and obey, can be for the credit of the Gospel, and the benefit of true religion?—As to the efforts, which are anywhere made by those, on whom such trusts constitutionally devolve, to preserve, increase, or assist, the real liberty of mankind, personal, civil, or religious; or to check the career of despotism or oppression, over men of any climate, complexion, or religion; let us zealously forward them with our prayers, and by every mean consistent with the peace and good order of the community; and, if we would enjoy the blessing of good government, we should pray earnestly and constantly for our rulers, and all in authority; else we have no just cause to complain of any real or supposed grievances, to which we may be subjected by them. 1 Tim. 2:1, 2.—While we rejoice at deliverance from the condemnation of the holy law of God, may its precepts be written in our hearts, and transcribed into our lives; that prudence, honesty, and punctuality may mark all our transactions, and regulate all our expenses, and the payment of our debts, and make way for liberal kindness to the poor.—Emerging from the night of unconversion, and the twilight of our first glimmering views of heavenly things, and looking forward to the day of perfect knowledge and purity, let us study to walk in a manner consistent with our profession, to 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' to imbibe his spirit, to copy his conduct, to walk in every respect even as He walked. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. XIV. V. 1. Notwithstanding the authority vested by Christ in his apostles, and their infallibility in delivering his doctrine to mankind, differences of opinion prevailed even among real Christians; nor did Paul, by an express decision and command, attempt to put a final termination to them. 2-6, 14-18. 2 Pet. 1:20, 21.—If the method of subsequent ages had been then in use, the persons here spoken of would have been excluded from the church, and anathematized as obstinate heretics; or driven, for relief to their consciences, to separate from those, who imposed on them what they counted sinful: and afterwards they would have been shunned and stigmatized as schismatics. But Paul, in all the plenitude of his apostolical authority, could endure his fellow Christians to differ from him in opinion, as to matters of inferior consequence; and, instead of peremptory injunctions, he gave a general rule of the greatest importance, for our conduct in all similar cases. He exhorted the pastors and members of the church at Rome, to receive among them, as a brother, the weak believer; and not to perplex him with disputations about such things, as might appear doubtful to conscientious persons; but to leave him, under the general use of means, and loving instructions, to grow stronger in faith, and ripen in judgment, by the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This general rule applies to many particulars, both respecting doctrine, worship, and practice. If a man do not profess repentance, and a believing dependence, as a partly condemned sinner, on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, 'Emmanuel,' 'God manifest in the flesh,' and a reliance on the Holy Spirit for teaching and sanctification; it does not appear, that he can properly be regarded as a believer, or admitted into the communion of the saints. 2 John 7:11. But when these things are professed in words, and not denied in works, a man ought, at least, to be received as one, who is 'weak in the faith;' and more established believers should meekly help him forward, though he may yet be under the power of many prejudices and mistakes. 15:1-3.—'The force of the apostle's reasoning in favor of candor and mutual condescension, cannot be overrated by saying, as some have unhappily done, . . . that there was no separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians.—Had the things judged indifferent by the latter, and apprehended sinful by the former, been imposed; a separation of communion would have ensued, and the schism, on the apostle's principles, would have been chargeable on the imposers. When it shall please God to awaken in the governors of established protestant churches such a spirit of moderation and goodness, joined with a true zeal for religion; as to leave such things in that natural state of indifference, in which almost all sensible men confess it best they should be left, many separations will cease of course.' Doddr.—Thus the guilt of schism is reciprocally charged, by all parties, on their opponents; and indeed truly, when it is not done exclusively; or so as to suppose that all the fault lies on one side. For the same state of mind and heart generally prevails, in those who impose unscriptural terms of communion; and in those who separate themselves from their brethren, without sufficient reason; and then endeavor to make the cause of their separation appear as cogent as they can, in order to justify themselves. So that, not only 'the governors of protestant established churches,' but the leading men among dissenters, and seceders also, need to be brought, by the illumination and grace of the Holy Spirit, to a fuller knowledge of the Scriptures, and more entire conformity to the temper there inculcated. In proportion as men approach nearer and nearer, in judgment and disposition, to the Word of God, they will be brought nearer to each other; as the lines, from the circumference of a circle, approximate to each other, and to the centre, proportionably. Then each person concern-

b Ja. 4:12. c Is. 40:29. d Col. 2:16. e or, assured.

1. There was a difference among them about the distinction of meats and days ; those are the two things specified. There might be other similar occasions of difference, while these made the most noise, and were most noticed. The case was this : the members of the Christian church at Rome, were some of them originally Gentiles, and others of them Jews, Acts 8:21. The latter had been trained up in the observance of the ceremonial appointments, touching meats and days, and were not well instructed touching the cancelling of the ceremonial law by the death of Christ ; therefore they retained the ceremonial institutions, and practised accordingly ; while other Christians, that understood themselves better, and knew their Christian liberty, made no such difference.

(1.) Concerning meats, v. 2. One believeth that he may eat all things ; he is well satisfied, that the ceremonial distinction of meats, into clean and unclean, is no longer in force, but that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused ; nothing unclean of itself, v. 14. Acts 10:15, 28. This the strong Christian is clear in, and practises accordingly ; eating what is set before him, and asking no question for conscience-sake, I

Cor. 10:27. On the other hand, another, who is weak, is not clear in his Christian liberty, but rather inclines to think, that the meats forbidden by the law, remain still unclean ; and therefore, to keep at a distance from them, he will eat no flesh at all, but eateth herbs, contenting himself only with the fruits of the earth.

(2.) Concerning days, v. 5. Those who thought themselves still under some kind of obligation by the ceremonial law, esteemed one day above another ; kept up a respect to the times of the passover, pentecost, new moons, and feasts of tabernacles ; those who knew that all these things were abolished and done away by Christ's coming, esteemed every day alike. We must understand it with an exception of the Lord's day, which all Christians unanimously observed ; but they made no account of those antiquated festivals of the Jews.

Here the apostle speaks of the distinction of meats and days as a thing indifferent, when it went no further than the opinion and practice of some particular persons, who had been trained up all their days to such observances, and therefore were the more excusable, if they hardly parted with them. But in the Epistle to the Galatians, where he deals with those that were originally Gentiles, but were influenced by some judaizing teachers, not only to believe such a distinction, and to practise accordingly, but to lay a stress on it as necessary to salvation, and to make the observation of the Jewish festivals, public and congregational ; here the case was altered, and it is charged on them as the frustrating of the design of the Gospel, falling from grace, Gal. 4:9—11. This epistle is supposed to have been written some time before that to the Galatians. The apostle seems willing to let the ceremonial law wither by degrees, and to let it have an honorable burial ; now these weak Romans, seem to be only following it weeping to its grave, but those Galatians were raking it out of its ashes.

2. It was not so much the difference itself that did the mischief, as the mismanagement of the difference, making it a bone of contention. (1.) Those who knew their Christian liberty, and made use of it, despised the weak, who did not ; they trampled on them as silly, and humorously, and superstitious, for scrupling those things which they knew to be lawful. (2.) Those who were weak, and durst not use their Christian liberty, judged and censured the strong, who did, as if they were loose Christians, carnal professors, that cared not what they did, but walked at all adventures, and stuck at nothing.

Well, this was the disease, and we see it remaining in the church to this day ; the like differences, in like manner mismanaged, are still the disturbers of the church's peace. But,

II. We have proper directions and suggestions laid down for allaying this contention, and preventing the ill consequences of it ; not by excommunicating, suspending, and silencing either side, but by persuading them both to a mutual forbearance : if the contending parties will but submit to this fair arbitration, each abate of his rigor, and sacrifice their differences to their graces, all will be well quickly. Let us observe the rules he gives, some to the strong, and some to the weak, and some to both, for they are interwoven ; and reduce the reasons to their proper rules.

1. Those who are weak, must be received, but not to doubtful disputations, v. 1. Spend your zeal in things wherein all the people of God are agreed, and do not dispute about matters that are doubtful. Receive him, take him to you, welcome him, receive him with the greatest affection and tenderness. Lend him your hand, so the Syriac ; Receive him, not to quarrel with him, and to argue about uncertain points. Not to judge his doubtful thoughts, so the margin ; not to pump out his weak sentiments concerning those things, which he is in doubt about, that you may censure and condemn him. Receive him, not to expose him, but to instruct and strengthen him. See 1 Cor. 1:10. Phil. 3:15, 16.

2. Those who are strong, must by no means despise the weak ; nor those who are weak, judge the strong, v. 3. This is levelled directly against the fault of each party. He argues against both these jointly ; we must not despise or judge our brethren. Why so ?

ed, (instead of decidedly justifying every particular among those with whom he is connected, and disputing against everything in use among such as he differs from,) will seriously compare all particulars, on every side, with the sacred oracles ; and, in consequence, will discover, that neither party is entirely right, and neither entirely wrong. And this conviction, avowed and reduced to practice by the leading men, would gradually be communicated to the rest of the body ; and would make way for such amendments, retrenchments, and concessions, on all sides, and such fairness, gentleness, and candor, in debating on the controverted subjects, as would in process of time effectually terminate our unhappy divisions. But 'until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high,' it cannot be expected that these events will generally take place. It is, however, highly important, that individuals should well consider, from what source contentions in the church, as well as 'wars and fightings in the world,' actually arise ; and what is indispensably necessary, in order to terminate them. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4. Jam. 1:19—21. 3:13—18. 4:1—3. P. O. 1—6.—Weak in faith.] 'That is, in the knowledge of the benefit of Christ ; or the benefit to be derived from Him.'—Doubtful disputations.] 'The altercations of disputations, or the ambiguities of disputations ; i. e. lest he should depart more uncertain than he came, through various and perplexing controversies, or turn aside with a disturbed conscience.' Beza. Scott.

(1, &c.) 'This third portion of the practical part of the epistle, may be distributed under three heads, in the 1st of which the Jews, in particular, are addressed, 14:1—18. in the 2d, the Gentiles, in particular, 19—23. in the 3d, all of them at once, 15:1—13.—In the 1st part we have, 1st, a Proposition : That no one is to be judged or condemned because of certain kinds of food, v. 1, 2. 2dly, Arguments ; 1) Because we are all servants of God, v. 3, 4, 7—9. 2) Because every one ought to live according to his knowledge, and the dictates of his conscience, v. 5. 3) Because both may be done to the glory of God, v. 6. 4) Because every one shall give account of himself to God, v. 10—12. 5) Because no one ought to put a stumbling-block in his brother's way, v. 13—15. 6) Because, in the Christian dispensation, distinction between meats is done away with, v. 16—18. In the 2d part we have 1st, a Prop. : That peace and edification are to be followed after, and no stumbling-block to be thrown in another's way, v. 18, 19. 2dly, Args. : 1) Because meats are things too inconsiderable to deserve being made an occasion of offending others, v. 19—21. 2) Because everything is to be done according to a conscience certain, not doubtful, v. 22, 23. In the 3d part we have, 1st, a Prop. : That no one, whether Jew or Gentile, ought to please himself, ch. 15:1, 2, 7. 2dly, Args. : 1) From the example of Christ, v. 3, 4. 2) Because God loveth both the Jews and Gentiles, v. 8—17. 3dly, A wish, v. 5, 6, and 13.' SENOERT.—'Him that is weak in faith receive with kindness, not so as to increase his scrupulous surmings.' Sr. 'Bewilder him not in the discussion of abstruse and subtle controversies.' Valpy. Bl. 'To the precept, inculcating love one towards another, Paul subjoins an admirable corollary, highly necessary in those times and circumstances, . . . to prevent schism, . . . and great was the apostles' struggle to reconcile both parties, . . . and, in accommodating themselves first to one and then the other, they eminently displayed their prudence and philanthropy.' GROT. Faith.] 'Here it means a full persuasion of this thing ; the article seems put for of it ; and weak means doubtful. So the best commentators.'

V. 2—4. The apostle next proceeded to exemplify his general rule, by a particular instance.

(2.) Eateth herbs.] 'The Jews, (i. e. the Essenes, &c.) from religious scruples, the Romans and Greeks, from philosophical dogmas.' Bloomf. 'Thousands of Hindoos taste nothing which has had animal life, even an egg ; but live on herbs, roots, fruits, grain, milk, butter, and honey ; believing all who take life will go to one of the 7 hells. They appear to be as strong and as healthy as those who live on flesh. It has a distressing effect on their minds, to show them, through a microscope, the animalcules in the water they drink.' ROB. 'That it might not be said they abstained only from swine's flesh, [the converted Jews] abstained from every kind of fish. Theoph. Ammon thinks there is a reference, as in 1 Cor 8:4? BL. Paul abstains from impugning the decree of the Jerusalem council, Acts 15:20 ; and (so Theoph.) 'wisely steers a middle course' between the Jew party and the Gentile party.

V. 5. Fully persuaded in his own mind.] "'Let every man freely enjoy his own sentiment ;' and go on in his own way without impediment or censure.' DODDR. This interpretation is very ancient ; but it does not seem to be the most natural construction of the clause.—'Let a man have [such] persuasion of the lawfulness of what he doeth, or abstains from, as will preserve him from sinning against conscience in it. . . . Let him not search into the judgments and actions of other men, about these matters, to condemn them for them.' WHITBY.—'I do not agree with those, who think that the apostle meant nothing more, than that each person should be careful not to do anything with a doubting or hesitating conscience. For it is not enough, that our conscience consents to what we do ; but it is necessary, in the first place, that our conscience be certified from the Word of God.' BEZA.

(5) Some Christians abstained from flesh only on certain days. Theod., see Koppe.

6 He that <sup>f</sup> regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord; for he giveth God thanks: and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not; and giveth God thanks.

7 For <sup>g</sup> none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.

8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's.

9 For <sup>h</sup> to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.

10 But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.

f or, observeth. g 1 Pe. 4:2. h Phil. 2:9-11.

(1.) Because God hath received them; and we reflect on Him, if we reject those whom He hath received. It will be good for us to put this question to ourselves, when tempted to behave scornfully towards our brethren, to disdain and censure them; 'Has not God owned them; and if He has, dare I disown them?' 'Nay, God doth not only receive him, but hold him up, v. 4. You think, he who eateth, will fall by his presumption, or that he who eateth not, will sink under the weight of his own fears and scruples: but if they have true faith, the one in the intelligent use of his Christian liberty, and the other in the conscientious forbearance of it, they shall be held up; the one in his integrity, and the other in his comfort. This hope is built upon the power of God, for God is able to make him stand; and being able, no doubt He is willing to exert that power, for the preservation of those that are his own.'

(2.) Because they are servants to their own Master, v. 4. We reckon it a piece of ill manners, to meddle with other people's servants, and to find fault with them, and censure them. This rash judging is reproved, Jan. 3:1. under the notion of being many masters. In judging and censuring our brethren, we meddle with that which does not belong to us: we have work enough to do at home; and if we must needs be judging, let us exercise our faculty on our own hearts and ways. To his own Master he stands or falls; his doom will be according to his Master's sentence, and not according to ours. How well for us is it, that we are not to stand or fall by the judgment one of another, but by the righteous and unerring judgment of God, which is according to truth!

(3.) Because both the one and the other, if true believers, and right in the main, have an eye to God, and do approve themselves to God in what they do, v. 6.

He that makes conscience of observing

V. 6. Unto.) 'To (the honor of).'

V. 7-9. It ought to be established as an acknowledged principle, that no real Christian allows his own humor, indulgence, interest, credit, or ease, to be the end for which he lives or acts, as to the general tenor of his conduct; nor does he even avoid, desire, or meet death from selfish motives; but whether his life be prolonged, he aims to spend it to the glory of Christ; or whether death be expected, he refers it to Him, to be ordered in all respects for the glory of his own name. . . . For to this very end, Christ both died on the cross, and rose again, and liveth in heaven to die no more; that in human nature He might be the sovereign Lord of all his people, both during their lives and after their death; as they willingly devote themselves to Him, and are prompt to labor, suffer, or die for his sake; ns He orders all things respecting the time and circumstances of their death, for his own glory and their good; and as, when they die, they are taken to be with Him for ever, and He will raise their bodies to share the same felicity. 1 Cor. 6:18-20. Phil. 1:19-25.—Christ is also the Lord of all the dead, and of the living, who do not believe in Him: He spares their lives, or cuts them off by death, and executes vengeance [244]

the Jewish fasts and festivals, not imposing them on others, or laying stress on them, but willing to be, as he thinks, on the surer side, it is well. We have reason to think, because in other things he conducts himself like a good Christian, that in this also his eye is single, and that he regardeth the day unto the Lord; and God will accept of his honest intention, though he be under a mistake; for the sincerity and uprightness of the heart were never rejected for the weakness and infirmity of the head: so good a Master do we serve! On the other hand, he that regards not the day, that does not make a difference between one day and another; but esteems every day alike: he does not do it out of a spirit of opposition, contradiction, or contempt of his brother; and therefore we charitably conclude, that to the Lord he doth not regard it. He therefore makes no such difference of days, because he knows God hath made none; and therefore intends his honor in endeavoring to dedicate every day to Him.

So he that eateth, and he that eateth not, those meats which were forbidden by the ceremonial law, if he be conscientious, that is enough. Thus while both have an eye to God in what they do, and approve themselves to Him in their integrity, why should either of them be judged or despised?

Observe, Whether we eat flesh, or eat herbs, it is a thankful regard to God, the Author and Giver of all our mercies, that sanctifies and sweetens it. Bp. Sanderson, in his 34th sermon, on 1 Tim. 4:4. justly makes this observation: It appears by this, that saying grace (as we commonly call it, perhaps from 1 Cor. 10:20.) before and after meat, was the common known practice of the church, among Christians of all sorts, weak and strong: an ancient, commendable, apostolical, Christian practice, derived down from Christ's example through all the ages of the church, Mat. 14:19. 15:36. Luke 9:16. John 6:11. Mat. 26:26, 27. Acts 27:35. blessing the creatures in the name of God before we use them, and blessing the name of God for them after, both included; for blessing and giving thanks are used promiscuously.

To clear this argument against rash judging and despising, he shows how essential it is to true Christianity, to have a regard to God, and not to ourselves; which therefore, unless the contrary do manifestly appear, we must presume, concerning those that in less things differ from us. Observe his description of true Christians, taken from their end and aim, v. 7, 8. the ground of it, v. 9. [1.] Our end and aim: not self, but the Lord. We have learned to deny ourselves; that was our first lesson; None of us liveth to himself. We neither live to ourselves, nor die to ourselves, we are not our own proprietors, nor at our own disposal. The business of our lives is, not to please ourselves, but to please God. The business of our deaths, which we are every day exposed to, is, not to make ourselves talked of; and when we come to die actually, neither is that to ourselves; it is not barely that we would be unclothed, and eased of the burden of the flesh; but it is to the Lord, that we may depart, and be with Christ, may be present with the Lord. It is to the Lord, v. 8. Christ, to whom all power and judgment are committed, and in whose name we are taught, as Christians, to do everything we do, Col. 3:17. with an eye to the will of Christ as our rule, to the glory of Christ as our end, Phil. 1:21. This is true Christianity, which makes Christ all in all. So that whether we live or die, we are the Lord's, devoted to Him, depending on Him, designed and designing for Him. [2.] The ground of this, v. 9. It is grounded on Christ's absolute sovereignty and dominion, which were the fruit and end of his death and resurrection. He is the Lord of those that are living, to rule them, of those that are dead, to revive them, and raise them up. It was after He had died and risen, that He said, All power is given unto Me, Mat. 28:18. and presently He exerts that power in issuing out commissions, v. 19, 20. Now if Christ paid so dear for his dominion over souls and consciences, and has such a just and undisputed right to exercise that dominion; we must not so much as seem to invade it, or intrench upon it, by judging the consciences of our brethren, and arraigning them at our bar.

And this leads to another reason against judging and despising;

(4.) Because both the one and the other must shortly give an account, v. 10-12. Why all this elating, and contradicting, and censuring, among Christians? [It is a needless work, this judging, for] we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, 2 Cor. 5:10. Christ will be the Judge, and He has both authority and ability to determine men's eternal state according to their works, and before Him we shall stand, as persons to be tried, and to give up an account; expecting our final doom from Him, which will be eternally conclusive. To illustrate this v. 11. he quotes Is. 45:23. I have sworn by Myself; here, As I live. It is a prophecy, in general, of Christ's dominion; and here very fully applied to the judgment of the great day, which will be the highest and most illustrious exercise of that dominion. Here is a proof of Christ's godhead, He is the Lord, and He is God, equal with the Father. Divine honor is due to Him, and must be paid. It is paid to God through Him as Mediator. God will judge the world by Him, Acts 17:31. The bowing of the knee to Him, and the confession made with the tongue, are but outward expressions of inward adoration and praise. Every knee, and every tongue, either freely, or by force. All his friends, freely; made willing in the day of his power. Grace is the soul's cheerful, entire, and avowed subjection to Jesus Christ. Bowing to Him; the understanding to his truths, the will and actions to his laws, the whole man to his authority. Confessing to Him; acknowledging his glory, grace, and greatness; our own meanness and vileness, our sins, so some. All his foes are constrained, whether they will or no. When He shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see Him; then will all those promises have their accomplishment: then his foes shall be his footstool, and all his enon them as He sees good; yet the former sense seems to have been principally intended. Mat. 28:18. Acts 10:36-43. Eph. 1:15-23. Rev. 1:12-20. It is worthy of observation, that the apostle most cogently showed professed Christians, what they ought to be and do, by stating the character and aims of true believers, and by teaching them what charity would suppose, concerning their brethren who differed from them, if their conduct were in other respects consistent with their profession.—'The Lord,' evidently means Jesus Christ, in these vs.; which contain a very conclusive argument in proof of his Deity, and the next vs. undeniably confirm it; for to what mere creature can we be thus entirely devoted, without manifest idolatry, and evidently giving to another that supreme affection, which God Himself demands? 2 Cor. 5:13-15. Tit. 2:14.

V. 10-12. The apostle's transition from 'the judgment-seat of Christ,' to 'giving an account of ourselves to God,' shows how familiar it was to him, to understand the predictions uttered by JENOVAH, as the words of his divine Lord and Savior.—(11) Shall confess to God. 'I. e. shall adore and acknowledge Me as God.' Beza. 10:5-11.—'If these words, 11 For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God.

12 So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.

13 Let us not therefore judge one another any more : but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way.

14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself : but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean.

15 But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died.

emies shall lick the dust. Hence he concludes, v. 12. Every one of us shall give account of himself to God : not we for others, nor they for us : but every one for himself. We must give account how we have spent our time, how we have improved our opportunities : what and how we have done. Therefore, We have little to do, to judge others, for they are not accountable to us, nor we for them, Gal. 2:6. And we have the more to do, to judge ourselves ; and that is enough for us ; let every man prove his own work, Gal. 6: 4. let that take up his thoughts, and he that is strict in judging himself and abasing himself, will not be apt to judge and despise his brother. Let all these differences be referred to the arbitration of Christ at the great day.

(5.) Because the stress of Christianity is not to be laid on these things, nor are they at all essential to religion, either on the one side or on the other. This is his reason, v. 17, 18. which is reducible to this branch of exhortation ;

Why should you spend your zeal either for or against those things which are so minute and inconsiderable in religion? Some make it a reason, why, in case of offence likely to be taken, we should refrain the use of our Christian liberty ; but it seems directed in general against that heat about those things, which he observed on both sides. Observe here, which the prophet certainly spake of JEROVAN, . . . be well applied by the apostle to Christ ; Christ must also be the Person intended by them : for how could the apostle prove, that " every knee-must bow " to Christ, from the words of God, " to Me every knee shall bow ; " if Christ were, in his whole nature and essence, as different from that God who spake those words of Himself, as is a creature from his great Creator ? Whitby.—As I live, &c.] Neither exactly from the Sept. nor from the Heb. ; but giving the precise meaning of each. (10.) Judge.] 'Condemn. Set at nought.] Despise.' STUART.

[1.] The nature of true Christianity,

V. 13—18. The apostle assuredly knew, by the revelation of Christ, that no kind of food was any longer polluted in itself : yet if a man supposed the ceremonial distinctions to be still in force, the meat which he ate, contrary to his judgment and conscience, would be unclean to him ; he, therefore, ought to abstain, till more fully satisfied. Now, if a stronger and better informed believer induced his weaker brother, by his example and influence, to eat such things as his conscience protested against, and so to bring guilt and distress on himself ; it was obvious that he did not 'walk charitably,' loving his brother as himself. For his conduct directly tended to the ruin of one, for whom Christ died ; seeing it tempted him to sin, which naturally leads to condemnation. Jam. 1:13—15. This does not imply, that the weak brother would actually perish : but the contrast is made between the love of Christ to the weak believer, who shed his blood to save him ; and the want of love in his stronger brother, who would not abridge himself of his indulgent meal, from regard to his welfare ; but would rather prove an occasion of sin to him, and so hazard the loss of his soul, than restrain himself in the exercise of his Christian liberty.—Yet, had the apostles written in that exact, systematical style, which some affect and require ; they would scrupulously have avoided such language. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.—Christians ought then to be very careful not to use their liberty, which was good and valuable in itself, in so unguarded a manner, or with such bad effects, as might give occasion to its 'being evil spoken of:' for the privileges of the kingdom of God, no more consisted in meats and drinks, than its requirements did : so that a believer, who would use his what it is : called, The kingdom of God ; intended to rule us, a kingdom : the gospel-dispensation specially, called the kingdom of God, in distinction from the legal dispensation, Mat. 3: 2. 4:17. It consists not either in using, or in abstaining from, such and such meats and drinks. Christianity gives no rule in that case, one way or other. The matter is left at large ; every creature of God is good, 1 Tim. 4:4. So, as to other things, it is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, Gal. 5:6. 6: 15. 1 Cor. 7: 19. not being of this party and persuasion, of this or the other opinion in less things. Nothing more destructive to true Christianity than placing it in modes and forms, and circumstantial, which eat out the essentials. It is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, very comprehensive words ; might I limit the sense of them, it should be thus : As to God, our great concern is righteousness ; to appear before Him justified by the merit of Christ's death, sanctified by the Spirit of his grace. As to our brethren, it is peace ; to live in peace and love, and charity with them ; following peace with all men ; Christ came into the world, to be the great Peace-maker. As to ourselves, it is joy in the Holy Ghost ; that spiritual joy which is wrought by the blessed Spirit in the hearts of believers, which respects God as their reconciled Father, and heaven as their expected home. It is in these things to serve Christ, v. 18. to do all this out of respect to Christ Himself as our Master, to his will as our rule, and to his glory as our end : which puts an acceptableness on all our good duties. What is Christianity but the serving of Christ ? And we may well afford to serve Him, who for us and for our salvation took on Him the form of a servant.

[2.] The advantages of it. He that duly observeth these things, is acceptable to God, though He be not in everything just of our length. He is also approved of men, of all wise and good men, and the opinion of others is not to be regarded. Observe, The approbation of men is not to be slighted ; but the acceptance of God is to be desired and aimed at in the first place, because, sooner or later, God will bring all the world to be of his mind.

3. Another rule here given, is this, that in these doubtful things, every one not only may, but must, walk according to the light that God hath given him, v. 5. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind ; i. e. 'Practice according to your own judgment in those things, and leave others to do so too.' In doubtful things, it is good keeping on the sure side of the hedge. We must not pin our faith on any one's sleeve, or make the practice of others our rule ; but follow the dictates of our own understanding. To this purport he argues, v. 14. and 23. which explain this, and give us a rule not to act against the dictates,

(1.) Of a mistaken conscience, v. 14. If a thing be indifferent, so that it is not in itself a sin not to do it, if we really think it a sin, to do it, it is to us a sin, though not to others, because we act against our consciences, though mistaken and misinformed. He specifies the case in hand. Observe, [1.] His own clearness in this matter ; 'I know and am persuaded, I am fully satisfied, that nothing, no kind of meat, lies under any ceremonial uncleanness, nor is forbidden to be eaten, if it be food proper for human bodies.' Sin had brought a curse on the whole creation ; use of the creatures and dominion over them were forfeited, so that to man they were all unclean. Tit. 1: 15. In token of which, God in the ceremonial law prohibited the use of some, to show what He might have done, concerning all ; but now that Christ has removed the curse, the matter is set at large again, and that prohibition is taken away. It was not only from the revelation made to Peter in this matter, but from the tenor and tendency of the whole Gospel, and the manifest design of Christ's death in general, Paul had learned to count nothing common or unclean. This was his own clearness, and he practised accordingly. [2.] But here he gives a caution to those who had not his clearness in this matter. To him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, though it be his error, yet to him it is unclean. This particular case, thus determined, gives a general rule, That he who does a thing which he verily believes to be unlawful, however the thing be in itself, to him it is a sin. This arises from that unchangeable law of our creation, which is, that our wills, in all their choices, motions, and directions, should follow the dictates of our understandings. Not that it is in the power of any man's conscience to alter the nature of the action in itself, but only as to himself. It must be understood likewise with this proviso ; though men's judgments and opinions may make that which is good in itself, to become evil to them, yet they cannot make that which is evil in itself, to become good, either in itself or to them. If a man were verily persuaded, (it is Dr Sanderson's instance, sermon on ch. 14: 23.) that it were evil to ask his father's blessing, that misperception would make it become evil to him : but if he should be as verily persuaded that liberty, at any rate, and at all events, laid as undue a stress on the indulgence of the new dispensation, as a Jewish convert did on the ceremonial distinctions of the old one. To stand justified before God, to be at peace with Him, to possess peace in the heart and conscience, and to experience that pure joy, which the Holy Spirit communicates, are the great privileges of the kingdom of God : Mat. 3:2. 6:33,34. and to walk by faith before Him, as a reconciled Father, in righteousness, and in cheerful, holy obedience, according to the grand requirements of the moral law, by 'the sanctification of the Spirit,' is the substance of the duties of the kingdom : and he, who in such things, serves and obeys Christ, is 'acceptable to God,' and is approved before men, to be a true believer ; and should, therefore, be received as such by his brethren, without respect to difference of opinion or practice, in more doubtful matters.—To infer from hence, as some have incautiously done, that a peaceable, exemplary Christian, who is not too rigid in his sentiments, or tinctured with bigotry, will generally be esteemed and loved by mankind ; would imply a censure on Paul, on the other apostles, on the prophets, on the most eminent believers in every age, nay, on Christ Himself, as if they had not been so candid and liberal as we ought to be : for we know what favor the world showed them. But in fact, the men of the church, and not those of the world, are exclusively meant.— it were good to curse his father, that would not make it become good. The Pharisees taught people to plead conscience, when they made corban an excuse for denying relief to their parents, Mat. 15: 5, 6. But that would not serve, any more than Paul's erroneous conscience would justify his rage against Christianity, Acts 26:9. or theirs, John 16:2.

(2.) Nor must we act against the dictates of a doubting conscience. In those indifferent things, which we are sure it is no sin not to do, and yet are not clear that it is lawful to do them, we must not do them while we continue under those doubts; for he that doubteth is damned if he eat, v. 23. it turns into sin to him; he is damned, condemned of his own conscience, because he eateth not of faith, because he does that which he is not fully persuaded he may lawfully do. Here his own heart cannot but condemn him as a transgressor. Our rule is, to walk as far as we have attained, not further, Phil. 3:15, 16. For whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. Taking it in general, it is the same with that of the apostle, Heb. 11:6. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Whatever we do in religion, it will not turn to any good account, except we do it from a principle of faith, with a believing regard to the will of Christ as our rule, to the glory of Christ as our end, and to the righteousness of Christ as our plea. Here it seems to be taken more strictly; whatever is not of faith, whatever is done while we are not clearly persuaded of the lawfulness of it, is a sin against conscience.

This seems to be the meaning of that aphorism, which sounds somewhat darkly, v. 22. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he allows. Many a one allows himself in practice to do that, which yet in his judgment and conscience he condemns himself for; allows it for the sake of the pleasure, profit, or credit of it; or in conformity to custom; and yet, whilst he does it, and pleads for it, his own heart gives him the lie, and his conscience condemns him for it. Now, happy is the man who so orders his conversation, as not in any action to expose himself to the reproaches of his own conscience, as he must needs do, who does that which he is not clear he may lawfully do, 1 John 3:21.

4. Another rule here prescribed is to those who are clear in these matters, and know their Christian liberty, yet to take heed of using it so as to give offence to a weak brother. This is laid down, v. 13. 'Let it suffice, that you have hitherto continued in this uncharitable practice, and do so no more.' The better to insinuate the exhortation, he puts himself in; Let us not; as if he had said, 'It is what I have resolved against, therefore do you leave it: but judge this rather; instead of censuring the practice of others, let us look to the conduct of our own, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way.' We must take heed of saying or doing anything which may occasion our brother to stumble or fall; that may be an occasion of grief, (See Mat. 18: 6, 10.) or of guilt, to our brother. The former is a stumbling-block, that gives our brother a great shake, and is a hinderance and discouragement to him; but this is an occasion to fall. See this case explained, 1 Cor. 8:9-11. To the same purport, v. 21. he recommends it to our care, not to give offence to any one by the use of lawful things. This is to be extended to all such indifferent things, whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, is involved either in sin or in trouble: or is made weak; his graces weakened, his comforts, his resolutions. Observe the motives to enforce this caution. Consider,

(1.) The royal law of Christian love and charity, which is hereby broken, v. 15. If thy brother be grieved with thy meat, be troubled to see thee eat those things which the law of Moses did forbid, which yet thou mayest lawfully do; possibly thou art ready to say, 'Now he talks foolishly and weakly, and it is no great matter what he says.' But the reproof here is to the stronger and more knowing Christian; Now walkest thou not charitably. Thus the apostle takes part with the weakest, and condemns the defect in love, on the one side, more than the defect in knowledge on the other side; agreeably to his principles elsewhere, that the way of love is the more excellent way, 1 Cor. 12:31. 8: 1-3.

(2.) The design of Christ's death; Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died, v. 5. Drawing of a soul to sin, threatens the destruction of that soul. It notes an utter destruction. The consideration of the love of Christ in dying for souls, should make us very tender of the happiness and salvation of souls, and careful not to do anything which may obstruct and hinder it. But are any destroyed, for whom Christ died? If we understand it of the sufficiency and general intendment of Christ's death, which was to save all on Gospel terms, no doubt but multitudes are. If of the particular determination of the efficacy of his death to the elect, then, though none that were given to Christ shall perish, John 6: 39. yet thou mayest, as much as in thy power, destroy such. No thanks to thee if they be not; by doing that which hath a tendency to it, thou dost manifest a great opposition to Christ. Comp. this with 1 Cor. 8:10, 11.

(3.) The work of God, v. 20. For meat destroy not the work of God, the work of grace, particularly the work of faith in thy brother's soul.' The works of peace and comfort are destroyed by such an offence given; take heed of it therefore: do not undo that which God hath done; you should work together with God, do not counter-mine his work. Observe, The same for whom Christ died, v. 15. are here called the work of God; every saint is God's workmanship, his husbandry, his building, Eph. 2: 10. 1 Cor. 3:9. We must be very careful to do nothing which tends to the destruction of this work, either in ourselves or others. Many do for meat and drink destroy the work of God in themselves; nothing more destructive to the soul than pampering and pleasing the flesh, and fulfilling the lusts of it; so likewise in others, by wilful offence given.

(4.) The evil of giving offence, and what an abuse it is of our Christian liberty. And the apostle directs his reproof most against those who gave the offence; not as if they were not to be blamed, who causelessly and weakly took the offence; but he directs his speech to the strong, because they were better able to bear the reproof, and to begin the reformation.

For the further pressing of this rule, we may here observe two directions which have relation to it. 1st. Let not then your good be evil spoken of, v. 16. take heed of doing anything which may give occasion to others to speak evil, either of the Christian religion in general, or of your Christian liberty in particular. We must deny ourselves in many cases for the preservation of our credit and reputation; forbearing to do that which we rightly know we may lawfully do, when our doing of it may be a prejudice to our good name: as, when it is suspicious, and hath the appearance of evil; or when it is become scandalous among good people; or hath any way a brand on it. 2dly. Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God, v. 22. It is not meant of justifying faith; but of a knowledge and persuasion of our Christian liberty in things disputed. Have it to thyself, enjoy the comfort of it in thy own bosom, and do not trouble others by the imprudent use of it, when it might give offence, and cause thy weak brother to stumble and fall. Have it to thyself; a rule to thyself, not to be imposed on others, or made a rule to them; or a rejoicing to thyself. Clearness in doubtful matters contributes very much to our comfortable walking, as it frees us from those scruples, jealousies, and suspicions, which those who have not such clearness, are entangled in endlessly. Comp. Gal. 6:4. How happy were it for the church, if those that have a clearness in disputable things, would be satisfied to have it to themselves before God, and not impose those things on others, and make their terms of communion; than which nothing is more opposite to Christian liberty, nor more destructive both to the peace of churches and the peace of consciences.

than "cause him to fall from a state of salvation;" whether that fall shall be final or temporary, will depend upon his future repentance or non-repentance, [ &c. ] The circumstance, "for whom Christ died," is skilfully thrown in, to show the peculiar baseness of this conduct, since it involves a contravening of the designs of Christ in favor of one's brother.

Before God. The end of such knowledge is, that, being satisfied in our liberty, we may have a conscience void of offence toward God, and let that content us.

5. One rule more is laid down here, a general one, v. 19. Here is the sum of our duty towards our brethren. (1.) We must study mutual peace. Many wish for peace, and talk loud for it, that do not follow the things that make for peace, but the contrary. Meekness, humility, self-denial, and love, are the springs of peace; the things that make for our peace. (2.) We must study mutual edification. The former makes way for this. We cannot edify one another, while we are quarrelling and contending; but many ways we may edify one another,

PRACT. OBS. It is of great importance for us to distinguish, between those who are 'weak in faith,' and such as are strangers or enemies to the faith; for we ought to receive, and affectionately to cherish the former, but to beware of the latter, and withdraw from them. —The distinctions between meats and days were at least as important, as many things which are now controverted among us; and it was far more certain on which side the truth was found. Yet men might be real Christians, who could not receive even the apostle's determination on the controversy. Surely then we should enlarge our candor, beyond those narrow limits, which many would assign to it.—All who love the Gospel ought to shun such persons as excite divisions among those who appear to love Christ and hate sin; and such shibboleths, as tend to multiply, to perpetuate, or to exasperate them. Let us, then, cease to despise, or judge one another, especially about things which are not essential to salvation; let us beware, that we do not attempt to reject, or to cast down, those whom God has received and will uphold; or to judge and condemn his conscientious servants.—It behooves us, to remember our own unworthiness and proneness to err, and liability to be deceived through inattention, ignorance, prejudices, and corrupt passions; and the numerous instances, in which we have been entirely mistaken, when confident that we were in the right; and, endeavoring to be 'fully persuaded' in our own minds about our conduct, as regulated according to the Holy Scriptures, let us leave others to the judgment pupils, which is not so in itself. See Wayland, on Conscience. El. Mor. Sci. This [passage] will, in no respect, justify Augustin for inferring from hence, that the very best acts of the heathens were only splendid sins. For (as Mackn.) though they had not faith in any [?] the divine revelation, they might have the faith mentioned by the apostle; i. e. a firm persuasion of the lawfulness of their own actions, and an inclination to please God, by doing what they thought right and acceptable to Him. Wolf, Carpz., &c. however, make it an aphorism, extending to faith of every kind, not only historical, and of conscience, but also of doctrine; as when used of a justifying faith. But all this is more easily asserted than proved.

if we seriously mind it; by good counsel, reproof, instruction, example; and we have need to be edified; and therefore must study to promote the spiritual growth one of another. None so strong but they may be edified; none so weak, but may edify; and while we edify others, we benefit ourselves.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—4. The apostle, in this ch., continues the discourse of the former, concerning mutual forbearance in indifferent things; and so draws towards a conclusion of the epistle. He here lays down two precepts, with reasons to enforce them, showing the duty of the strong Christian to consider and condescend to the weakest.

I. We must bear the infirmities of the weak, v. 1. All have infirmities; but the weak are more subject to them than others; the weak in knowledge or grace. We must consider these; not trample on them, but encourage them, and bear with their infirmities. If through weakness they judge and censure us, and speak evil of us, we must bear with them, pity them, and not have our affections alienated from them; we must also bear their infirmities, by sympathizing with them, concerning ourselves for them, ministering strength to them, as there is occasion. That is bearing one another's burdens.

II. We must not please ourselves, but our neighbor, v. 1, 2. We must deny our own humor, in consideration of our brethren's weakness and infirmity. Not please ourselves; but please our brethren. The design of Christianity is, to soften and meek the spirit, to teach us the art of obliging and true complaisance; to comply with all that we have to do with, as far as we can with a good conscience. Christians should study to be pleasing. How amiable and comfortable a society would the church of Christ be, if Christians would study to please one another, as now we [often] see them industrious to cross, and thwart, and contradict one another!

We are to please our neighbor, not in everything, but for his good, especially for the good of his soul; for his profit, and the profit of others, to edify the body of Christ, by studying to oblige one another. Now observe the reason, why Christians must please one another; for even Christ pleased not Himself. The self-denial of our Lord Jesus is the best argument against the selfishness of Christians. Observe, of God. Let us be careful not to abuse our liberty, by an inexpedient use of things lawful, or by venturing on such as are doubtful. For sneerily, it cannot be an imitation of the love of Christ, who died for the weak as well as the strong, if we put any personal satisfaction in competition with the spiritual good of our brethren. Let us follow after all those things, which tend to peace and mutual edification; let us study a holy indifference about the most lawful earthly enjoyments, and learn to renounce whatever comes in competition with the welfare of our brethren, the peace of the church, and the glory of God. Numbers venture into places, and upon actions, against which their own consciences revolt; because they are induced by inclination, or emboldened by the example of those, who, on some account, have obtained the reputation of pious men. But whether the things themselves be lawful or not, as they cannot 'do them in faith,' as they hesitate concerning the lawfulness of them, and as they cannot heartily pray for the presence and blessing of God in them, they are condemned for indulging themselves in a doubtful case. But few are so happy, as to be quite free from self-condemnation, in everything which they allow; a sound judgment, a simple heart, a tender conscience, and habitual self-denial, are necessary for the enjoyment of this comfort; and most of us see frequent cause to condemn ourselves in this respect, and, by daily repentance, faith, and prayer, to deprecate the merited condemnation of our God. 1 Cor. 6:12—17. 8:7—13. 10:23—28. 1 Jn. 5:18—24. 'Now whatsoever things were written in ancient times, were written for our instruction; that through patience, and the admonition of the Scriptures, we might obtain hope.' Sr. Bl. understands 'hold fast our hope.'

V. 3. The reproaches, &c.] 'How inexpressible a grief and burden the sight of so much wickedness must have been to so pure and holy a mind, as that of our Lord, it is impossible for us fully to conceive: but were we more like Him, we might, and we certainly should, enter more into it, than we generally do.' Dodd. Heb. 2:16—18—The quotation is from the LXX., which exactly tr. the Heb. written, that we might know what to hope for from God, on what grounds, and in what way. This should recommend the Scripture to us, that it is a special friend to Christian hope. Patience and comfort suppose trouble and sorrow; such is the lot of the saints in this world; and were it not so, we should have no occasion for patience and comfort. But both these befriended that hope, which is the life of our souls. Patience works experience, and experience hope, that maketh not ashamed, ch. 5:3-5. The more patience we exercise under troubles, the more hopefully we may look through our troubles; nothing more destructive to hope than impatience. And the comfort of the Scriptures, that comfort which springs from the Word of God, is likewise a great stay to hope, as it is an earnest in hand of the good hoped for. The Spirit, as a Comforter, is the Earnest of our inheritance.

V. 5, 6. The apostle, having delivered two exhortations, before he proceeds to more, intermixes here a prayer for the success of what he had said. Observe,

I. The title he gives to God; the God of patience and consolation, who is both the Author and the Foundation of all the patience and consolation of the saints; from whom it springs, and on whom it is built. He is the God of patience and consolation; 1. As a God that bears with us, and comforts us; is not extreme to mark what we do amiss, but is ready to comfort them that are cast down; to teach us so to testify our love to our brethren, and by these means to preserve and maintain unity, by being patient one with another, and comfortable one to another. Or, 2. As a God that gives us patience and comfort. He had spoken, v. 4. of patience and comfort of the Scriptures; but here he looks up to God, as the God of patience and consolation: it comes through the Scripture, but from God as the fountain-head. The more patience and comfort we receive from God, the better disposed we are to love one another. Nothing breaks the peace more than an impatient, and peevish, and fretful, melancholy temper.

II. The mercy he begs of God; Grant you to be like minded one towards another, ac-

ording to Jesus Christ. 1. The foundation of Christian love and peace is laid in like-mindedness; a consent in judgment, as far as you have attained; or, however, a concord and agreement in affection. 2. This like-mindedness must be according to Christ Jesus; his precept, law, pattern, example, v. 3. Or, 'Let Christ Jesus be the Centre of unity. Agree in the truth, not in any error.' It was a cursed concord and harmony of those who were of one mind, to give their power and strength to the beast, Rev. 17:13. like the Babel-builders, who were one in their rebellion, Gen. 11:6. The method of our prayer must be, first for truth, and then for peace; for such is the method of the wisdom that is from above; it is first pure, then peaceable. That is to be like-minded according to Christ Jesus. 3. Like-mindedness among Christians, according to Christ Jesus, is the gift of God; and a precious gift it is, for which we must earnestly seek unto Him.

III. The end of his desire; that God may be glorified, v. 6. This is his plea with God in prayer, and is likewise an argument with them to endeavor it. We should have the glory of God in our eye in every prayer; therefore our first petition, as the foundation of all the rest, must be, Hallowed be thy name. Like-mindedness among Christians, is in order to our glorifying of God;

1. With one mind and one mouth. It is desirable that Christians should agree in everything, that so they may agree in this, to praise God together. It tends very much to the glory of God, who is one, and his name one, when it is so. It will not suffice, that there be one mouth, but there must be one mind; and God will scarcely be glorified, where there is not a sweet conjunction of both.

2. As the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. That is his N. T. style. God must be glorified, as He has now revealed Himself in the face of Jesus Christ. The unity of Christians glorifies God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; because it is a kind of counterpart or representation of the oneness that is between the Father and the Son. We are warranted so to speak of it, and, with that in our eye, to desire it, and pray for it, from John 17:21. That they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee: a high expression of the honor and sweetness of the saints' unity. And it follows, That the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me; and so God may be glorified as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

V. 7-12. The apostle here returns to his exhortation to Christians. What he says here, v. 7. is to the same purport with the former; but the repetition shows how much his heart was upon it. He had exhorted the strong to receive the weak, ch. 14:1. here, Receive one another. Those that have received Christ by faith, must receive all Christians by brotherly love; though poor, persecuted, and despised, though it may be matter of reproach and danger to you to receive them; though in the less weighty matters of the law they are of different apprehensions, though there may have been occasion for private piques; yet, laying aside these, and the like considerations, receive ye one another. The reason is taken, as before, from the condescending love of Christ to us; As Christ also received us, to the glory of God. Can there be a more cogent argument? Those words, to the glory of God, may refer both to Christ's receiving us, which is our pattern; and to our receiving one another, which is our practice according to that pattern.

I. Christ hath received us to the glory of God. The end of our reception by Christ, is, that we might glorify God in this world, and be glorified with Him in that to come. We are called to an eternal glory by Christ Jesus, John 17:24. See to what He received us, to a happiness transcending all comprehension; see for what He received us, for his Father's glory; He had that in his eye in all the instances of his favor to us.

II. We must receive one another to the glory of God. And nothing more conduces to his glory, than the mutual love and kindness of those that profess religion; comp. v. 6. the different apprehension they had about meats and drinks, took rise in distinction between Jews and Gentiles. Now, to prevent and make up this difference, he shows how Jesus Christ hath received both Jews and Gentiles, Eph. 2:14-16.

1. He received the Jews, v. 8. Let not any think hardly or scornfully therefore of those that were originally Jews, and still, through weakness, retain some savor of their old Judaism: for, (1.) Jesus Christ was a Minister of the circumcision. He was Himself circumcised, and made under the law, and did in his own person preach the Gospel to the Jews alone, who were of the circumcision,—this makes the nation more considerable than otherwise they appear. (2.) He was so for the truth of God. What He preached to them, was, the truth; for He came into the world to bear witness to the truth, John 18:37. And He is Himself the Truth, John 14:6. Or, for the truth of God, i. e. to make good the promises given to the patriarchs, concerning the special mercy God had in store for their seed. The best confirmation of promises is the performance of them; and when Messiah the Prince appeared, in the fulness of time, as a Minister of the circumcision, all these promises were confirmed, and the truth of them was made to appear; for in Christ all the promises of God, both those of the O. T. and those of the New, are Yea, and in Him Amen. Understanding by the promises made to the fathers, the whole covenant of grace, darkly administered under the O. T., and brought to a clearer light now under the Gospel; it was Christ's great errand to confirm that covenant, Dan. 9:27. He confirmed it by shedding the blood of the covenant.

2. He received the Gentiles likewise, v. 9-12.

(1.) Observe Christ's favor to the Gentiles, in taking them in to praise God,—the work of the church on earth, and the wages of that in heaven. One design of Christ was, that the Gentiles likewise might be converted; that they might be one with the Jews in Christ's mystical body. A good reason why they should not think the worse of any Christian for his having been formerly a Gentile; for Christ hath received him. Now observe, how their conversion is here expressed; That the Gentiles might glorify

V. 5, 6. 'Now may the God who giveth patience and admonition, give to you mutual unity of sentiment: [others understand, of minds and wills, affections.] Mouth.] Voice.' Sr. 'Grot. observes, there is here reference to the ancient doxologies and litanies.' BLOOMF.

V. 7. Receive . . . received.] 'Deal kindly with . . . dealt kindly with you, unto the glory of God.' Sr. 'This cl., if referred to "receive one another," will signify, 1. "in honor of God;" q. d. "and this your mutual love will redound to the honor of God." And so Chrys., Theoph., and many early modern comtrs. 2. It may, with most recent comtrs., be referred to what immediately preceded, i. e. "hath placed you in a state of salvation, by which you may finally attain to the glory of God." This Koppe thinks preferable, on account of v. 8 and 9, in which is declared how Christ hath promoted the glory of God, viz., by receiving Jews and Gentiles into his favor.—That this passage has a reference to church communion, has been shown by several able comtrs.; [and, in that view, deserves most serious attention.] See Doddr., Mackn., or Slade. Bl. 'That there were schismatic assemblies among them at this time, is evident from 16:17. Besides, in v. 6. he expressly enjoins them to worship God jointly in the public assemblies.' MACKNIGHT.

V. 8-13. In order to unite Jews and Gentiles in one church, and conciliate them to each other, Jesus Christ assumed his human nature among the Jews; He was 'made under the law,' and was circumcised.—(10) Rejoice, &c.] 'The Heb. interpreters tr. the original, (Deut. 32:43.) "Celebrate, O ye nations, his people." . . . Certainly the nations could not cordially extol the people as happy and blessed; unless, affected with their felicity, they acknowledged and worshipped the same God. . . . The apostle, as it were, seals all his preceding exhortations with prayers; that the Lord would bestow on them the things which he commanded.' Beza.—(9) For this cause, &c.] From the Sept. and accords to the Heb. 12 And again Esaias saith, <sup>n</sup> There shall be a root ° of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

14 And I myself also am persuaded <sup>q</sup> of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all <sup>r</sup> knowledge, able also to admonish one another.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because <sup>s</sup> of the grace that is given to me of God,

God for his mercy. A periphrasis of conversion. They shall have matter for praise, even the mercy of God. The greatest mercy of God to any people, is, the receiving of them into covenant with Himself: and it is good to notice God's mercy in receiving us. They shall have a heart for praise. They shall glorify God for his mercy: converting grace works in the soul a disposition to speak and do all to the glory of God; God intended to reap a harvest of glory from the Gentiles, who had been so long turning his glory into shame.

(2.) The fulfilling of the Scriptures in this. The favor of God to the Gentiles was not only mercy, but truth. There were many prophecies concerning them, which related to the calling of them, and the embodying of them in the church: some of which he mentions, because it was a thing the Jews were hardly persuaded to believe. Thus, by referring them to the O. T., he labors to qualify their dislike of the Gentiles, and so to reconcile the parties at variance. [1.] It was foretold, that the Gentiles should have the Gospel preached to them, 'I will confess to Thee among the Gentiles, v. 9. quoted from Ps. 18:49. Taking the words as spoken by David, they were spoken when he was old and dying, and he was not likely to confess to God among the Gentiles: but when David's Psalms are read and sung among the Gentiles, to the praise and glory of God, he that was once the sweet psalmist of Israel, is now the sweet psalmist of the Gentiles. Converting grace makes people greatly in love with David's Psalms. Taking them as spoken by Christ, the Son of David, it may be understood of his spiritual indwelling by faith in the hearts of all the praising saints. I live, yet not I, but Christ lieth in me; so, I praise, yet not I, but Christ in me. [2.] That the Gentiles should rejoice with his people, v. 10. This is quoted from that song of Moses, Deut. 32:43. The partition-wall being taken down, the Gentiles are welcome to rejoice with his people. Being brought into the church, they share in its sufferings, are companions in patience and tribulation; to recompense which, they share in the joy. [3.] That they should praise God, v. 11. This is quoted from Ps. 117:1. The Gentiles had been, for many ages, praising their idols, but now are brought to praise the Lord: and this, David in spirit speaks of. In calling on all the nations to praise the Lord, it is intimated, that they shall have the knowledge of Him. [4.] That they should believe in Christ, v. 12. quoted from Is. 11:10. Where observe, 1st. The revelation of Christ, as the Gentiles' King, here called the Root of Jesse; comp. Is. 11:1. Christ was David's Lord, and yet without his Son, Mat. 22:45. the Root and Offspring of David, Rev. 22:16. Christ, as God, was David's Root; as Man, David's Offspring. His rising to reign over the Gentiles, explains the figurative expression of the prophet, He shall stand for an Ensign of the people. 2dly. The recourse of the Gentiles to Him; In Him shall the Gentiles trust. Faith is the soul's confidence in Christ, and dependence on Him. The method of faith, is, first to seek unto Christ, as to one proposed to us for a Savior; and, finding Him able and willing to save, then to trust in Him. Or, this seeking to Him is the effect of a trust in Him; seeking Him by prayer, and pursuant endeavors.

Jews and Gentiles being thus united in Christ's love, why should they not be united in one another's love?

V. 13. Here is another prayer directed to God, as the God of hope; and, as the former, v. 5, 6, for spiritual blessings, the best blessings, and to be first and chiefly prayed for. He addresses himself to God, as the God of hope. That hope is but fancy, and will deceive us, which is not fastened on God, (as the Goodness hoped for, and the Truth hoped in,) and which is not of his working in us. We have both together, Ps. 119:49. 1 Pet. 1:3. He asks of God,

1. That they might be filled with all joy and peace in believing. Joy and peace are two of those things in which the kingdom of God consists, ch. 14:17. Joy in God, peace of conscience, both arising from a sense of our justification; see ch. 5:1, 2. Joy and peace in our own bosoms would promote a cheerful unity and unanimity with our brethren. Observe, True, heavenly, spiritual joy is filling to the soul; it has a satisfaction in it answerable to the soul's vast and just desires. Nothing more than this joy, only more of it, even the perfection of it in glory, is the desire of the soul that hath it, Ps. 4:6, 7. 36:8. 63:5. 65:4. It is attainable by prayer, and believing; true, substantial joy, is the fruit of faith. 1 Pet. 1:8. It is owing to the weakness of our faith, that we are so much wanting in joy and peace. Observe, It is all joy and peace; all sorts of true joy and peace: for such we must ask when we come to God by prayer, we must enlarge our desires; open thy mouth wide, and He will fill it.

2. That they might abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost. The joy and peace of believers, arise chiefly from their hopes. What is laid out on them, is but little, compared with what is laid up for them; therefore the more hope they have, the more joy and peace they have. Christians should desire and labor after an abundance of hope, such hope as will not make ashamed. This is through the power of the Holy Ghost. The same almighty power that works grace, begets and strengthens this hope. Our own power will never reach it; therefore where this hope is, and is abounding, the blessed Spirit must have all the glory.

V. 14—16. Here,

I. He commends these Christians with the highest characters that could be. It was not a piece of idle flattery and compliment, but a due acknowledgment of their worth, and of the grace of God in them. Paul had no personal acquaintance with them, and yet he says, he was persuaded of their excellences, only by hearsay: we must be forward to believe good concerning others: it is safer to err on that hand. Now observe, what he commended them for:

They were full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, and able to admonish one another: from their goodness therefore more likely to take in good part what he had written, and to put it in practice; especially that which relates to their union, and to the healing of their differences. Goodness and knowledge are a very rare and an excellent conjunction: the head and heart of the new man. All knowledge, all necessary knowledge, all the knowledge of those things which belong to their everlasting peace. To be able to admonish one another, a further gift is requisite, even the gift of utterance. Those that have goodness and knowledge, should communicate what they have for the use and benefit of others. How gladly would ministers leave off their admonishing work, if people were able and willing to admonish one another!

II. He clears himself from the suspicion of intermeddling needlessly with what did not belong to him, v. 15. Observe how affectionately he speaks to them; My brethren, v. 14. and again, brethren, v. 15. He calls them all his brethren, to teach them brotherly love, one to another. Probably, he wrote the more courteously to them, because, being Roman citizens, living near the court, they were more genteel, and made a better figure. He acknowledges he had written boldly in some sort; in a manner that looked like boldness and presumption, and for which some might perhaps charge him with taking too much upon him. But then consider,

1. He did it only as their remembrancer; as putting you in mind. Such humble thoughts had Paul of himself, though he excelled in knowledge; he would only pretend to remind them of that in which they had formerly been by others instructed. So Peter, 2 Pet. 1:12. 3:1.

2. He did it as the apostle of the Gentiles. It was in pursuance of his office, v. 16. Because of this grace given him, he thus laid out himself among the Gentiles, that he might not receive that grace of God in vain. Christ received, that He might give; so did Paul. Places and offices must be filled up with duty. It is good for ministers to be often remembering the grace that is given unto them of God. Paul was a minister, the minister of Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. 4:1. a minister to the Gentiles. So God had appointed him, Acts 22:21. So Peter and he had agreed, Gal. 2:7—9. He ministered the Gospel of God to the end, that the offering up, or sacrificing, of the Gentiles, might be accept-

16 That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the 'offering' up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

17 I have, therefore, whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God.

18 For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, 19 Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation:

21 But, as it is written, 'To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.'

able, that God may have the glory which would redound to his name by the conversion of the Gentiles. Observe how the conversion of the Gentiles is expressed; it is the offering up the oblation of the Gentiles: in which the Gentiles are looked upon, either, as the priests, offering the oblation of prayer and praise, and other acts of religion: or, as themselves the sacrifice offered up to God by Paul, in the name of Christ; a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, ch. 12:1. Paul preached to them, and dealt with them; but that which made them sacrifices to God, was, their sanctification; and that was not his work, but the work of the Holy Ghost. None are acceptably offered to God, but those that are sanctified: unholy things can never [as such] be pleasing to the holy God.

V. 17—21. The apostle here gives some account of himself and of his own affairs. Having mentioned his ministry and apostleship, he goes on further to magnify his office in the efficacy of it; and to mention, to the glory of God, the great success of his ministry, and the wonderful things God had done by him; for encouragement to the Christian church at Rome, that they were not alone in the profession of Christianity; but though, compared with the multitude of their idolatrous neighbors, they were but a little flock, yet, up and down the country, there were many that were their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It was likewise a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian doctrine, that it had such strange success, and was so far propagated by such weak and unlikely means; such multitudes captivated to the obedience of Christ by the foolishness of preaching. Therefore Paul gives them this account; which he makes the matter of his glorying; not vain glory, but holy, gracious glorying; which appears by the limitations; it is through Jesus Christ. Thus does he centre all his glorying in Christ; he teaches us to do so, 1 Cor. 1:31. Ps. 115:1. And it is in those things which pertain to God. The conversion of souls is one of those things that pertain to God, and therefore is the matter of Paul's glorying; not the things of the flesh.

Whereof I may glory, &c. I would rather read it; Therefore I have a rejoicing in Christ Jesus, concerning the things of God; or those things that are offered to God,—the living sacrifices of the Gentiles, v. 16. Paul would not boast of things without his line, nor take the praise of another man's work, as he might have done when he was writing to distant strangers, who perhaps could not contradict him; a faithful man dares not lie, however he be tempted; dares be true, however he be terrified.

Now, in this account of himself, we may observe,

I. His unwearied diligence and industry in his work. He was one that labored more abundantly than they all.

1. He preached in many places; from Jerusalem, even unto Illyricum, many hundred miles distant. We have, in the Acts, an account of Paul's travels. There we find him, after he was sent forth, Acts 13. laboring in Seleucia, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Lycania, ch. 13, 14. afterward travelling through Syria and Cilicia, Phrygia, Galatia, Mysia, Troas; and thence called over to Macedonia, and so into Europe, ch. 15, 16. Then at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and the parts adjacent. Illyricum is the country now called Sclavonia, bordering on Hungary. Some take it for the same with Bulgaria; others for the lower Pannonia: however, it was a great way from Jerusalem. Nor did he do his work slightly, but he fully preached the Gospel of Christ, Acts 20:27. Keeping back nothing that was necessary for them to know.

2. He preached in places that had not heard the Gospel before, v. 20, 21. He brake up fallow ground. Those who preached in Judea, had, on this account, a much easier task than Paul, who was the apostle of the Gentiles; for they entered into the labors of others, John 4:33.

Paul, being a hardy man, was called out to the hardest work; there were many instructors, but Paul was the great father; many that watered, but Paul was the great planter: he ventured the first onset in many places, and suffered greatly for it. He mentions this as a proof of his apostleship; for the office of the apostles was especially, to bring in those that were without, and to lay the foundations of the new Jerusalem; see Rev. 21:14. Not but that Paul preached in many places where others had been at work before him; but he was in care not to build upon another man's foundation, lest he should thereby disprove his apostleship, and give occasion to those who sought occasion to reflect on him: for this, he quotes Is. 52:15. The prophet has it, much to the same purport.

II. The great and wonderful success he had in this work. It was effectual to make the Gentiles obedient. The design of the Gospel is, to bring people to be obedient; it is not only a truth to be believed, but a law to be obeyed. Now how was this great work wrought?

1. Christ was the principal Agent. He does not say, 'which I worked,' but, 'which Christ wrought by me,' v. 18. Whatever good we do, it is not we, but Christ by us, that does it, Phil. 2:13. Is. 26:12. Paul takes all occasions to own this, that the whole praise might be transmitted to Christ. Paul was a very active minister; By word and deed, i. e. by his preaching, and by the miracles he wrought to confirm his doctrine; or his preaching and his living. This is according to Christ's example, who began both to do and teach, Acts 1:1. Through mighty signs and wonders: by the power, or in the strength, of signs and wonders. These made the preaching of the Word so effectual, being the appointed means of conviction, and the divine seal affixed to the gospel-charter, Mark 16:17, 18.

2. The power of the Spirit of God made this effectual, and crowned all with the desired success, v. 19. (1.) The power of the Spirit in Paul, as in the other apostles, for the working

V. 16. The minister. [A minister. Ministering.] Performing the office of a priest in respect to. Sanctified.] Purified. Sr. "That I should bestow my especial attention on the conversion of the Gentiles to the religion of Christ," seems to be the simple sense: but the apostle has here expressed himself by a formula, [full of sacrificial terms,] derived from the Jewish religion, in order thereby to impress more strongly, on the minds of the Jewish Christians, the weight and dignity of the apostolical office. He therefore does not call himself diakonos, [servant, minister,] but leitourgos, a sacred minister, a priest; which is the perpetual signification of leitourgein and its derivatives in the Gr. vers. of the N. T. (See Schl. Lex.) Nor does he say, that it is his office kērusssein, [to herald, proclaim,] but hierourgein, [sacredly administer as a priest,] the Gospel. Finally, he does not make the fruit of his labor consist in this, "that he may turn the nations or Gentiles to God, through the Holy Spirit:" but in this, "that there may be an offering of the Gentiles acceptable, sanctified, (holy, offered to God,) in the Holy Spirit," i. e. themselves be offered to God, as a victim sacred and acceptable to Him. 12:1. Kor. "But there is a more profound meaning also: and Carpz. remarks, that hierourgein ton euaggelion tou Theou means to preach the Gospel, as a priest of the N. T., that Gospel, by which men are consecrated unto God, and made living sacrifices, holy, well-pleasing to God. 12:1. Phil. 2:17. So Theoph. from Chrys. "According to the law, the sacrifices were sanctified, or made acceptable to God, by being salted and laid on the altar by the priest, Mat. 23:19. Mk. 9:49. So these idolaters, converted to the true God, were, through the apostle's labors, offered by him to God, as a free-will offering; and were sanctified, or made acceptable to God, by the influences and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which the apostle had conferred upon them. By these gifts, the Gentiles were strongly confirmed in the faith of the Gospel, and cleansed from their former impurities. This was an exercise of the priests' office, and a sanctification of the offering, far more excellent, effectual, and acceptable, than the sanctification and offering of the sacrifices of beasts prescribed in the Law." V. 18—21. From Jerusalem in a very extensive circle of several thousands of miles, even to Illyricum, on the borders of Italy, he 'had fully preached the Gospel of Christ,' and instructed large multitudes, with great accuracy, in that holy doctrine. Nor was he disposed, in general, to 'build on the foundation' laid by other ministers.—Probably, in mentioning this, he may glance on those false apostles, who crept into churches which he had planted, and endeavored to establish their own reputation and influence there, by alienating the hearts of his own converts from him, their spiritual father; while, like some in our own days, ... they built on his grand and noble foundation, an edifice of wood, and hay, and stubble. 1 Cor. 3:12. Doddr. (18) By word and deed. 'By the manner in which He hath enabled me to speak, and the things which He hath strengthened me to perform.' Id. As there is no preposition in the Greek, the clause may be rendered, 'In word and deed,' and applied, as above, to the obedience of the Gentiles; and this seems better to accord with the general language of Scripture.—(21) To whom he, &c. From the Sept. which accords to the Heb. of those miracles, Acts I:8. Or, (2.) The power of the Spirit in the hearts of those to whom the Word was preached, and who saw the miracles, making these means effectual to some, and not to others. It is the Spirit's operation that makes the difference. This is an encouragement to faithful ministers, who labor under the sense of great weakness and infirmity, that it is all one to the blessed Spirit to work by many, or by those that have no power. The same Almighty Spirit that wrought with Paul, often perfects strength in weakness, and ordains praise out of the mouth of babes and sucklings. This success which he had in preaching, is that which he here rejoices in; for the converted nations were his joy, and crown of rejoicing: and he tells them of it, not only that they might rejoice with him, but that they might be the more ready to receive the truths which he had written to them, and to own him, whom Christ had thus signally owned.

V. 22—29. Paul here declares his purpose to come and see the Christians at Rome. On this head, his matter is but common and ordinary, appointing a visit to his friends; but the manner of his expression is gracious and savory, very instructive, and for our imitation. Even our common discourse should have an air of grace; by that it will appear what country we belong to. It should seem, Paul's company was very much desired at Rome. And should the apostle of the Gentiles be a stranger, at the metropolis of the Gentile world?

I. He carefully excuses it, that he never came yet; to keep in with his friends, and prevent any exceptions against him.

1. He assures them he had a great desire to see them; not to see Rome, its pomp and splendor, the emperor's court, the philosophers and learned men there, but you, v. 23. a company of poor, despised saints in Rome, hated of the world, but loving God, and he-loved of Him, the excellent in whom He delighted, Ps. 16:3. And he had a special desire to see them, because of the great character they had in all the churches for faith and holiness; as men that excelled in virtue. This desire Paul had had for many years, and yet could never compass it. The providence of God wisely overrules the purposes and desires of men. Yet all that delight in God, have the desire of their heart fulfilled, Ps. 37:4. though all the desires in their heart be not humored.

2. He tells them, that therefore he could not come to them, because he had so much work elsewhere. For which cause, i. e. because of his labors in other countries. Observe, in this, (1.) The gracious providence of God about his ministers, casting their lot, not according to their contrivance, but according to his own purpose. Ministers purpose, and their friends purpose concerning them, but God overrules both, and orders the journeys, removes, and settlements, of his faithful ministers as He pleases. (2.) The gracious prudence of Paul, in bestowing his time and pains there, where there was most need. Had Paul consulted his own ease, wealth, and honor, the greatness of the work would never have hindered him from seeing Rome, but would rather have driven him thither, where he might have had more preferment, and taken less pains. But Paul sought the things of Christ. The Romans needed not the physician, so as other poor places that were sick and dying. While men and women were every day dropping into eternity, and their precious souls perishing for lack of vision, it was no time for Paul to trifle. It concerns us all to do that first, which is most needful. True grace teaches us to prefer that which is necessary before that which is unnecessary, Luke 10:41, 42. And Christian prudence teaches us, to prefer that which is more necessary, before that which is less so. This, Paul mentions as a sufficient, satisfying reason. We must not take it ill of our friends, if they prefer necessary work, which is pleasing to God, before unnecessary visits and compliments, which may be pleasing to us. In this, as in other things, we must deny ourselves.

II. He promised to come and see them shortly, v. 23, 24, 29. Having no more place in these parts, i. e. in Greece, where he then was. The whole of that country being more or less leavened with the savor of the Gospel, and pastors settled, Paul had little more to do there. He was one that went through with his work, and yet then did not think of taking his ease, but set himself to contrive more work. Observe,

1. How he forecasted his intended visit. He would see them on his way to Spain. It appears by this, Paul intended to plant Christianity even there: whether ever he fulfilled this purpose, is not certain. Many of the best expositors think he did not, but was hindered in this, as he was in others of his purposes. He did indeed come to Rome, but he was brought thither a prisoner, and whether he went after is uncertain: but several of his epistles which he wrote in prison, intimate his purpose to go eastward, and not toward Spain.

But, observe his prudence in what he proposed, I trust to see you: not, 'I am resolved I will,' but, 'I hope I shall.' We must purpose all our purposes, and make all our promises, in like manner, with a submission to the Divine Providence; not boasting ourselves of to-morrow, because we know not what a day may bring forth, Prov. 27:1. Ja. 4:13—15.

2. What he expected in this intended visit: that they would bring him on his way toward Spain, then a province of the empire, well known to the Romans, who had a great correspondence with it; therefore they might be helpful to Paul in his voyage thither; and not only out of respect to him, but out of respect to the souls of those poor Spaniards, Paul was going to preach to. What Paul desired, was, their company and conversation. He intimates, he intended to make some stay with them, for he would be filled with their company; not just look at them, and away: and yet he thinks their converse so pleasant, he should never have enough of it; it is but somewhat filled, he should leave them with a desire of more. The communion of saints, in this world, is but partial. He expected, v. 29. to come in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ. Observe, Concerning what he expected from them he speaks doubtfully, I trust, &c. But concerning what he expected from God, he speaks confidently. It was uncertain whether he should come or no, but I am sure when I do come, I shall come in the fulness, &c. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. Comp. ch. 1:11. That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift. When Paul would raise their expectation of something great and good in his coming, he directs them to hope for the blessing of the Gospel, spiritual blessings, knowledge, and grace, and comfort. When ministers are fully prepared to give out, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy.

III. He gives them a good reason why he could not come and see them now; because he had other business on hand, which required his attendance, upon which he must first make a journey to Jerusalem, v. 25—28. He gives a particular account of it, to show the excuse was real. He was going to Jerusalem, as the messenger of the church's charity to the poor saints there.

1. Concerning this charity itself. He speaks of that on this occasion,—probably, to excite the Roman Christians to do the like, according to their ability. Examples are moving, and Paul was very ingenious at begging, not for himself, but for others.

(1.) It was intended for the poor saints at Jerusalem, v. 26. It is no strange thing for saints to be poor. It seems, those at Jerusalem were poorer than other saints, either, because the wealth of that people in general was now declining, as their utter ruin was hastening on; or, because the famine that was over all the world, in the days of Claudius Cesar, did in a special manner prevail interpreters,) to the apostle's own case. This quotation exactly agrees with the Sept.; but in the Heb. there is nothing for peri autou [respecting Him].

V. 22—29. It is not known, whether the apostle ever accomplished his intended journey into Spain. But as Clement, writing from Rome, in the first century, said that he preached... to the utmost bounds of the west; it is most probable he did. He, however, went to Rome in a far different manner than he had proposed. Acts 21:—28:—(25) I go unto Jerusalem. Here at length... but fetched from three different writings, we have obtained the several circumstances, ... which the epistle to the Romans brings together; viz. a contribution in Achaia for the Christians at Jerusalem; a contribution in Macedonia for the same purpose; and an approaching journey of Paul to Jerusalem. We have these circumstances, each by some hint in the passage in which it is mentioned, or by the date of the writing in which the passage occurs, fixed to a particular time; and we have that time, turning out, on examination, to be in all the same; namely, towards the close of Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece. Paley.—This fixes the writing of this epistle to a particular part of the narrative of the apostle's labors; but there is some difficulty, in determining in what year those events took place. Some date them A. D. 53, others A. D. 60, or 61. Sc.

(23.) Place.] 'There being no longer any sufficient or urgent occasion for my ministerial labors.'

(24.) 'Whenever I may go into Spain, I hope, as I pass on, to see you, and to be sent on my way thither, when I am in part first satisfied with your company.' Sr. 'After I have been partly refreshed.' Bl. 'The Roman Catholics maintain, not only that this contemplated journey to Spain (where we may perhaps allow them simply, that James first planted the Gospel) was made by Paul, but that he staid there two years. "Writers of the most credit (as Origen and Eusebius), do not mention the journey, even where they might have been expected to;" says Koppe. But he has not proved that the ancient fathers, (as Clem. Rom., Hippol., Athan., and Chrys.) spoke from mere opinion, founded on the present passage; and Theod. usually draws from very pure sources. To me, it appears highly probable, that Clem. Rom., Theod., and the others, had positive authority, now lost, for their assertion, [that Paul did take this journey.] I know not how else to account for so general a persuasion of it, as is found in the early ecclesiastical writers.'

(25.) Minister unto.] 'Supply the wants of.'

27 It hath pleased them, verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When, therefore, I have performed this, and have sealed to them this <sup>k</sup> fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am sure that, when <sup>l</sup> I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the <sup>m</sup> love of the Spirit, that ye strive <sup>n</sup> together with me in your prayers to God for me; in Judea, a dry country; and God having called the poor of this world, the Christians smarted most by it. This was the occasion of that contribution, mentioned Acts 11:28—30. Or, because the saints at Jerusalem suffered most by persecution; for, of all people, the unbelieving Jews were most inveterate in their rage and malice against the Christians, wrath being come on them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2:16. The Christian Hebrews are particularly noted as having had their goods spoiled, Heb. 10:34. in consideration of which this contribution was made for them; this example here should teach us, as we have ability, and as there is occasion, to stretch out the hand of our charity to all of the household of faith, though in places distant from us: in personal instances of poverty, every church should maintain their own poor, yet sometimes, when more public instances of poverty are presented as objects of our charity, though a great way off from us, we must extend our bounty.

31 That <sup>o</sup> I may be delivered from them that <sup>p</sup> do not believe in Judea; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints;

(2.) It was collected by them of Macedonia, the chief of whom were the Philippians; and Achaia, the chief of whom were the Corinthians; two flourishing churches, though yet in their infancy, newly converted to Christianity. And I wish the observation did not hold, that people are commonly more liberal at their first acquaintance with the Gospel, than afterward; that, as well as other instances of the first love, and the love of the espousals, being apt to cool and decay after a while. It seems, they of Macedonia and Achaia were rich and wealthy, while they at Jerusalem were poor and needy; Infinite Wisdom ordering it so, that some should have what others want, and so this mutual dependence of Christians one on another might be maintained for mutual benefit.

It pleased them. This intimates, how ready they were to it; they were not pressed or constrained to it, but they did it of their own accord; and how cheerful they were in it, they took a pleasure in doing good; and God loves a cheerful giver. To make a certain contribution, a communication; in token of the communion of saints, and their fellow membership; as in the natural body one member communicates to the relief, and succor, and preservation of another, as there is occasion. Everything that passes between Christians, should be a proof and instance of that common union which they have one with another in Jesus Christ. Time was, when the saints at Jerusalem were on the giving hand, and very liberal they were, when they laid their estates at the apostle's feet for charitable uses, and took special care that the Grecian widows should not be neglected in the daily ministration, Acts 6:1, &c. And now that the providence of God had turned the scale, and made them necessitous, they found the Grecians kind to them; for the merciful shall obtain mercy.

(3.) What reason there was for it, v. 27. And their debtors they are. Alms are called righteousness, Ps. 112:9. Being but stewards of what we have, we owe it there where our great Master orders us to dispose of it: but here there was a special debt owing; the Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From the stock of Israel came Christ Himself, the prophets, and apostles, and first preachers of the Gospel; also the lively oracles, and the law out of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, therefore their duty is, they are bound in gratitude, to minister unto them in carnal things: it is the least they can do: to minister as unto God in holy things; so the word signifies. A conscientious regard to God, in works of charity and almsgiving, makes them an acceptable service and sacrifice to God, and fruit abounding to a good account. Paul mentions this, probably, as the argument he had used with them to persuade them to it, and it is an argument of equal cogency to other Gentile churches.

2. Concerning Paul's agency in this business. He could himself contribute nothing; silver and gold he had none, but lived on the kindness of his friends; yet he ministered unto the saints, v. 25. by stirring up others, receiving what was gathered, and transmitting it to Jerusalem. Paul's labor in this work is not to be interpreted as any neglect of his preaching-work; nor did Paul leave the Word of God, to serve tables; for beside that, Paul had other business in this journey, to visit and confirm the churches, and took this by the by; this was indeed a part of the trust committed to him, in which he was concerned to approve himself faithful, Gal. 2:10. Paul was one that laid out himself to do good every way, like his Master, to the bodies as well as the souls of people. Ministering to the saints is good work, and not below the greatest apostles. This, Paul had undertaken, therefore he resolves to go through with it, before he fell on other work, v. 28. He calls the alms, fruit, for it is one of the fruits of righteousness; it sprang from the root of grace in the givers, and redounded to the benefit and comfort of the receivers. And his sealing of it intimates his great care about it, that what was given might be kept entire, and not embezzled, but disposed of according to the design of the givers: an excellent pattern.

V. 30—33. Here we have,

1. Paul's desire of a share in the prayers of the Romans for him, expressed very earnestly, v. 30—32. Paul was a great apostle, yet begged the prayers of the meanest Christians, not here only, but in several other of the epistles. He speaks like one that knew himself, and would hereby teach us how to value the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous. How careful should we be, lest we do anything to forfeit our interest in the love and prayers of God's praying people!

1. Observe why they must pray for him. He might suspect they would forget him, having no personal acquaintance with him; therefore he urged them very closely, and begs it with the most affectionate obtestations, by all that is sacred and valuable; I beseech you, (1.) 'For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake; I am going about his work, and his glory is interested in the success of it: if you have any regard to Jesus Christ, and to his cause and kingdom, pray for me.' (2.) 'For the love of the Spirit. As a proof and instance of that love which the Spirit works in the hearts of believers one to another, pray for me; as a fruit of that communion which we have one with another by the Spirit, though we never saw one another.'

2. How they must pray for him; strive together. Those that would prevail in prayer, must strive in prayer. True love to our brethren should make us as earnest for them, as sense of our own need makes it for ourselves: He did not intend to excuse his praying for himself; no: 'Strive together with me, who am wrestling with God daily, on my own and my friends' account.' Paul and these Romans were distant in place, and likely to be so, yet they might join together in prayer.

3. What they must beg of God for him. He recommends himself to their prayers, with reference to three things. (1.) The dangers he was exposed to. The unbelieving Jews were the most violent enemies Paul had, and most enraged against him, and some prospect he had of trouble from them in this journey: therefore they must pray that God would deliver him. This prayer was answered in several remarkable deliverances of Paul, recorded Acts 21:22, 23, 24. (2.) His services; Pray, that my service which I have for Jerusalem, may be accepted of the saints. Why, was there any danger it would not be accepted? Can money be otherwise than acceptable to the poor? Yes, there was some ground of suspicion in this case; for Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and as the unbelieving Jews looked spitefully at him, which was their wickedness, so those that believed, were shy of him on that account, which was their weakness. (3.) His journey to them, v. 32. That I may come unto you with joy. If his present journey to Jerusalem proved unsuccessful, his intended journey to Rome would be uncomfortable. If he should not do good, and prosper, in one visit, he thought he should have small joy of the next; may come with joy, by the will of God. All our joy depends on the will of God. The comfort of the creature is in everything according to the disposal of the Creator.

II. Here is another prayer of the apostle for them, v. 33. The Lord of hosts, the God of battle, is the God of peace, the Author and Lover of peace. He describes God under this title here, because of the divisions

I answer they might desire his prayers, as he did theirs, by a letter directed to him to pray for them. He adds, If they might desire his prayers for them when living, why not when dead, and reigning with Christ? They who have the fountain, cannot want any of the streams. With you all; both weak and strong. To dispose them to a nearer union, he puts them all together in this prayer. Those who are united in the blessing of God, should be united in affection one to another.

CHAP. XVI. Paul is now concluding this epistle, and does it with great affection. As in the main body of the epistle he appears

PRACT. OBS. The powerful of this world often domineer over the weak, but it ought not to be so in the church of Christ; Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27. on the contrary, every one, in proportion as he is strong in faith and grace, should be tender, patient, and compassionate to the feeble-minded, to those 'who are compassed with infirmities;' perplexed in their views; harassed with scruples, doubts, and temptations; and unable to enjoy the peace and comfort of the Gospel, while they appear to walk in the obedience of it. He is the most advanced Christian, who is most conformed to Christ, and most willing to renounce his own ease or indulgence, and to endure reproach and suffering, after his example, and in prosecution of that great design, for which He shed his blood: and if, in doing this, he be reviled by zealots and uncharitable bigots, he may, with humble accommodation, use the Redeemer's words; 'the reproaches of them that reproach Thee, are fallen upon me.' For whatever is written, either in the O. or the N. T., is intended for our instruction, and may be applied to our case, for direction and encouragement; that, by patient faith, persevering obedience, and comfort derived from the Word of God, 'we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life as given to us in Jesus Christ.' The whole plan of redemption is so formed, that it is suited to reconcile us to one another, as well as to our gracious God; and we may say of every contention among Christians, 'An enemy hath done this.'—If we would have 'the God of hope to fill our hearts with all peace

It would be difficult, perhaps, to give a good reason for the discontinuance of these orders; especially, now female education is so much more attended to than it then was. Ep. Church which is at Cenchrea. 'Nothing remains of the ancient Cenchrea (now, 1829), except the foundations of houses, and a part of the mole that defended the harbor; the spot is uninhabited. Calamakl, near which were the Isthmian games, is the port of entry for the head of the Gulf of Ægina; but the government of Greece gave Dr. Howe (as agent of the American Greek Committees) about 3,500 acres, including the port of Cenchrea, on which to found a colony, (called Washingtonia,) of such Greek families as were deprived, by the revolution, of home and livelihood; furnishing them, by means derived from America, with habitations, seed-corn, working-cattle, and agricultural implements. The superintendent aims to set an example of a regularly built village, and to have been a very knowing man, so in these appurtenances of it he appears to have been a very loving man. So much knowledge and so much love are a very rare, but a very excellent and amiable composition: for what is heaven, but knowledge and love made perfect? It is observable, how often Paul speaks as if he were concluding, and yet takes fresh hold again. One would have thought that solemn benediction which closed the foregoing ch. should have ended the epistle; and yet here he begins again, and in this ch. repeats the blessing, v. 20. And yet he has something more to say; nay, again he repeats the blessing, v. 24. and yet has not done; an expression of his tender love: speaking him loth to part.

V. 1—16. Here we have such remembrances as are usual in letters between friends; and yet Paul, by the savoriness of his expressions, sanctifies these common compliments.

I. Here is the recommendation of a friend, by whom, so some, this epistle was sent,—one Phebe, v. 1, 2. it should seem, a person of quality and estate, who had business which called her to Rome, where she was a stranger; and, therefore, Paul recommends her to the acquaintance of the Christians there: an expression of his true friendship to her. Sincere courtesy and Christianity, agree well together.

1. He gives a very good character of her. (1.) As a sister, not in nature, but in grace; loving Paul, and beloved of him, with a pure, and chaste, and spiritual love, as a sister in Christ Jesus, Gal. 3:28. Both Christ and his apostles had some of their best friends among the devout (and on that account honorable) women. (2.) As a servant to the church at Cenchrea, a servant by office, a stated servant, not to preach the Word, (that was forbidden to women,) but in acts of charity and hospitality; one of the widows, so some, that ministered to the sick, and were taken into the church's number, 1 Tim. 5:9. Cenchrea was a small, seaport town, adjoining to Corinth, about twelve furlongs distant. Some think there was a church there, distinct from that at Corinth; [so Scott]; though, being so near, it is very probable the church of Corinth is called the church of Cenchrea, because their place of meeting might be there, perhaps at Phebe's house, on account of the great opposition to them in the city, Acts 18:12. as at Philippi they met out of the city by the water-side, Acts 16:13. (3.) As a succorer of many, and particularly of Paul, v. 2. a good copy for women that have ability. Observe, Paul's gratitude in mentioning her particular kindness to him; and to myself also. Acknowledgment of favors is the least return we can make. It was much to her honor, that Paul left this on record; for wherever this epistle is read, her kindness to Paul is told for a memorial of her.

2. He recommends her to their care and kindness, as one worthy to be noticed with peculiar respect; 'Receive her in the Lord. Entertain her, bid her welcome.' This pass, under Paul's hand, could not but recommend and joy in believing;' (and we can have no abiding holy joy and peace in any other way;) if we would 'abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost;' we must rely on and pray for the teaching and influences of that divine Agent; and we must be careful neither to grieve Him, by our evil tempers or sinful passions, nor to quench his sacred fire, by negligence, or procrastination; for thus we often bring darkness and discouragement on ourselves.—We should also hope the best of others, and commend what is good in their conduct.—It is indeed an honor to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and for Him to 'work by us, in those things which pertain to God,' and in rendering sinners 'obedient in word and deed.' But the whole glory must ultimately be referred to Him; ostentation should carefully be avoided in speaking on such subjects; and it is seldom expedient to mention ourselves, except as we want to obviate men's prejudices against our ministry, when they impede our usefulness.—There is a blessing, 'a fulness of blessing, in the Gospel of Christ,' which we should expect to know and to communicate, but with which numbers are totally unacquainted, and which most of us experience in a degree far beneath what the primitive believers did: especially the degree, in which the preaching and labors of ministers at present are blessed to the conversion of sinners, and the edifying, and rejoicing, and fruitfulness of believers, compared with that of former times, is lamentably small. We should, therefore, 'strive,' nay wrestle, 'together in our prayers' for each other. SCOTT.

well cultivated farms; and several houses have been erected, and a quantity of ground, on the site of the ancient Cenchrea, has been converted into a plantation of cotton. 36 to 50 families, who arrived poor, hungry, and naked, were prosperously settled in 1829. The surplus of this year's crop, says Dr. H. "will support a hospital of 50 beds; in 10 years we shall probably have 1000 souls; a large hospital will be supported; and a useful example given to the rest of Greece, of improved agriculture: the people around begin to appreciate the establishment. Our school is rapidly filling from the neighboring hamlets." Rev. Dr. Anderson. 'Observations on the Peloponnesus,' &c. Ed.

(2.) 'That ye may receive her as being in the Lord.' STUART. V. 3, 4. 'Priscilla and Aquila had originally been inhabitants of Rome. (Acts 18:2) . . . They were connected, therefore, with the place to which the salutations were sent. . . . Paul became acquainted with them at Corinth, during his first visit into Greece. They accompanied him on his return into Asia; were settled for some time at Ephesus; (Acts 18:18—26.) and appear to have been with Paul when he wrote from that place 1 Cor. (1 Cor. 16:19.) Not long after, . . . he went from Ephesus into Macedonia, and after "he had gone over those parts," proceeded from thence on his second visit into Greece; during which visit, or rather at the conclusion of it, this epistle was written. . . . We have, therefore, the time of Paul's residence at Ephesus, after he had written to the Corinthians; the time taken up by his progress through Macedonia; and his three months' abode in Greece; we have the sum of these three periods allowed for Aquila and Priscilla going back to Rome, so as to be there when the epistle was written. Now what this leads us to observe, is, the danger of scattering names and circumstances in writings like the present; how implicated they often are with dates and places; and that nothing but truth can preserve consistency. Had the notes of time in this epistle fixed the writing of it to any date, prior to Paul's first residence at Corinth, the salutation of Aquila and Priscilla would have contradicted the history; because it would have been prior to his acquaintance with these persons. If the notes of time had fixed it during that residence at Corinth; during his journey to Jerusalem, when he first returned out of Greece; or during his progress through the Lesser Asia, on which he proceeded to Antioch; an equal contradiction would have been incurred; because it appears, Acts 18:2—26. that during all this time, they were either with Paul, or abiding at Ephesus. Lastly, had the notes of time in this epistle, which we have seen to be perfectly her to any Christian church. Assist her in whatsoever business she has need of you. It becomes Christians to be helpful one to another in their affairs, especially to be helpful to strangers; for we are members one of another.

II. Here are commendations and salutations to some particular friends among those to whom he wrote, more than in any other of the epistles, in divers of which there is something observable.

1. Concerning Aquila and Priscilla, a famous couple, that Paul had a special kindness for: originally of Rome, these were banished thence by the edict of Claudius, Acts 18:2. He calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus; by private instructions, and converse, furthering the success of Paul's public preaching; one instance whereof we have in their instructing of Apollos, Acts 18:26. Nay, they did not only do much, but ventured much, for Paul; they have for my life laid down their own necks. Paul was in great danger at Corinth, while he sojourned with them; but they sheltered him, though they thereby made themselves obnoxious to the enraged multitude, Acts 18:12, 17. It was a good while ago they had done Paul this kindness; yet he speaks as sensibly of it, as if it had been but yesterday. Paul mentions this, to engage the Christians at Rome to be more kind to Aquila and Priscilla. He sends likewise greeting to the church in their house, v. 5. Perhaps a congregation of Christians used to meet at their house at stated times; and then, no doubt, it was, like the house of Obed-Edom, blessed for the ark's sake. Others think, the church was no more than a religious, pious, well-governed family, that kept up the worship of God. [Splendid and large churches were built when religion became more corrupt: the less promiscuous the congregation, the more edifying the meeting. Ed.] When Priscilla and Aquila were at Ephesus, though but sojourners there, yet there also they had a church in their house, 1 Cor. 16:19. A truly godly man will be careful to take religion along with him, wherever he goes. When Abraham removed his tent, he renewed his altar, Gen. 13:18.

2. Concerning Epenetus, v. 5. He calls him his well-beloved. Endearing language should pass among Christians, to express love, and to engage love. So he calls Amplias, beloved in the Lord, with true Christian love, for Christ's sake; and Stachys, his beloved: a sign that Paul had been in the third heaven, he was so much made up of love. Of Epenetus it is further said, he was the first-fruits of Achaia unto Christ: not only one of the most eminent, but one of the first converted to the faith of Christ; one that was offered up to God by Paul, as the first-fruits of his ministry there; an earnest of a great harvest; for in Corinth, the chief city of Achaia, God had much people, Acts 18:10. The household of Stephanas is likewise said to be the first-fruits of Achaia, 1 Cor. 16:15. Perhaps Epenetus was one of that household.

3. Concerning Mary, and some others who were laborious in that which is good; Some think this Mary had been at some of those places where Paul was, though now removed to Rome, and had personally ministered to him; others think, Paul speaks of her labor as bestowed on him, because it was bestowed on his friends and fellow-laborers, and he took what was done to them as done to himself.

4. Concerning Andronicus and Junia, v. 7. Some take them for a man and his wife, which the original will bear; and, considering the name of the latter, is more probable than that they should be two men, as others think, and brethren. Observe, They were Paul's cousins, akin to him; as Herodion, v. 11. Religion does not take away, but rectifies, sanctifies, and improves, our respect to our kindred; engaging us to lay out ourselves most for their good, and to rejoice in them the more, when we find them related to Christ by faith. They were his fellow-prisoners. Partnership in suffering, sometimes does much to unite souls and knit affection. We do not find in the Acts, any imprisonment of Paul before the writing of this epistle, but that at Philippi, Acts 16:23. But Paul was in prisons more frequent, 2 Cor. 11:23. in some of which, it seems, he met with his friends Andronicus and Junia. They were of note among the apostles; not so much, perhaps, because persons of estate and quality, as because eminent for knowledge, gifts, and graces, which made them famous among the apostles. Who also were in Christ before me, i. e. were converted to the Christian faith. How ready was Paul to acknowledge in others any kind of precedency!

5. Concerning Apelles, who is here said to be approved in Christ, v. 10. a high character!

6. Concerning Aristobulus and Narcissus; notice is taken of their household, v. 10, 11. Those of their household which are in the Lord, (as it is limited, v. 11.) that were Christians. How studious was Paul to leave none out of his salutations, that he had any knowledge of or acquaintance with! Aristobulus and Narcissus themselves, some think, were absent, or lately dead; others think they were unbelievers; so Pareus: and some think this Narcissus was the same with one of that name, who is frequently mentioned in the life of Claudius, as a very rich man that had a great family, but was very wicked and mischievous. It seems then, there were some good servants, or other retainers, even in the family of a wicked man; a common case, 1 Tim. 6:1. Comp. v. 2.

7. Concerning Rufus, v. 13. chosen in the Lord; a choice Christian, whose gifts and graces did evidence that he was eternally incidental, compared with the notes of time in 1 Cor., fixed this epistle to be either contemporary with that, or prior to it, a similar contradiction would have ensued; first, because, when 1 Cor. was written, Aquila and Priscilla were along with Paul, 1 Cor. 16:19, and because, 2dly, the history does not allow us to suppose, that between the time of their becoming acquainted with him, and the writing of that epistle, . . . they could have gone back to Rome, so as to have been saluted in an epistle to that city; and then have come to Paul at Ephesus, so as to be joined with him, in saluting the church at Corinth. As it is, all things are consistent. Paley.—This passage is transcribed chiefly to give the less learned reader an idea and a specimen of the manner, in which able critics can, almost in all cases, detect literary forgeries, and establish the authenticity of ancient writings. This is peculiarly needful, in an age of bold infidelity; in which the most confident assertions are made, and suppositions advanced, without the shadow of proof; as if a literary forgery were attended with little difficulty, or danger of detection; when in fact it is nearly the most difficult thing, which can possibly be attempted, and scarcely ever escapes detection.

(3.) Helpers.] Sunergos: 'Fellow-laborers.' Sr. 'So Phil. 2:25. 1 Th. 3:2. and often in Paul's epistles. It is thought by Vitr. and Schoett., that as the whole liturgy of the Jewish church was prescribed by the Christians, they also retained the titles of the ministers of the Word, except that of Rabbi, abolished by Christ Himself. "Now among these (continue they) is chrb, fellow-colleague, which meant one who had been advanced to the dignity of Rabbi; but, out of modesty, did not assume the name, till after the death of those who had advanced him to the honor. Thus, here, Aquila and Priscilla are called chrbym, since the title apostle, they could not, neither wished to assume." The learned contrs. then adduce many examples, which prove the existence of such an office in the Jewish church, but by no means sufficient to countenance their notion, that Paul here intended to invest Aquila and Priscilla with a title of ecclesiastical dignity. Nor is there any proof that sunergos was the word by which the chrb was expressed: and as in the other passages of the N. T. where sunergos occurs, there is no vestige of such an allusion, so I cannot think there is any here; and I can only see, in the notion, that too great fondness for system and hypothesis which distinguished Light., Vitr., Rhenford, Schoett., and has more or less all, who have dedicated themselves to any confined branch of study, as that of the Rabbinical writers.'

(4.) Necks, &c.] 'Strong and hyperbolic: lit. submitted their necks to the sword, [the usual mode of decapitation].'Bl. St. tr. 'Who exposed themselves to great danger in my behalf?' Perhaps Acts 13 or 19. is referred to. Give thanks.] 'Am grateful.' St.

V. 5. The words tr. 'greet' and 'salute,' are the same in the original (3).

(5.) House.] 'There is reason to think, the Christians would scarcely yet be allowed the privilege of having public buildings for religious worship. Comp. Acts 20:20.' Bl. Of Achaia. 'Of Asia.' 'So several ancient MSS. and some editions and fathers, also Grot., Mill, Beng., Whit., Kop., Ros., Griesb. Indeed, it is so supported, by external and internal evidence, that there is every probability it is the true reading.' Bl.

V. 6—15. It is not known what Mary this was (6); or in what respect she had 'bestowed much labor' on the apostle and his friends. Of the persons mentioned [after Andronicus and Junia], nothing certain is known.—Probably Aristobulus was not a Christian. [But see the British tradition of him in Taylor's Calm.] Rufus seems to have been the son of Simon the Cyrenian.—It is remarkable, that the apostle, amidst all his engagements, should be so well acquainted with the names and characters of many Christians, residing in a city which he had never visited. Most of them, indeed, were such as he had previously been acquainted with; and they formed but a small part of the believers at Rome. Yet this shows his indefatigable diligence, and his attention to everything relative to the churches of the Gentiles. Xenophon states it as peculiarly admirable in Cyrus, that he so knew all the officers of his numerous army, that, in giving his orders, he addressed each of them by name; and that he made it his study, to be able to do this.—Paul's not mentioning Peter, powerfully militates against all the traditions of antiquity respecting Peter, on which so enormous a fabric of usurpation and superstition has been erected.

(7.) Junia.] 'A wife or sister of Andronicus?' Bl., though St. tr. 'Junias, masc. Ed. Fellow-prisoners.' [Clemens Rom. says, Paul was 7 times imprisoned. Apostles.] Whit., Kop., &c. take it to mean, they were eminent teachers, apostolos being sometimes used in the lower sense; as in 2 Cor. 8:23. Phil. 2:25. But there (in both) the article is not chosen in Christ Jesus; one of a thousand for integrity and holiness. And his mother and mine; his mother by nature, and mine by Christian love and spiritual affection; as he calls Phebe his sister, and teaches Timothy to treat the elder women as mothers, 1 Tim. 5:2.

8. Concerning the rest, this is observable, that he salutes the brethren which are with them, v. 14. and the saints which are with them, v. 15. with them in family relations, with them in the bond of Christian communion. Lest any should find themselves aggrieved, as if Paul had forgotten them, he concludes with the remembrance of the rest, as brethren and saints, though not named. Among all these to whom Paul sends greeting, here is not a word of Peter; which gives occasion to suspect that he was not bishop of Rome, as the papists say he was; for if he was, we cannot but suppose him resident: or however, how could Paul write so long an epistle to the Christians there, and take no notice of him?

Lastly, He concludes with the recommendation of them to the love and embraces one of another; Salute one another with a holy kiss, a chaste kiss, in opposition to that which is wanton; a sincere kiss, in opposition to that which is treacherous and dissembling, as Judas', when he betrayed Christ with a kiss. He adds, in the close, a general salutation to them all, in the name of the churches of Christ, v. 16. This is one way of maintaining the communion of saints.

found, as here, which, I think, determines it to mean apostle in the high-sense: and so most commentators.

(15.) Julia.] 'Wife or sister of Philologus?' BL. 'Julias.' STUART.

V. 16. An holy kiss.] This expression of spiritual affection, to which the apostle exhorted them, in order to show that his epistle had produced its intended effect in promoting mutual love among them, has been supposed to have been used by men and women separately [i. e. men kissing men, women, women]; yet, as it seems afterwards to have been laid aside, because of abuse or slander, that opinion, perhaps, is groundless, and rather the effect of modern ideas of propriety, resulting from licentious refinement, than suited to the pure simplicity of those primitive times.—The apostle further informed them, that the several churches of Christ, which he had visited, desired to express their affectionate regard to them.

(16.) Kiss.] 'On this, much has been written by Grot., Whit., &c. who trace it to ancient oriental custom. and one borrowed from the synagogue. It appears, that in the apostolic age, the kiss was given to each

V. 17—20. The apostle having endeavored by his endearing salutations to unite them together, it was not improper to subjoin a caution, to take heed of those whose principles and practices were destructive to Christian love. And we may observe,

I. The caution itself, which is given in the most obliging manner that could be; I beseech you, brethren. He does not will and command, as one that lorded it over God's heritage, but, for love's sake, beseeches. How earnest, how endearing, are Paul's exhortations! He teaches them,

1. To see their danger; Mark them which cause divisions and offences. Our Master had Himself foretold, that divisions and offences would come; but had entailed a woe on those by whom they come, Mat. 18:7. against such we are here cautioned. Those who burden the church with dividing and offending impositions, who uphold and enforce those impositions, who introduce and propagate dividing and offending notions, which are erroneous or justly suspected; who, out of pride, ambition, affectation of novelty, or the like, causelessly separate from their brethren, and by perverse disputes, censures, and evil surmises, alienate the affections of Christians one from another; these cause divisions and offences, contrary to, or different from, (for that also is implied,) the doctrine which we have learned. Whatever varies from the form of sound doctrine which we have in the Scriptures, opens a door to divisions and offences. If truth be once deserted, unity and peace will not last long. Now, mark those that thus cause divisions; and especially that in them which causes them; those lusts on each side, whence come these wars and fightings. A danger discovered is half prevented.

2. To shun it; Avoid them. Shun all unnecessary communion and communication with them, lest you be leavened and infected by them. Some think, he especially warns them to take heed of the Judaizing teachers, who, under the covert of the Christian name, kept up the Mosaic ceremonies, and preached the necessity of them; who were industrious in all places to draw disciples after them, and whom Paul in most of his epistles cautions the churches to take heed of.

II. The reasons to enforce this caution.

1. Because of the pernicious policy of these seducers, v. 18. Observe, (1.) The Master they serve: not our Lord Jesus Christ; but their own belly, their carnal, sensual, secular interests; some base lust or other; pride, ambition, covetousness, luxury, lasciviousness, these are the designs they are really carrying on, Phil. 3:19. (2.) The method they take to compass their design; By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple. Their words and speeches have a show of holiness and zeal for God, a show of kindness and love to those into whom they instil their corrupt doctrines, speaking them fair when they intend them the greatest mischief. By good words and fair speeches was Eve beguiled.

2. Because of the peril we are in, through our proneness and aptness to be inveigled and ensnared by them; 'For your obedience is come abroad unto all men; you are noted in all the churches for a willing, tractable, complying people.' And, (1.) Therefore these seducing teachers would be the more apt to assault them. The devil and his agents have a particular spite at flourishing churches and flourishing souls. (2.) Though it were so, yet they were in danger from these seducers. This Paul suggests with great modesty and tenderness; not as one suspicious of them, but as one solicitous for them; 'Your obedience is come abroad unto all men; we grant that, and rejoice in it; I am glad therefore on your behalf.' Thus does he insinuate their commendation, the better to make way for the caution. A holy jealousy of our friends, may very well consist with a holy joy in them. 'You think yourselves a very happy people, and so do I too: but for all that you must not be secure; I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. You are a willing, good-natured people, but you had best take heed of being imposed on by those seducers.' Be wise unto that which is good, be skilful and intelligent in the truths and ways of God. Be simple concerning evil; so wise as not to be deceived, and yet so simple as not to be deceivers. It is a holy simplicity, not to be able to contrive, or palliate, or carry on, any evil design;—harmless, unmixed, inoffensive, 1 Cor. 14:20.

Paul was the more solicitous for the Roman church, that that might keep its integrity, because it was so famous; it was a city on a hill, so that an error prevailing there would be a bad precedent, and have an ill influence on other churches. As indeed it has since proved in fact; the great apostasy of the latter days taking its rise from that capital city. The errors of leading churches, are leading errors. When the bishop of Rome fell, as a great star from heaven, Rev. 8:10. his tail drew a third part of the stars after him, Rev. 12:4.

3. Because of the promises of God, that we should have victory at last; which is given to quicken and encourage, not to supersede, our watchful cares and vigorous endeavors. It is a very sweet promise, v. 20. The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet. (1.) The titles he gives to God; the God of peace, the Author and Giver of all good. God, as the God of peace, will restrain and vanquish all those that cause divisions and offences, and so break and disturb the peace of the church. (2.) The blessing he expects from God; a victory over Satan. If he mean primarily those false doctrines and seducing spirits spoken of before, of which Satan was the prime founder and author, yet, doubtless, it comprehends all the other designs and devices of Satan against souls, to defile, disturb, and destroy them; all his attempts to keep us from the purity of heaven, the peace of heaven, here, and the possession of heaven hereafter. It plainly alludes to the first promise of the Messiah made in paradise, Gen. 3:15. which is in the fulfilling every day, while the saints are enabled to resist and overcome the temptations of Satan; and will be perfectly fulfilled, when, in spite of all the powers of darkness, all that belong to the election of grace shall be brought triumphantly to glory. The victory shall be speedy; He shall do it shortly. Yet a lit-other at the end of the liturgy, and before the communion service. It was understood to express mutual love, and in things spiritual, equality. This custom continued during a great part of the first century, and is noticed by several early ecclesiastical writers, cited by Grot.; as Justin, and Tertull. By the cause of its unrequited mention by the apostle (only here, and in 1 and 2 Cor., and Thess.) there is reason to think, that this custom, so liable to abuse and misrepresentation [e. g. the heathens' scandals, as to the promiscuous intercourse of the Christians at their evening meetings, see Doddr.], was laid aside at a very early period of the Christian church.

V. 17, 18. Mark.] 'Beware of. Belly.] Appetite. Good words.] Flattery.'

(18.) 'Perhaps reference is had to some Jews, who joined to an outward show of sanctity a sensual life, and sought no more than to make the profession of the Gospel a mean of obtaining a luxurious living. See Mich. and Ros.'

V. 20. 'May the God of peace bruise, &c.'

21 Timotheus my work-fellow, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you.

22 I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord.

26 But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith;)

27 To God only wise, be glory, through Jesus Christ, for ever. Amen.

the while, and He that shall come will come. He hath said it, Behold, I come quickly. Some refer it to the happy ending of their contentions in true love and unity; others to the period of the church's persecutions in the conversion of the powers of the empire to Christianity, when the bloody enemies of the church were subdued and trampled on by Constantine, and the church under his government; it is rather to be applied to the victory all the saints shall have over Satan, when they come to heaven, and are for ever out of his reach; together with their present victories, through grace.

To this therefore he subjoins the benediction, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you; the good will of Christ toward you, the good work of Christ in you. Paul, not only as a friend, but as a minister and an apostle, who had received grace for grace, thus with authority blesses them with this blessing, and repeats it, v. 24.

V. 21—24. As the apostle had before sent his own salutations to many of this church, and that of the churches round him to them all; he here adds an affectionate remembrance of them from some particular persons now with him, the better to promote acquaintance and fellowship among distant saints; and that the subscribing of these worthy names, known to them, might the more recommend this epistle. He mentions,

1. Some that were his particular friends,

PRACT. OBS. True religion teaches men humbly and frankly to acknowledge their obligations, even to those who in many respects are their inferiors.—If an apostle so kindly remembered each of those, who had bestowed labor upon him; much more will the Lord remember all the services which have been performed from love to Him and the Gospel. (Mat. 10:40—42. 25:34—40. Heb. 6:9, 10.)—Seniority in faith gives a real precedence; and the bonds of grace are nearer than those of nature.—Christ is as much present in the family-worship of those, who meet in his name, as in the more public assemblies of his saints. Believers are often found in those families, of which the principals are unconverted; and they should perform their several relative duties with cheerfulness, and a deference to their superiors, though strangers to the and, probably, known to the Roman Christians; Timotheus, whom Paul sometimes calls his son, as an inferior; but here his work-fellow, as an equal; such a respect does he put on him: and Lucius, probably Lucius of Cyrene, a noted man in the church of Anioch, Acts 13:1. as Jason at Thessalonica, where he suffered for entertaining Paul, Acts 17: 5, 6. and Sosipater, supposed to be the same with Sopoter of Berea, mentioned Acts 20:4. These last Paul calls his kinsmen; not only more largely, as they were Jews, but as they were in blood or affinity nearly allied to him. It seems, Paul was of a good family, that he met with so many of his kindred in several places.

2. One that was Paul's amanuensis, v. 22. Tertius; Paul used a scribe, not out of state, or idleness, but because he wrote a bad hand, which he excuses, when he wrote to the Galatians with his own hand, Gal. 6:11.—with what kind of letters. Perhaps this Tertius was the same with Silas; for Silas (as some think) signifies the third, in Hebrew, as Tertius, in Latin. Tertius either wrote as Paul dictated, or transcribed it fair.

3. Some others that were of note among the Christians, v. 23. It is uncertain whether this was Gaius of Derbe, Acts 20:4. or Gaius of Macedonia, Acts 19:29. or rather Gaius of Corinth, 1 Cor. 1:14. and whether any of these was he to whom John wrote his 3d epistle. Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, is another; he means of the city of Corinth, whence this epistle was dated. His estate, honor, and employment, did not take him off from attending on Paul, and laying out himself for the good of the church, it should seem, in the work of the ministry; for he is joined with Timothy, Acts 19:22. and is mentioned 2 Tim. 4:20. Quartus is also mentioned, as a brother; for as one is our Father, even Christ, so all we are brethren.

V. 25—27. Here the apostle solemnly closes his epistle with a magnificent ascription of glory to the blessed God, as one that terminated all in the praise and glory of God, and studied to return all to Him, seeing all is of Him, and from Him. He does, as it were, breathe out his soul to these Romans in the praise of God, choosing to make that the end of his epistle, which he made the end of his life. Observe here,

I. A description of the Gospel of God, which comes in as a parenthesis; Paul calls it his Gospel, because he was the preacher of it, and because he did so much glory in it. Some think he means especially that declaration, explication, and application, of the doctrine of the Gospel, which he had now made in this epistle: but it rather takes in all the preaching and writing of the apostles, among whom Paul was a principal laborer.

1. It is the preaching of Jesus Christ. Christ was the Preacher of it Himself; it began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. 2:3. He is the subject-matter of it; the sum and substance of the whole Gospel.

2. It is the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, and by the scriptures of the prophets made known. The subject-matter of the Gospel is a mystery; our redemption and salvation by Jesus Christ, in the foundation, method, and fruits of it, are, without controversy, a great mystery.

(1.) This mystery was kept secret since the world began; wrapped up in silence from eternity, so some; it is no new and upstart notion, no late invention, but took rise from the days of eternity, and the purposes of God's everlasting love. Or, since the world began, so we tr. it; during all the times of the O. T. this mystery was comparatively kept secret, in the types and shadows of the ceremonial law, and the dark predictions of the prophets, which pointed at it, but so that they could not steadfastly look to the end of those things, 2 Cor. 3:13. Even the disciples of Christ themselves, before his resurrection and ascension, were very much in the dark about the mystery of redemption, their notion of it much clouded and confused; such a secret was it for ages. But,

(2.) It is now made manifest. The veil is rent, the shadows of evening are done away, and life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel, and the Sun of righteousness is risen on the world. But how is it made manifest by the scriptures of the prophets? Surely, because now the event has given the best exposition to the prophecies of the O. T. If the N. T. explains the Old, the O. T. very much illustrates the New. Thus the O. T. prophets prophecy again, now their prophecies are fulfilled, before many people, and tongues, Rev. 10:11.

(3.) It is manifested according to the commandment of the everlasting God, the purpose, counsel, and decree of God from eternity; and the commission and appointment given first to Christ, and then to the apostles, in the fulness of time. The attribute of eternity is here given to God very emphatically. He is from everlasting, to everlasting. Christ in the Gospel, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

(4.) It is made known to all notions for the obedience of faith. The extent of this revelation he often takes notice of; that whereas hitherto in Judah only God was known, now Christ is Salvation to the ends of the earth, to all notions.

II. A doxology to that God whose Gospel it is; ascribing glory to Him for ever, v. 27. acknowledging that He is a glorious God, and adoring Him accordingly, with the most awful affections; desiring and longing to be at this work with the holy angels, where we shall be doing it to eternity.

The Mediator of this praise is Jesus Christ. To God only wise through Jesus Christ; so some. It is in and through Christ, that God is manifested to the world as the only wise God; for He is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. Or, rather, as we read it, glory through Jesus Christ. All glory that passes from fallen man to God, so as to be accepted of Him, must go through the hands of the Lord Jesus.

For, notwithstanding their zeal and confidence, as if they alone were the servants of Christ, they evidently do not belong to our 'Prince of Peace;' but are the slaves of their selfish interests, sensual appetites, or ambition.—Every expression of the most endearing affection should be used among believers, but in the most pure and holy manner. CORINTH.

OF THE
FIRST EPISTLE OF
PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. Simon Brown.)

CORINTH* was a place of great trade, and it is not to be wondered at, if a place so famous for wealth and arts should be infamous for vice. It was particularly noted for fornication, inasmuch that a Corinthian woman was a proverbial phrase for a strumpet, and, to play the Corinthian, was to play the whore, or indulge whorish inclinations. Yet in this lewd city did Paul, by the blessing of God on his labors, plant and raise a Christian church, chiefly among the Gentiles, as seems very probable from the history of this matter, Acts 18:1—18. compared with some passages in this epistle, particularly ch. 12:2. though it is not improbable many Jewish converts might be also among them; for we are told, that Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house, Acts 18:8. He continued in this city near two years, as is plain from Acts 18:11, 18. and labored with great success, being encouraged by a divine vision, assuring him God had much people in that city, Acts 18:9, 10. Nor did he use to stay long in a place, where his ministry met not with acceptance and success.

Some time after he left them, he wrote this epistle to them,† to rectify some gross disorders, which during his absence had been introduced, partly from the interest some false teacher or teachers had obtained amongst them, and partly from the leaven of their old maxims and manners, that had not been thoroughly purged out by the Christian principles they had entertained. Pride, avarice, luxury, lust, (the natural offspring of a carnal and corrupt mind,) are all fed and prompted by outward affluence. And with all these, either the body of this people, or some particular persons among them, are here

* Corinth is situated on the verge of a plain (spread with 15 ruinous villages), somewhat elevated, and at a little distance from the southern extremity of the gulf, bearing its name. Its situation enabled it to avail itself of the commerce of the Saronic and Corinthian gulfs, and of the Ægean and Adriatic seas, and, anciently, it was the mart both of Europe and Asia. Being the most commercial and richest, it became the most dissolute of the Grecian cities. Upon this celebrated city the cup of cursing has long since been wrung out to its very dregs. Captured, plundered, and devastated, successively, by Roman, Goth, Hun, and Turk, it was reduced, before the revolution, to about 1000 Greek and 300 Turkish houses. (Turner.) During the revolution, lying as it did, in the highway of both Turk and Greek, on entering or leaving the Morea, (the isthmus is only 4 to 6 miles across, in its narrowest part,) and being the seat of a civil broil, it was pillaged and wasted by every party, and we found it a more perfect desolation, than almost any other modern city in Greece. Of six churches, the walls of one only were entire, and with the strictest truth may it be said, that not one private dwelling escaped destruction. The streets were obstructed by ruins or rank weeds. 150 or 200 families seek a shelter among the ruins of the city. But as both citadel and city are abundantly supplied with water, its position will help it to the first place, among the cities of modern Greece. From the foundations of a temple, on the highest point of the isolated mountain on the S. W., (shooting a thousand feet above the city, where stands the citadel, called the Acrocorinthus,) we had one of the finest prospects in the world. Regarding only the mere natural scenery, the mountains, plains, seas, and islands, there is a charm, which no man, gifted with reason and taste, can fail to perceive, or can perceive without admiration. But how many pages of interesting recollections, historical, [scriptural,] and classical, does a single glance here call up to the mind of the scholar! Every object seems a volume;—the isthmus of Corinth, with its games, and wall, and the numerous armies and barbaric hordes that have crossed it,—the Saronic gulf, and Ægina, and “unconquered Salamis,”—the Athenian acropolis, like a speck, at the foot of mount Hymettus,—the mountains of Attica, and others, great in song, round to the long and lofty ridge of which Parnassus is a part,—the site, and plain, and gulf of Corinth,—the road to Nemca, to Mycenæ, to Argos, now seldom trod,—and the mountains of Arcadia and Achaia, with Cyllene, towering in snowy majesty above them all! Dr. ANDERSON.

† It is most evident, that the epistle was written by the apostle, when residing at or near Ephesus, and some time before he left that city:—16:5—9. learned men generally calculate, about A. D. 55, 56, or 57.—‘In the 9th year of Claudius, saith Orosius, in the 10th say others, in the 12th says Dr. Pearson, the Jews were banished from Rome; and Paul, coming to Corinth, finds Aquila and Priscilla newly come from thence to Corinth on that occasion. Acts 18:2. He stays there a year and a half (11;) . . . at Ephesus 3 years, Acts 20:31. and at the close of these 3 years, he writes this epistle. . . If, with Dr. Pearson, you begin them only at the 12th of Claudius, they will end in the 3d of Nero, A. D. 57.’ Whitby. But this learned writer has allowed no time for the apostle’s voyage, and journey to Jerusalem, and his progress through the churches of Syria, Galatia, and other parts of Asia Minor: and the same oversight has been fallen into by most of those, whom the author has had the opportunity of consulting, who date the epistle so early.—A. D. 54. Paul at Corinth, meets with Aquila and Priscilla. . . A. D. 56. Paul departs from Corinth, and passeth to Ephesus; thence he sets out towards Jerusalem, . . . he lands at Cesarea, goes down to Antioch, and comes into the regions of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming the disciples in all these places.—A. D. 57. Paul returns to Ephesus. . . A. D. 60. About this time a schism ariseth in the church at Corinth, which causeth Paul, (now in or about Ephesus,) to write his First Epistle to the Corinthians.’ Index to Ato Oxf. Bib., 1734. This index seems to place the writing of the epistle subsequent to the tumult at Ephesus, which it certainly was not. Notes, 16:5—9 2 Cor. 1:8—11. It could not, however, be written long before the apostle left Ephesus; and probably the index, above quoted, does not allow too much time, for the apostle’s progress from Jerusalem to Ephesus. Acts 18:18—23. 19:8—12. This computation, therefore, the author has fixed on, as more satisfactory than any other which he has seen.

charged by the apostle. Their pride discovered itself in their factions, and the notorious disorders they committed in the exercise of their spiritual gifts. And this vice was not wholly fed by their wealth, but by the insight they had into the Greek learning and philosophy. Some of the ancients tell us, the city abounded with rhetoricians and philosophers; men naturally vain, full of self-conceit, and apt to despise the plain doctrine of the Gospel, because it did not feed the curiosity of an inquisitive and disputing temper, nor please the ear with artful speeches, and a flow of fine words.* Their avarice was manifest in their lawsuits and litigations about mine, and thine, before heathen judges. Their luxury appeared in more instances than one, in their dress, in their debauching themselves even at the Lord's table, where the rich, who were most faulty on this account, were guilty also of a very proud and criminal contempt of their poor brethren. Their lust broke out in a most flagrant and infamous instance, such as had not been named among the Gentiles, nor spoken of without detestation,—that a man should have his father's wife, either as his wife, or so as to commit fornication with her. This indeed seems to have been the fault of a particular person; but the whole church were to blame, that they had this crime in no greater abhorrence, that they could endure one of such very corrupt morals, and of so flagitious a behavior, among them. And it is plain from other passages of the epistle, that they were not so entirely free from their former lewd inclinations, as not to need very strict cautions and strong arguments against fornication: see ch. 6:9—20. The pride of their learning had also carried many of them so far, as to disbelieve or dispute against the doctrine of the resurrection.

It is manifest from this state of things, that there was much that deserved reprehension, and needed correction, in this church. And the apostle, under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit, sets himself to do both with all wisdom and faithfulness, and with a due mixture of tenderness and authority, as became one in so elevated and important a station in the church. †

It appears, that this letter to the Corinthians was written by Paul, in answer to one he had received from them, (7:1.) and that the seventh, and some of the following chs., are taken up in resolving certain doubts, and regulating certain points of order, concerning which the Corinthians had . . . consulted him. . . . Though . . . they had written to Paul, requesting his answer and directions, in these points; they had not said one syllable about the enormities and disorders which had crept in among them, and in the blame of which they all shared; but his information concerning these irregularities had come round to him from other quarters, . . . by more private intelligence. ‡ Paley. The epistle was therefore written, not only as an answer to the inquiries of the Corinthians by letter; but in order to oppose, and if it could be, terminate the various corruptions, in doctrine and practice, which prevailed, to subvert the influence of the false teachers, and to re-establish the apostle's own authority in that church. By general truths, he, with great address and prudence, made way for a more direct and particular opposition to the several gross irregularities and dangerous mistakes, into which they had been seduced. He stated the truth and will of God in various particulars, with great energy of argument and animation of style; he satisfactorily resolved the several questions which had been proposed to him; he, with great tenderness and wisdom, intermixed exhortations and directions with his other subjects; and he concluded with affectionate and pathetic prayers for them.— Though this epistle is not so systematic as that of the Romans, it is replete with instruction, and contains the fullest and most interesting declaration and demonstration of the resurrection of the believers, in consequence of the resurrection of their Lord, which is anywhere to be found.—The epistle contains no express prophecies; but nothing can exceed the decided claim to divine inspiration, which the writer advances. 2:6—13. He either, therefore, claimed what he was not entitled to; or his epistles are not only genuine and authentic, but divinely inspired. † (Præf. to the Epistles.) Scott.

* For a vast number of classical citations, on the character of the Corinthians, corresponding with this epistle, see Wetstein, who says, 'they were not less remarkable for lasciviousness, than wealth, and the study of philosophy.'

BLOOMF.

† Ros. thus neatly arranges the various subjects of this epistle. 'I. The dissensions which had arisen among the Corinthians, and the pride of those engaged therein, the apostle sharply rebukes, and exorts them to concord, ch. 1—4. II. A reproof, because of an incestuous person not having been expelled from the society, ch. 5; and III. because of the quarrelsome and litigious spirit to which many were, in a manner, enslaved, 6:1—11. IV. The apostle admonishes them to abstain from fornication, and not to abuse the Christian liberty, 6:12—20. He answers various questions put to him by the Corinthians, and treats, V. of Christian matrimony; ch. 7; tot. VI. of idolothya, 8:1—11:2; VII. of women making their appearance veiled at the congregations of Christians, 11:2—16; VIII. of the Lord's Supper, 11:17—34; IX. of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, chs. 12. 13. 14; X. of the resurrection of the dead, ch. 15; finally, XI. of the collecting of alms in the church, ch. 16.' Ed.

‡ 'The genuineness of 1 Cor. was never doubted. It was cited, or alluded to, repeatedly, by Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, in the 1st cent.: in the following cent. by Tatian, Irenæus, Athenagoras, and Clement of Alexandria. In the 3d cent. this epistle was acknowledged to be Paul's, by Tertullian, Caius, and Origen. The testimonies of later writers are too numerous and explicit, to render any detail of them necessary.' Horne.

PAUL, called <sup>a</sup> to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God, and Sosthenes <sup>b</sup> our brother,

2 Unto the church of God which is at <sup>c</sup> Corinth, to them <sup>d</sup> that are sanctified <sup>e</sup> in Christ Jesus, called <sup>f</sup> to be saints, with all that in every place call <sup>g</sup> upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours :

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 2. The passage, [calling upon the name, &c.] shows how inseparable the invocation of Christ was, from the profession of Christianity, in those days. Acts 2:14—21. 9:10—14. Rom. 10:5—11. Some would indeed render it, 'those, who are called by the name of the Lord Jesus;' but it is evidently inconsistent with the proper construction of the Gr. language, thus to render it; and this interpretation, we may confidently assert, would never have been adopted, if the previous opposition of men's minds to the divine adoration of Christ, had not induced them to have recourse to it; though it must be allowed that some have favored it, who by no means denied the Deity of Christ.—To them that are sanctified, &c. (2.) To explain the terms 'sanctified,' and 'saints,' as implying no more than the profession of Christianity, and including all nominal Christians, as many learned men do, would enervate the language of the apostle, and confound the distinction between the form and the power of godliness, which it is his grand object to maintain. No doubt there were unconverted persons, in the several churches, even in those days; but the apostles addressed their epistles to the collective body, according to their profession; thus teaching them what that profession implied; but if they were not truly saints, they were no more intended, than if they had not been called Christians. The arguments by which these learned writers support their opinion, [258]

CHAP. I. V. 1—9. In this preface to the whole epistle, notice,

I. The inscription; in which, according to the custom of writing letters then, the name of the person by whom, and the persons to whom it was written, are both inserted.

1. It is from Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, to the church of Corinth, which himself had planted, though there were some among them, that now questioned his apostleship, ch. 9:1, 2, and vilified his ministry, 2 Cor. 10:10. The most faithful and useful ministers are not secure from this contempt. He begins with challenging this character. It was proper at any time, but faithfulness to his trust made it necessary at this, when false teachers made a merit of running him down, and their giddy and deluded followers were so apt to set them up in competition with him. And to make this more fully appear, he joins Sosthenes, a minister of a lower rank, not a fellow-apostle, but a fellow-minister: once a ruler of a Jewish synagogue, afterward a convert to Christianity: a Corinthian by birth, as is most probable, and dear to this people; for which reason, Paul, to ingratiate himself with them, joins him with himself in his first salutations. Paul did not in any case lessen his apostolical authority, yet he was ready on all occasions to do a kind and condescending thing, for their good, to whom he ministered.

2. The persons to whom this epistle was directed, are, the church of God that was at Corinth, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. All Christians are thus far sanctified in Christ Jesus,—that they are by baptism dedicated and devoted to Him, would equally prove, that the worst persons in the church at Corinth, were indeed 'the temple of the Holy Spirit,' the 'temple of the living God,' and entitled to all spiritual and eternal blessings, equally with true believers. 3:16. 6:11, 19. 2 Cor. 6:16.—'Even here from the beginning he lays the foundation of his future reasoning; for if the Corinthians, and all other believers, were called by one God, and sanctified in one Christ; if they all had, and owned, the same Lord; whence did the dissensions arise and get strength among them, as if Christ was divided?' Beza. 'The disciples were first called Christians at Antioch. Now, before this time, we find not only Stephen calling on this name, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit;" and Paul bid "to wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord;" . . . but Annius speaks to the Lord Jesus, of Paul, "He hath authority from the high priest, to bind all that call on thy name;" and of him it is said, "He destroyed them that called on this name in Jerusalem."—Dr. Hammond, who here tr. this phrase passively, doth elsewhere tr. it actively, the context forcing him so to do. So Rom. 10:13. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord;" i. e. pray and adhere to Christ. . . . And Acts 9:14. "He hath authority to bind all that call upon thy name;" i. e. saith he, that publicly own the worship of Christ.' Whitby.

they are under strict obligations to be holy, and they make profession of real sanctity. It is the design of Christianity to sanctify us in Christ. In conjunction with the church at Corinth, he directs the epistle to all that in every place call on the name of Christ Jesus our Lord, both theirs and ours. Hereby Christians are distinguished from the profane and atheistical,—that they dare not live without prayer: and from Jews and Pagans,—that they call on the name of Christ. Observe, In every place, in the Christian world, some call on the name of Christ, a remnant in all places; and we should hold communion with all that do so.

II. The apostolical benediction; Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. This blessing every preacher of the Gospel should heartily wish and pray may be the lot of all among whom he ministers. Grace and peace; the favor of God, and reconciliation to Him. It is indeed the summary of all blessings. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace, was the form of benediction under the O. T., Num. 6:26. but this advantage we have by the Gospel, 1. That we are directed how to obtain that peace from God: it is in and by Christ. 2. We are told what must qualify us for this peace; namely, grace.

III. The apostle's thanksgiving. Paul begins most of his epistles with thanksgiving to God for his friends, and prayer for them. The best way of manifesting our affection to our friends, is, by praying and giving thanks for them. It is one branch of the communion of saints, to give thanks to God mutually for our gifts, graces, and comforts. He gives thanks, 1. For their conversion to the faith of Christ; that grace was given them by Jesus Christ, v. 4. He is the great Procurer and Disposer of the favors of God. 2. For the abundance of their spiritual gifts; this the church of Corinth was famous for, v. 7. He specifies utterance and knowledge, v. 5. Many have utterance, that have not knowledge; others have knowledge, but want utterance to employ it. But where God gives both, a man is qualified for eminent usefulness. When the church of Corinth was enriched with all utterance, and all knowledge, it was fit a large tribute of praise should be rendered to God; especially when these gifts were a testimony to the truth of the Christian doctrine, a confirmation of the testimony of Christ among them, v. 6. And it is no wonder, that, when they had such foundation for their faith, they should live in expectation of the coming of their Lord Jesus Christ, v. 7. It is the character of Christians, that they wait for Christ's second coming; all our religion hath regard to that: we believe it, and hope for it, and it is the business of our lives to prepare for it, if we are Christians indeed. And the more confirmed we are in the Christian faith, the more firm is our belief of our Lord's second coming, and the more earnest our expectation of it.

IV. Of the encouraging hopes the apostle had of them, for the time to come, founded on the power and love of Christ, and the faithfulness of God, v. 8, 9. Those that wait for the coming of Christ, will be kept by Him, and confirmed to the end; and those that are so, will be blameless in the day of Christ; not on the foot of strict justice, but gracious absolution; not in rigor of law, but from rich and free grace. How desirable is it to be confirmed and kept of Christ for such a purpose as this! How glorious are the hopes of such a privilege, whether for ourselves or others! To be kept, by the power of Christ, from the power of our own corruptions and Satan's temptations, that we may appear without blame in the great day! O glorious expectation, especially when the faithfulness of God comes in to support our hopes! He who hath called us into the fellowship of his Son, is faithful, and will do it, 1 Thess. 5:24.

V. 10—13. Here the apostle enters on his subject.

I. He exhorts them to unity and brotherly love, and reproves them for their divisions. He writes to them in a very engaging way; 'I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; If you have any regard to that dear and worthy name by which you are called, be unanimous: avoid divisions or Sanctified...called, &c.] Both these expressions are designations of Christians, and used (with reference to the phraseology of the O. T.) of those who are separated from the bulk of the heathens, and set apart for religious and holy purposes, for the profession of true religion. See Dent. 7:6. 14:2. Benson on 1 Pet. 1:2, and Bp. Lowth on Is. 13:3. By κλητοί [called], are denoted Christians, those who, being called, obeyed the call, and were thus placed in a state of salvation. The Jews (Krause obs.) called themselves mqay yohoh, the peculiar people of God; and therefore this is, by Paul, especially applied to Christians. See Rom. 1:7.

V. 3. 'Is not this to desire for them grace and peace from God the Father, and consequently to pray for it? Why therefore is it not also to desire the same blessings from God the Son?' Whitby; and consequently to pray for them. SCOTT.

V. 4—9. (Phil. 1:3—8.) Before the apostle entered on the immediate subject of his epistle, he endeavored to conciliate the affections of the Corinthians, by calling to their recollection the benefits which they had derived from his ministry. He continually thanked God on their account, for having bestowed his grace upon them, through Jesus Christ. (8) Blameless, &c. 'He calls them blameless; not whom none had ever blamed, but those whom none could justly blame; i. e. those who are in Christ Jesus. Rom. 3:1, 33.' Beza. Certainly neither spotless innocence, nor sinless perfection, nor such a tenor of conduct from their first profession of Christianity, as was wholly unblameable, could be meant; for the apostle blames many things afterwards, which were very general among them; yet their renewal to holiness seems intended, and their conduct as harmless and blameless, at least equally with their justification. Eph. 5:22—27. Col. 1:21—23. 'God will make good his promise, . . . if you do not fail yourselves.' Hammond. It seems, that the system, which this learned writer adopts, cannot be maintained, without 'adding to the Word' of God; for he and his coadjutors frequently insert a clause of this kind, as if the inspired writers had forgotten it, and had expressed themselves incautiously! In fact, it is an interpolation, and as such must be rejected. All professed Christians, indeed, at Corinth, would not be 'kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation;' for some were not true believers; yet all those whom the apostle especially addressed, would thus persevere; namely, 'the saints,' even those whom God had 'called to the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ.' Rom. 3:28—39. Sc.

(7.) Gift. 'Charismata signifies not only gifts extraordinary, but also, and here especially, the ordinary and general benefits of Christianity; as the tranquillity it bestows, and the firmness, constancy, energy, and progress in well doing which it imparts.' Ros. Waiting, &c. 'Expecting the revelation, to judgment and destruction; called the second advent, epiphaneia, &c. See 2 Thess. 2:8. 1 Tim. 6:14. 2 Tim. 4:1—3. Tit. 2:13. The Gr. V. 10—16. Considering the different capacities, educations, habits, and prejudices of mankind, it seems impossible to avoid all difference of opinion; but it is equally true, that fallen men will never, on earth, 'love God with all their heart,' and 'their neighbors as themselves;' yet the rule and exhortation must not be changed on that account. As we have one rule, and one standard of truth, and one Spirit to be our Teacher; so, in proportion to our humility, simplicity, and diligence, we come to be of 'one mind and judgment,' in the great concerns of religion; and were we perfect in these things, we should also be perfectly united in sentiment and affection. Jer. 32:39—41. This will be the case in heaven; and it will at length be so in a great degree on earth. The nearer we come to it, the more we approximate to perfection; all our divisions arise from a sinful cause, which must not be excused; but while this cause subsists, we should endeavor to bear with each other in respect of it, and so to 'keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.' Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4. Yet we ought continually to pray for the more abundant pouring out of the Spirit of truth and love, on ourselves and all our fellow Christians, that we may be 'perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.' It has been thought, with probability, that the apostle does not mention these names, as really the heads of the parties into which the Corinthians had divided; but in order more emphatically to mark the evil of the thing itself, and the absurdity of dividing the church, out of a disposition inordinately to honor some particular teacher; or to despise faithful ministers, under pretence of honoring Christ. However respectable the names might be, which were thus used, the thing was indefensible; but it would give less umbrage for him to mention himself, Apollus, and Cephas, than expressly to name the false teachers, who were the authors of the discord. (10) Divisions. 'Schisms.' 11:18. 12:25. See on Mat. 9:16. The word here evidently signifies 'divisions,' among persons who held the same grand doctrines, and met together for worship in the same ordinances. Thus 'schisms,' as the word is here used, differed from heresies, which related also to doctrines. Acts 28:21, 22. SCOTT.

(10.) Divisions. 'Schismata: synonymous with dichostasiai, v. 33. and Gal. 5:21. where also occ. haireseis, sects. And this seems to be the sense here, (and so Dr. Nott,) though it may include heresies, and disagreements of every kind. "In this place, the 'schism' appears to have consisted in the formation of religious parties, which pretended to follow, one the cause of Paul, and another that of Apollus. In 11:18. the charge is grounded upon the adoption of new modes, which some had wantonly introduced in the administration of the sacrament. And in 12:25. the offence, of schism, appears to have consisted in the violation of that subordination of teaching, ministering, and governing, which was originally appointed in the church. 'Schism,' therefore, may be defined to be, an open violation of church unity, when individuals assume to themselves the power either of forming new communions, or of instituting new rites, or of creating a new ministry, in opposition to such as have been established by regular authority, as being the ministry and the ordinances originally of apostolic institution." 13 Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

15 Lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name.

16 And I baptized also the household of <sup>u</sup> Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other.

17 For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom <sup>v</sup> of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect.

18 For the preaching of the cross is to them <sup>w</sup> that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power <sup>x</sup> of God.

19 For it is written, <sup>y</sup> I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent.

schisms, as the original is, 'that is, all alienation of affection from each other.' In the great things of religion be of a mind: but when there is not a unity of sentiment, let there be a union of affections. The consideration of being agreed in greater things, should extinguish all feuds and divisions about less ones.

II. He hints at the original of these contentions. Pride lay at the bottom, Prov. 13:10. Only of pride cometh contention. They quarrelled about their ministers: some cried up Paul, perhaps as the most sublime and spiritual teacher; others cried up Apollos, perhaps as the most eloquent speaker; some Cephas, or Peter, perhaps for the authority of his age, or because he was the apostle of the circumcision; and some were for neither, but Christ only. So liable are the best things in the world to be corrupted, and the Gospel and its institutions, which are at perfect harmony with themselves and one another, to be made the engines of variance, discord, and contention. This is no reproach to religion, but a very melancholy evidence of the corruption and depravity of human nature.

III. He expostulates with them on their discord and quarrels; 'Is Christ divided? No, there is but one Christ, therefore Christians should be of one heart. Was Paul crucified for you? Was he your sacrifice and atonement? Did I ever pretend to be your Savior, or any more than his minister? Or, were ye baptized in the name of Paul? Were ye devoted to my service, or engaged to be my disciples, by that sacred rite? Did I challenge such right in you, or dependence from you, as are the proper claims of your God and Redeemer?' No; ministers, however instrumental they are of good to us, are not to be put in Christ's stead. They are not to usurp Christ's authority, nor encourage anything in the people, that looks like transferring his authority to them. He is our Savior and Sacrifice, He is our Lord and Guide. And happy were it for the churches, if [satisfied with the name of Christians] there were no name of distinction among them, as Christ is not divided.

V. 14—16. Here the apostle gives an account of his ministry among them. But how was it a proper matter for thankfulness that he had baptized so few? In this sense only, that now he had baptized so few, it could not be said he had baptized in his own name, made disciples for himself, or set himself up as the head of a sect. He left it to other ministers to baptize, while he set himself to the more important business of preaching. He had assistants that could baptize, when none could discharge the other part of his office as well as himself. In this sense, he says, Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel; not so much to baptize as to preach. Ministers should esteem themselves sent and set apart more especially to that service in which Christ will be most honored, and the salvation of souls promoted, and for which themselves are best fitted; though no part of their duty is to be neglected. The principal business Paul did among them, was, to preach; to preach the Gospel, v. 17. the cross, v. 18. Christ crucified, v. 23. not his own fancy, but the Gospel; the glad tidings of peace, and reconciliation to God, through the Mediation of a crucified Redeemer. This is the sum and substance of the Gospel.

V. 17—31. We have here,

I. The manner in which Paul preached the Gospel, v. 17. ch. 2:4. not with the flourish of oratory, or the accuracies of philosophical language, on which the Greeks so much prided themselves, and which seem to have been the peculiar recommendations of some of the heads of the faction in this church, that most opposed this apostle. He did not preach the Gospel in this manner, lest the cross of Christ should be of none effect; lest the success should have been ascribed to the force of art, and not of truth; and hereby the honor of the cross had been diminished or eclipsed. He preached a crucified Jesus, in plain language, and told the people, that that Jesus, who was crucified at Jerusalem, was the Son of God, and Savior of men; and that all who would be saved must repent of their sins, and believe in Him, and submit to his government and laws. This truth needed no artificial dress;

'Neither sameness of opinion, nor exact uniformity in external forms and modes of worship is required here. The church never enjoyed a greater semblance of uniformity, than just before the Reformation; yet it never was more corrupt. This enforcement of uniformity has often occasioned unhappy disputes, and persecutions, which have led to the very evils here deprecated,—divisions and separations. Those who insist on an exact uniformity, at the expense of the conscience of their brethren, are chargeable with the sin of schism, not the individuals who resist impositions of human authority.'

REV. W. LOTHIAN.

'Nothing more abhorrent from the principles and maxims of the sacred oracles can be conceived, than the idea of a plurality of true churches, neither in actual communion with each other, nor in a capacity for such communion. . . . We have become so familiarized to it, as to be scarcely sensible of its enormity. . . . To see Christian societies regarding each other with the jealousies of rival empires; each aiming to raise itself on the ruins of all others; making extravagant boasts of superior purity, generally in exact proportion to their departure from it, and scarcely deigning to acknowledge the possibility of obtaining salvation out of their pale, is the odious and disgusting spectacle which modern Christianity presents. The bond of charity, which unites the genuine followers of Christ in distinction from the world, is dissolved, and the very terms by which it was wont to be denoted, exclusively employed to express a predilection for a sect. The evils which result from this state of division are incalculable; it supplies infidels with their most plausible topics of invective; it hardens the conscience of the irreligious; weakens the hands of the good; impedes the efficacy of prayer; and is probably the principal obstruction to that ample effusion of the Spirit, which is essential to the renovation of the world.'

V. 17—19. Many, supposing the administration of sacraments to be the most honorable part of the ministerial work, have conjectured reasons, why Paul did not himself baptize the Corinthian converts; but the reason he assigns, entirely subverts their imaginations.—Some, indeed, of the Corinthians might think, that he was not so competent to preach the Gospel, as this declaration [that he was sent to preach] seemed to imply; and he readily allowed, that he had not used the 'wisdom of words.' For 'Christ sent him' to deliver an important message, in plain language; and he was aware that these decorations, instead of giving efficacy to his doctrine, would degrade it, and even 'render the cross of Christ of none effect.' The apostles made no claim to elegance; but certainly precision, and perspicuity, and simplicity, are found in their writings, in no common degree.—(17) To baptize.] Whence did the almost universally prevailing opinion originate, that the administration of sacraments is the peculiar and highest office of the Christian ministry, above even that of preaching the Gospel? Perhaps the reader has never thought of asking this question. I have, however, no hesitation in answering, from popery, in its incipient or more matured state; to change, by the opus operatum, which the priest alone can perform aright, 'a child of the devil' into 'a child of God,' which must be the case if baptism be regeneration or inseparable from it; and to change, in the same way, a piece of bread into the body, soul, and divine nature of Christ, and render it an object of adoration, derives a far higher dignity to the priesthood, than even apostolical preaching can do.

Then 2:3, sqq. he details the method he had pursued at Corinth, in preaching the Gospel.' 20 Where <sup>a</sup> is the wise? where <sup>b</sup> is the scribe? where <sup>c</sup> is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish <sup>d</sup> the wisdom of this world?

21 For <sup>e</sup> after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.

22 For the Jews require a <sup>d</sup> sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom:

23 But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a <sup>e</sup> stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness;

24 But unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the <sup>f</sup> power of God, and the wisdom of God.

25 Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men.

26 For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not <sup>g</sup> many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called:

27 But God <sup>h</sup> hath chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise: and God hath chosen the weak things of the world, to confound the things which are mighty;

it shone out with the greatest majesty in its own light, and prevailed in the world by its divine authority, and the demonstration of the Spirit, without any human helps. The plain preaching of a crucified Jesus, was more powerful, than all the oratory and philosophy of the heathen world.

II. We have the different effects of this preaching, v. 18, 23, 24.

1. Christ crucified is a Stumbling-block to the Jews. They could not get over it. They had a conceit, that their expected Messiah was to be a great temporal Prince, and therefore would never own one who made so mean an appearance in life, and died so accursed a death, for their Deliverer and King. They despised Him, and looked upon Him as execrable, because hanged on a tree; and because He did not gratify them with a sign to their mind, though his divine power shone out in innumerable miracles. The Jews require a sign, v. 22. See Mat. 12: 38.

2. He was to the Greeks foolishness. They laughed at the story of a crucified Savior, and despised the apostle's way of telling it. They sought for wisdom. They were men of wit and reading, men that had cultivated arts and sciences, and had, for some ages, been in a manner the very mint of knowledge and learning. There was nothing in the plain doctrine of the cross to suit their taste, or humor their vanity, or gratify a curious and wrangling temper: they entertained it therefore with scorn and contempt. What, hope to be saved by one that could not save Himself! And trust in one who was condemned and crucified for a malefactor, a man of mean birth and poor condition in life, and cut off by so vile and opprobrious a death! This was what the pride of human reason and learning could not relish. The Greeks thought it little better than stupidity to receive such a doctrine, and pay this high regard to such a person; and thus were they justly left to perish in their pride and obstinacy. It is just with God to leave those to themselves, who pour such proud contempt on divine wisdom and grace.

3. To them which are called and saved, He is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. Those who are called and sanctified, who receive the Gospel, and are enlightened by the Spirit of God, discern more glorious discoveries of God's wisdom and power in the doctrine of Christ crucified, than in all his other works. Those who are saved, are reconciled to the doctrine of the cross, and led into an experimental acquaintance with the mysteries of Christ crucified.

III. We have here the triumphs of the cross over human wisdom, Is. 29:14. v. 19, 20. All the valued learning of this world was confounded, baffled, and eclipsed, by the Christian revelation, and the glorious triumphs of the cross. This scheme lay out of the reach of the deepest statesmen and philosophers, and the greatest pretenders to learning, both among the Jews and Greeks. When God would save the world, He took a way by Himself; and good reason, for the world by wisdom knew not God, v. 21. All the boasted science of the heathen world did not, could not, effectually bring home the world to God. In spite of all their wisdom, ignorance still prevailed, iniquity still abounded. Men were puffed up by their imaginary knowledge, and rather further alienated from God: therefore it pleased Him, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe. By the foolishness of preaching,—not such in truth, but in vulgar reckoning.

1. The thing preached was foolishness in the eyes of worldly-wise men. Our living through one who died, our being blessed by one who was made a curse, our being justified by one who was Himself condemned, was all folly and inconsistency to men blinded with self-conceit, and wedded to their own prejudices, and the boasted discoveries of their reason and philosophy.

2. The manner of preaching the Gospel was foolishness to them too. None of the famous men for wisdom or eloquence were employed to plant the church, or propagate the gospel. A few fishermen were called out, and sent on this errand. These were commissioned to disciple the nations; the vessels chosen to convey the treasure of saving knowledge to the world: there was nothing in them, that at first view looked grand or august enough to come from God; and the proud pretenders to learning and wisdom despised the doctrine for the sake of those who dispensed it. And yet the foolishness of God is wiser than men, v. 25. Those methods of divine conduct that vain men are apt to censure as unwise and weak, have more true, solid, and successful wisdom in them, than all the learning and wisdom that are among men; 'Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called, v. 26, &c. Ye see the state of Christianity; not many men of learning or authority, or honorable extraction, are called.' There is a great deal of meanness and weakness in the outward appearance of our religion. For, (1.) Few of distinguished character in any of these respects were chosen for the work of the ministry. God did not choose philosophers, nor orators, nor statesmen, nor men of wealth and power, and interest in the world, to publish the Gospel of grace and peace. Not the wise men after the flesh; not the mighty and noble, but the foolish, V. 20. The wise.] Sophos: Scribe.] Grammateus. Paul (so the best comtrs.) strikes both at the Gentile and Jewish "wisdom." Those among the Greeks who applied themselves to intellectual, especially moral and ethical inquiries, were anciently called Sophoi; which answers to the Heb hakym. Thus the 7 wise men were called hoi sophoi. Afterwards, however, such inquirers were called philosophoi. Yet the above use of sophos may be said never to have been quite laid aside. Pythagoras (so Diog. Laert.) said, there was but one wise,—and modestly took the title of philosophos, lover of wisdom. The grammateus is plainly the Jewish sphr, which, Grot. obs., in the Hellenistic style, denoted a civilian and historian; now, in a certain sense, the Jewish scribes were both. Bl. Comp. But those whom, before, no one could refute or contradict, afterward were publicly and safely derided, God making the pseudosophy of both Jew and Gentile, folly." Bl., who refers disputers to sophists of both classes, and thinks 'these Rabbinical scholars, as usual, carry the matter too far.' Ed.

V. 21. 'By the force of its own wisdom. Sophia [tr. wisdom] denotes intellectual inquiry of every kind.' Bloomf.

V. 22. 'He now shows by what cause, and through what prejudice, neither the Jewish nor Gentile wise men believed.—The Jews sought a sign, (or signs, as some MSS., Verss., and Eds., and Griesb., but too rashly, I think.) Many signs had been exhibited by Christ and the apostles, but not what they properly called semeia, by which they meant, signs from heaven, Mark 8:8. There were probably those who desired some such sign as their deliverance from the Roman yoke, by an interposition similar to that at the Exodus, or at the destruction of Sennacherib's army, bread from heaven, or the sun standing still, &c. For such they were prone in all ages to ask; see the Bible, and Rabbins. A sign they would have, agreeable to their wishes and gross conceptions.—The more rational Greeks do not so much ask for miracles, as require wisdom, but it must be that of their own kind, or (as Hardy, from Grot. and the early comtrs., expl.) human wisdom, philosophical reason (rhetorean logōn kai deinotēta sophismatōn, Chrys.), set off by the figmenta oratoria; they wish whatever is said to be proved from natural principles; and whatever cannot be proved or comprehended by reason, as a mystery of faith, they would explode. Thus each wishes and calls for that on which his heart is set, which he has been accustomed to, and therefore demands. But, says the apostle, (so Grot. supplies,) we bring not reasonings, but testimony, concerning a thing seen, though contrary to the secular expectations of Jews, and insipid to the Greeks, as bringing forward nothing from the principles of things, their causes, or the nature of the soul; the elements of their moral philosophy.' Bloomf.

V. 24. 'To the converted Jews his mission is confirmed by miraculous evidence, and the accomplishment of prophecies far more important than any event which their carnal brethren expect; and the believing Gentile finds it infinitely fuller of Divine wisdom and goodness, to a lost world, than any system of philosophy that was ever invented.' Doddr.

V. 26—31. The persons who had been converted to Christianity, and then sent forth to preach the Gospel, were a living demonstration of what the apostle inculcated. This the Corinthians might see for themselves. The persons whom God had employed in preaching the Gospel, seem especially intended; and the words, 'are called,' which seem to favor the other interpretation, [that which applies it to common Christians,] are not in the original. Ps. 8:2. Mat. 11:25, 26. 21:14—16. 2 Cor. 4:7. P. O. 7—12. Why then should the Corinthians so value these endowments in their teachers, when God had evidently poured contempt on them?—Even that distinction, in which alone they might glory, was not in any respect of themselves. By the gratuitous choice and regenerating grace of God, through faith they, sinners of the Gentiles, were 'in Christ Jesus,' who, by his appointment and free mercy, was 'made,' or become, to all believers the whole of salvation.—'They who say, that Christ is made our Righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us,

28 And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are ;

30 But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption :

31 That, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

CHAP. II.

He declareth that his preaching, though it bring not excellency of speech, or of human wisdom : yet consisteth in the power of God : and so far excelleth the wisdom of this world, and human sense, as that the natural man cannot understand it.

weak, base things of the world, men of mean birth, of low rank, of no liberal education, He hath chosen to be the preachers of the gospel, and planters of the church. (2.) Few of distinguished rank and character were called to be Christians. As the preachers were poor and mean, so generally were the converts. The first Christians, both among Jews and Greeks, were men of mean furniture as to their mental improvements, and very mean rank and condition as to their outward estate : yet what glorious discoveries are there of divine wisdom in the whole scheme of the Gospel, and in this particular circumstance of its success !

IV. How admirably all is fitted,
1. To beat down the pride and vanity of men. God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise ; men of no learning, to confound the most learned : the weak things of the world, to confound the mighty ; men of mean rank and circumstances, to confound and prevail against all the power and authority of earthly kings : and base things, and things which are despised, things which men have in the lowest esteem, or in the utmost contempt, to pour contempt and disgrace on all they value and have in veneration : and things which are not, to bring to nought, to abolish things that are. It is common for the Jews to speak of the Gentiles under this character, as things that are not. See the apocryphal Esther, 14:11. and 2 Esdras 6:56, 57. Paul seems to have this common language of the Jews in his view, when he calls Abraham the father of us all, before Him whom he believed, God, who calleth those things that are not, as though they were, Rom. 4:17. The Gospel is fitted to bring down the pride of both Jews and Greeks, to shame the boasted science and learning of the Greeks, and to take down that constitution on which the Jews valued themselves, and despised all the world besides ; that no flesh should glory in his presence, v. 29. that there might be no pretence for boasting. Divine wisdom alone had the contrivance of the method of redemption ; divine grace alone revealed it, and made it known. It lay, in both respects, out of human reach. And the doctrine and discovery prevailed, in spite of all the opposition it met with from human art or authority : so effectually did God veil the glory and disgrace the pride of man in all.

2. To glorify God. There is great power and glory in the substance and life of Christianity. Though the ministers were poor and unlearned, and the converts generally of the meanest rank, yet the hand of the Lord went along with the preachers, and was mighty in the hearts of the hearers : and Jesus Christ was made both to ministers and Christians what was truly great and honorable. All we have, we have from God as the Fountain, and in and through Christ as the Channel of conveyance. He is made of God to us Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption, v. 30. all we need, or can desire. We are foolishness, ignorant and blind in the things of God ; and He is made Wisdom to us. We are guilty, obnoxious to justice ; and He is made Righteousness, our great Atonement and Sacrifice. We are depraved and corrupt ; and He is made Sanctification, the Spring of our spiritual life ; from Him, the Head, it is communicated to all the members of his mystical body by his Holy Spirit. We are in bonds, and He is made Redemption to us, our Savior and Deliverer. Observe, Where Christ is made Righteousness to any soul, He is also made Sanctification. He never discharges from the guilt of sin, without delivering from the power of it ; and He is made Righteousness and Sanctification, that He may in the end be made complete Redemption, and free the soul from the very being of sin, and loose the body from the bonds of the grave : and what is designed in all, is, that all flesh may glory in the Lord, v. 31. Observe, It is the will of God, that all our glorying should be in the Lord : and our salvation being only through Christ, it is thereby effectually provided it should be so. Man is humbled, and God glorified and exalted, by the whole scheme.

CHAP. II. V. 1—5. In this passage the apostle pursues his design, and reminds the Corinthians how he acted when he first preached the Gospel among them.

I. He determined to know nothing among

PRACT. OBS. The true 'church of God' comprises all those, in every place, who are 'sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints,' who call on Him, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' for all the blessings of salvation ; and who acknowledge and obey Him as their Lord, and the Lord of all saints, of all men, and of all creatures ; and it includes no other persons. — But ministers, with a mixture of authority and affection, should remind their flocks, that an account must be given of all their advantages at the coming of Christ, and call on them daily to wait and prepare for that event. — How striking is the contrast between the language of the apostle in these vs. and that of many modern divines ! The name of the Lord Jesus Christ was to him the sweetest melody, or 'as ointment poured forth ;' Cant. 1:3. they fear a too frequent, or too honorable mention of Him ! and [too often avoid] enlarging on his dignity and condescension, his love and atoning sufferings, his character and offices, his righteousness and salvation. 2:I, 2.—Satan has always endeavored to stir up strife among Christians, as one of his grand devices against the Gospel ; we should, therefore, use all our influence to prevail with our brethren, by the name, and for the honor of our common Lord, to avoid contests of every kind, and as much as possible to 'speak the same thing, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment ;' and we should persevere in endeavoring and praying for this most desirable harmony, and for 'the meekness of wisdom,' that we may know how to counteract the pestilent endeavors of the fire-brands of the church, without giving them any handle or plausible pretence against us.—All attempts, to make the real Gospel palatable to worldly men, must be unsuccessful ; it always was, and always will be, 'foolishness' to such as are in the road to destruction ; and the only way to render it inoffensive, is to leave out, or but slightly touch on, the offensive parts of it ; and this is too commonly done, when preachers study to embellish their doctrine and recommend themselves, by 'the wisdom of words, or the excellency of speech.' But the true minister of Christ is no 'man-pleaser ;' he will, with 'great plainness of speech,' deliver his whole message, however it may be derided or reviled ; that by it, as a sure touchstone, men may learn their real state and character. — Such persons [learned scribes, wise philosophers, and the eager 'disputers of this world'], are, indeed, commonly found among the despisers or opposers of the doctrine of Christ crucified ; but what have they ever done towards rendering the world wise and holy ? Or what have they to propose so excellent, as to merit a preference to that Gospel which they reject, or even to bear a comparison with it ? Undeniable facts evince the folly of this wisdom ; and show, that amidst all the displays of the 'eternal power and Godhead,' with which we are surrounded, human reason, sagacity, and learning [without revelation] know Him not, but uniformly lead men to idolatry, impiety, or infidelity ; and on the other hand, 'it hath pleased God,' from age to age, by 'the foolishness of preaching,' (the despised doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Savior, God in human nature, 'purchasing the church with his own blood,' delivered with unadorned simplicity,) to save multitudes, even all that believe, from ignorance, delusion, and vice ; and to make them meet for his heavenly kingdom.

have the same reason to say also, that He is made our Wisdom, by his wisdom imputed to us, &c.' Whitby. There might be some weight in this objection, if this were the only passage of Scripture, by which those who hold 'imputed righteousness' prove their doctrine ; if there were any other passages in the sacred oracles, which even seem to countenance the notion of imputed wisdom, or sanctification, or redemption ; and if the nature of the case were not essentially different. Another may pay my debt, and allow me to receive the wages which he has earned, or the reward to which his services entitle him ; thus his payment and his labor may be set down to my account, or imputed to me for my adequate advantage ; but who can have wisdom, health, or liberty, by imputation ? (27, 28.) 'Who is there, almost, that measures wisdom by simplicity, strength by suffering, dignity by lowliness ? Who is there that counts it first to be last, something to be nothing, and reckons himself to be of great command in that he is a servant ? Yet God, when He meant to subdue the world and hell at once, part of that to salvation, and this wholly to perdition, made choice of no other weapons or auxiliaries than these, whether to save or to destroy. It had been a small mastery to Him to have drawn out his legions into array, and flanked them with his thunder ; therefore, He sent Foolishness to confute Wisdom, Weakness to bind Strength, Despisedness to vanquish Pride. And this is the great mystery of the Gospel, made good in Christ Himself, who came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and must be fulfilled in all his ministers, till his second coming.'

MILTON.

(30.) 'In these difficult words we must attend to the Heb. and Hellenistic idiom. There is, throughout the sentence, a metonymy of the effect for the cause ; and we have also the abstract for the concrete. The sense, then, is : "who was made by God, the means of wisdom (the true and only wisdom, worthy the name, being imparted to us ; since by Him and his doctrine alone are we enabled to contemplate God and his arcana, which even the most acute human inquiries could never have imagined." "The Cause of our justification, and the Author and promoter of our sanctification, both by imparting pure doctrine, by the example of his own holy life, and especially by procuring for us the assistance of the Holy Spirit." NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. When the apostle came, as a Jewish stranger, among the polite, speculating, and licentious Corinthians ; he did not attempt to catch their attention, by affected elegance or sublimity of language, for it was his sole object, to declare 'the testimony of them but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified; to make a show of no other knowledge than this; to preach nothing, to discover the knowledge of nothing, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. Christ, in his Person and offices, is the Sum and Substance of the Gospel, and ought to be the great Subject of a gospel-minister's preaching.

God, concerning the only way of salvation from eternal misery, and of obtaining eternal life; and a message of such immense importance, would not admit of these worthless embellishments. This [Christ and Him crucified] was the centre and substance of his preaching: but it is evident, that he did not confine himself wholly to this one topic, so as to exclude other parts of the revealed truth and will of God. For we are sure, from his own writings, that he preached man's relation to God, as his Creator, Benefactor, and Governor; the glorious perfections and the holy law of God; the future judgment and eternal state of righteous retributions; the lost estate of man, regeneration, repentance, conversion, the necessity of personal holiness, attention to relative duties; and in short 'the whole counsel of God,' as the great circumference to that circle, of which 'Christ crucified' is the centre, in which all the lines meet. (1) Declaring.] The apostle came as a messenger, simply to deliver a message, even 'the sure testimony of God,' without alteration, omission, decoration, or addition; the whole of what he was sent to deliver, nothing more, and in all simplicity.—'What extraordinary claims are advanced,—what pretensions made in this ch. 1.—How pointed is it on the subject of inspiration! If the sacred writers were in any degree true men, they were then fully inspired in all which they taught concerning religion. The miracles which they wrought, prove them true men, whatever their pretensions might be, and their own words show what these pretensions were.'

(1.) Excellency, i. e. sublimity of doctrine, and of wisdom.] This excellency of wisdom was creditation, especially philosophical; thought at Corinth, the only true wisdom. Ros., who obs., that Paul 'abstained from using the stores of knowledge he undoubtedly possessed, because, (3:1) they were tyros (sarkikoi), and could not comprehend higher doctrines.' 'To preach and commemorate the whole history of Jesus Christ, his origin, birth, life, doctrine, and especially his death, and the important doctrines connected with it. Comp. 15:1—4. This is always the sense of the formula. Thus to preach Christ, is of yet more comprehensive signification.'

V. 3—5. 'By the demonstration of the Spirit, many expositors understand exclusively the miracles, by which the Holy Spirit powerfully demonstrated the truth of the Gospel; of the prophecies which were fulfilled in those things, which the apostles preached concerning Jesus and his salvation; but these proofs, however conclusive, without the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, as the Author of divine life in regeneration, would not have produced true faith; and it is unreasonable to confine the language to those operations, which were peculiar to one age, and to exclude such as are alike necessary, and alike to be depended on, in every age. 1 Thess. 1:5—3. 2:13—16. The annexed reason, however, puts it beyond all reasonable doubt, that the latter were principally intended; for the apostle would use no other arts of persuasion, than that plain and faithful address to the hearts and consciences of men, which the Spirit of God always makes use of in convincing them of sin, and in powerfully demonstrating the truth and preciousness of the Gospel to their souls; because he would not have their 'faith to

II. The manner wherein he preached Christ, is here also observable. 1. Negatively, v. 4. He did not affect to appear a fine orator, or a deep philosopher; did not set himself to captivate the ear by fine turns and eloquent expressions; nor please and entertain the fancy with lofty flights of sublime notions. Divine wisdom needed not to be set off with such human ornaments. 2. Positively, v. 1. He published a divine revelation, and gave in sufficient vouchers for the authority of it, both by its consonancy to ancient predictions, and by present miraculous operations; and there he left the matter: yet his speech and preaching were in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power, v. 3, 4. His enemies in the church of Corinth spake very contemptuously of him, 2 Cor. 10:10. Possibly, he had a little body, and a low voice; but though he had not so good an elocution as some, it is plain he was no mean speaker: for the men of Lystra looked on him to be Mercury, the heathen god of eloquence, Acts 14:12. Nor did he want courage or resolution to go through his work; he was in nothing terrified by his adversaries. Yet he was no boaster. He did not proudly vaunt himself, like his opposers. He acted in his office with much modesty, concern, and care, lest he should mismanage in his trust. None know the fear and trembling of faithful ministers, who are jealous over souls with a godly jealousy: and a deep sense of their own weakness is the occasion of this fear and trembling. But though Paul managed with this modesty and concern, yet he spake with authority, in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power. He laid down the doctrine as the Spirit delivered it; and left the Spirit, by his external operation in signs and miracles, and his internal influences on the hearts of men, to demonstrate the truth of it, and procure its reception.

III. The end for which he preached Christ crucified in this manner, v. 5. that they might not be drawn by human motives, or overcome by mere human arguments, lest it should be said, that either rhetoric or logic had made them Christians. But when nothing but Christ crucified was plainly preached, the success must be entirely attributed to a divine power accompanying the Word: that God might appear and be glorified in all.

V. 6—16. In this part of the ch. the apostle shows them, that though he had not come to them with any of the boasted knowledge and literature of the Jews or Greeks, yet he had communicated to them a treasure of the truest and the highest wisdom, v. 6. especially to such as were well instructed in Christianity, and had come to maturity in the things of God: not indeed the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, but the wisdom of God in a mystery: v. 6, 7. not worldly wisdom, but divine; not such as the men of this world could have discovered, nor such as worldly men, under the conduct of pride, and passion, and appetite, and worldly interest, and destitute of the Spirit of God, can receive. How different is the judgment of God from that of the world! The wisdom He teaches is of a quite different kind from what passes under that notion in the world. It is what God had a long time kept to Himself, and concealed from the world, and the depth of which, now it is revealed, none but Himself can fathom. It is the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, though now made manifest to the saints, Col. 1:26. hid, in a manner, entirely from the heathen world, and made mysterious to the Jews, by being wrapped up in dark types and distant prophecies, but revealed and made known to us by the Spirit of God. Now concerning this wisdom, observe,

I. The rise and original of it, v. 7. It was ordained of God; He had determined long ago to reveal and make it known, nay, from eternity; and that to our glory, the glory of us, either us apostles, or us Christians. It was a great honor put on the apostles, to be intrusted with the revelation of this wisdom. It was a great and honorable privilege for Christians, to have this glorious wisdom discovered to them. And the wisdom of God stand on the wisdom of men, but on the power of God.' 1:17—19. 2 Cor. 4:7. Now that faith, which is produced by outward miracles, and wholly rests on them, is no more saving, or to be depended on, than that which is the effect of logical reasonings or eloquent persuasions. Acts 8:9—24. but the faith, which is the effect of the inward and powerful teaching and 'demonstration of the Spirit,' rests on the power of God, and is supported by it; and will endure through all trials even to the end. Sc.

(3.) 'Ros. tr. "I carried myself among you, as weak, (unlearned, or timid,) and very modest;" phobō and tromō, must mean modesty and bashfulness, he says; yet Chrys. and the Gr. comtrs. explain them otherwise. Storr refers weakness to Paul's imbecility of body, 2 Cor. 10:10, i. e. a thin, weak voice, and a hesitation in pronunciation. Yet it may also refer to the extreme smallness of stature, stooping, &c. which are ascribed to the apostle; and so Schoett. Indeed, the word here, and 2 Cor. 10:10. not improbably, refer to the same infirmities or disadvantages as the thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. 12:7. Then in weakness will refer to the fear justly excited by his persecutors, and the en phobō kai tromō to his modesty and bashfulness. After all, however, I grant that there is much to be said in defence of other interpretations, and it is very difficult to determine exactly Paul's meaning.'

(4.) Enticing.] Persuasive, persuading. Ed. V. 6—9. It was 'the wisdom of God in a mystery,' even in the mysterious design of glorifying his holy name and all his perfections, in the redemption of sinners, by the incarnation, righteousness, atoning sacrifice, and mediation of his co-equal Son. Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12. 1 Tim. 3:16. (7) Ordained. Predestinated] Rom. 8:28—31. See on Acts 4:28. 'It signifies little to bring such expressions down to any period of time. If it be granted, that they intend anything, previous to the existence of those to whom they refer, the same difficulties will still lie in the way; nor is it possible to avoid them.' Doddr.—(9) Eye hath not seen.] Not from the LXX, nor an exact tr. from the Heb.; but it gives the general sense of the v. Is. 64:4. Scott.

discovered in the Gospel, prepares for our everlasting glory and happiness in the world to come. The counsels of God concerning our redemption are dated from eternity, and designed for the glory and happiness of the saints. And what deep wisdom was in these counsels! The wisdom of God is both employed and displayed for the honor of his saints; employed from eternity, and displayed in time, to make them glorious both here and hereafter, in time and to eternity. What honor!

II. The ignorance of the great men of the world about it, v. 8. the principal men in authority and power, or in wisdom and learning. The Roman governor, and the guides and rulers of the Jewish church and nation, seem chiefly meant. Observe, Jesus Christ is the Lord of glory; a title much too great for any creature to bear: and therefore was He hated, because not known. Had his crucifixion known Him, known who and what He was, they would have withheld their impious hands, and not have taken and slain Him. This He pleaded with his Father for their pardon, Lu. 23:34. There are things which people would not do, if they knew the wisdom of God in the great work of redemption. They act as they do, because they are blind or heedless. They know not [will not know] the truth, or attend to it.

III. It is such wisdom as could not have been discovered without a revelation; according to what Isaiah says, ch. 64:4. as the LXX. It was a testimony of love to God in the Jewish believers, to live in expectation of the accomplishment of evangelical promises. Waiting on God is an evidence of love to Him, Is. 25:9. Observe, There are things which God hath prepared for them that love Him, and wait for Him, things in a future life, 2 Tim. 1:10. But the apostle speaks here of the subject matter of the divine revelation under the Gospel. These are such as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard. Observe, The great truths of the Gospel are things lying out of the sphere of human discovery, but by the light of revelation. And therefore we must take them as they lie in the Scriptures, and as God has been pleased to reveal them.

IV. We here see by whom this wisdom is discovered to us, v. 10. The Scripture is given by inspiration of God, 2 Pet. 1:21. Here is a proof of the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. Paul wrote what he taught; and what he taught was revealed of God by his Spirit, v. 11. A double argument is drawn from these words, in proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost.

1 Omniscience is attributed to Him; He searches all things, even the deep things of God. He has exact knowledge of all things, and enters into the very depths of God, penetrates into his most secret counsels. Now, who can have such a thorough knowledge of God, but God?

2. This allusion seems to imply, that the Holy Spirit is as much in God, as a man's mind is in himself. Now the mind of the man is plainly essential to him. He cannot be without his mind. Nor can God be without his Spirit. He is as much and as intimately one with God, as the man's mind is with the man. The man knows his own mind, because his mind is one with himself. The Spirit of God knows the things of God, because He is one with God. And as no man can come at the knowledge of what is in another man's mind, till he communicates and reveals it; so neither can we know the secret counsels and purposes of God, till they are made known to us by his Holy Spirit. And it was by this Spirit that the apostles had received the wisdom of God in a mystery, which they spake, v. 12. not the spirit which is in the wise men of the world, v. 6. nor in the rulers of the world, v. 8. but the Spirit which is of God, proceedeth from God. We have what we deliver in the name of God, by inspiration from Him; and it is by his gracious illumination and influence, that we know the things freely given to us of God, unto salvation, i. e. the great privileges of the Gospel, which are the free gift of God, distributions of mere and rich grace.' Though these things are given us, and the revelation of this gift be made to us, we cannot know them to any saving purpose, till we have the Spirit.

V. We see here in what manner this wisdom was taught or communicated, v. 13. the Spirit of God not only gave the knowledge of these things, but gave them utterance. The truths of God need no garnishing by human skill or eloquence, but look best in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual, one part of revelation with another; the Gospel, the N. T. with the types and prophecies of the Old: if the principles of human art and science are to be made a test of revelation, we shall certainly judge amiss concerning it, and the things contained in it. Or, adapting spiritual things to spiritual; speaking of spiritual matters, matters of revelation, and the spiritual life, in language that is proper and plain. The language of the Spirit of God is the most proper to convey his meaning.

VI. How this wisdom is received.

1. Not by the natural man, v. 14. the animal man. Either, (1.) The man under the power of corruption, and never yet illuminated by the Spirit of God, such as Jude calls sensual, not having the Spirit, v. 19. Not that the natural faculty of discerning is lost, but evil inclinations and wicked principles render the man unwilling to enter into the mind of God, in the spiritual matters of his kingdom, and yield to their force and power. Or, (2.) The natural man, i. e. the wise man of the world, ch. 1:19, 20. the wise man after the flesh, or according to the flesh, v. 26. one who hath the wisdom of the world, man's wisdom, ch. 2:4—6. a man, as some of the ancients, that would learn all truth by his own ratiocinations, receive nothing by faith, nor own any need of supernatural assistance. This was very much the character of the pretenders to philosophy, and the Grecian learning and wisdom, in that day. Such a man receives not the things of the Spirit of God. Revelation is not with him a principle of science; he looks on it as delirium and dotage, the extravagant thought of some deluded dreamer. It is no way to wisdom among the famous masters of the world; and for that reason he can have no knowledge of things revealed, because they are only spiritually discerned, or made known by the revelation of the Spirit, which is a principle of science or knowledge which he will not admit.

2. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged, or discerned, of no man, v. 15. Either, (1.) He who is sanctified, and made spiritually-minded, Rom. 8:6. judgeth all things, or discerneth

Others, who preach the same grand truths, have them only by mediate revelation; and the doctrine of all uninspired preachers must be assayed by that of the apostles. Mat. 16:19. Sc. V. 14—16 The term [natural] here used, has occasioned much dispute; but, as it is derived from a word, which sometimes, at least, signifies the rational soul; it may be supposed to have reference to the powers of his mind, as well as to his inferior inclinations.—It is opposed to the regenerate man, and to the glorified, i. e. the perfectly regenerated man. A man that hath only natural abilities and perfections, Leigh. One that has not the Spirit of God.—The apostle's argument absolutely requires, that by 'the natural man' we understand the unregenerate man, however sagacious, learned, or abstracted from sensual indulgences: for he opposes him to the spiritual man; and the pride of carnal reasoning is, at least, as opposite to spirituality, as the most grovelling sensuality can be. Gal. 5:19—23. No man, as naturally born into the world, and not supernaturally born again of the Spirit, 'can see the kingdom of God,' or receive, in faith and love, the spiritual mysteries of redemption, by the cross of Christ. John 3:3—3. 14:15—17. To all unregenerate men, these things will, in one way or other, appear 'foolishness,' uninteresting, unnecessary, inconsistent, or absurd; and doubtless proud reasoners have scoffed at them, more than ever mere sensualists did. 1:20—25. No ingenuity, address, or reasoning of the preacher can prevent this effect; no application of the man's own mind, except in humble dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, can enable him to perceive the real nature and glory of them. 'For they are spiritually discerned,' i. e. by the illuminating and sanctifying work of the Spirit of God on the mind; by which a spiritual capacity is produced, which discerns, admires, loves, and delights in the divine excellency of heavenly things. When this change has taken place, and a man's spiritual senses have been matured by growth and exercise, he may be called 'a spiritual man;' and he perceives the spiritual glory and excellency of every truth and precept in the Word of God; he distinguishes one object from another by a spiritual taste, or a kind of contemporaneous judgment, and so he becomes a competent judge in these matters. Yet his views, principles, and motives do not fall under the judgment of any other men; none are competent to decide on the propriety of his conduct, as they are strangers to those views and discoveries, which direct his determinations. Acts 16:1—3. P. O. 1—12. For 'who hath known the mind of the Lord,' or can be capable of 'instructing him,' who is inspired by the Holy Spirit? As therefore the apostle, and other inspired persons, were made acquainted with 'the mind of Christ,' by whom the Father reveals Himself to men: none of those who presumed to judge them could be competent to decide, either on their doctrine, or their manner of communicating it. They were, in the very order of things, above such instructors or censurers, who could not possibly understand the principles on which they acted. M. and M. R. In a measure, all 'spiritual' men 'have the mind of Christ,' and unregenerate men are incompetent judges of their conduct; yet this is in everything to be tried by the Word of God; and nothing must be justified or excused, which does not accord with that rule, when properly all things; he is capable of judging about matters of human wisdom, and has also a relish and savor of divine truths; the sanctified mind discerns the real beauties of holiness: but by the refinement of its faculties, they do not lose their power of discerning and judging about common and natural things. The spiritual man may judge of all things, natural and supernatural, human and divine, the deductions of reason, and the discoveries of revelation. But he himself is judged or discerned of NO MAN. God's saints are his hidden ones, Ps. 83: 3. Col. 3: 3. The carnal man knows no more of a spiritual man, than he does of other spiritual things. He is a stranger to the principles, and pleasures, and actings, of the divine life. The spiritual man does not lie open to his observation. Or, (2.) He that is spiritual, has had divine revelations made to him, receives them as such, and founds his faith and religion on them; he can judge both of common things and things divine; he can discern what is, and what is not, the doctrine of the Gospel, and of salvation; he does not lose the power of reasoning, nor renounce the principles of it, by founding his faith and religion on revelation. But he himself is judged of no man; can be judged, so as to be confuted, by no man; nor can any man who is not spiritual, not under a divine afflatus himself, (see ch. 14: 37.) or not founding his faith on a divine revelation, discern or judge whether what he speaks be true, or divine, or not. In short, he who finds his knowledge on principles of science, and the mere light of reason, can never be a judge of the truth or falsehood of what is received by revelation. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him, v. 16. the spiritual man? Who can enter so far into the mind of God, as to instruct him who has the Spirit of God, and is under his inspiration? But, adds the apostle, we have the mind of Christ: and the mind of Christ is the mind of God. He is God, and the principal Messenger and Prophet of God; the apostles were empowered by his Spirit to make known his mind to us; and in the Holy Scriptures, the mind of Christ, and the mind of God in Christ, are fully revealed to us. This is the great privilege of Christians.

CHAP. III. V. 1-4. I. Paul blames the Corinthians for their weakness and non-proficiency, v. 1. So far from forming their maxims and measures on the foot of divine revelation, and entering into the spirit of the Gospel, it was but too evident, they were much under the command of carnal and corrupt affections. They had received some of the first principles of Christianity, but were grown up to no maturity of understanding in them, or of faith and holiness: yet they were very proud of their wisdom and knowledge. It is but too common for persons of very moderate knowledge and understanding to have a great measure of self-conceit. The apostle assigns their little proficiency in the knowledge of Christianity, as a reason why he had communicated no more of the deep things of it to them, v. 2. Note, A faithful minister must consult the capacities of his hearers, and teach them as they can bear: yet babes grow to be men; and babes in Christ should endeavor to become men in Christ. It is expected their advances

PRACT. OBS. How surprising, that this most honored servant of Christ, should be constrained to justify his divinely excellent and useful preaching, even to the very persons, who had been converted by it! But this surprise should be connected with admiration of the divine wisdom, in taking occasion from that circumstance, to give the church most valuable instructions, concerning the best method of 'declaring the testimony of God' to sinners.—If this arduous service, made even this great apostle to fear and tremble, through conscious weakness; what reason have we to be humble and diffident, when called to declare the same testimony to mankind! 2 Cor. 2:14-17. How should we fear disgracing this honorable ministry, by our own folly or sin! At what a distance should we keep from all ambition and self-confidence! How carefully should we remember, that all 'our sufficiency is of God' alone! The more deeply we are convinced, that no arguments or eloquence of man can, by their own efficacy, produce saving faith; the greater care we shall take to speak in a plain, serious, and scriptural manner; and in imitation of those preachers of old, whose word was attended with

'demonstration of the Spirit and of power;' depending singly on his effectual operation to bring our hearers to believe, to the salvation of their souls.—No man truly understands or properly values divine revelation, except that divine Spirit, who revealed them to the apostles, removes the veil from his heart, and enables him to perceive their real excellency. (Notes and P. O. 2 Cor. 3:7-18.) On this great Teacher we must simply depend, while we seek to know 'the things that are freely given by God' to his people, and to obtain the assurance that we belong to that favored company.—Whoever teaches, or what language soever is employed, 'the natural man' will either oppose, despise, or pervert 'the things of the Spirit of God;' he cannot cordially receive or rightly understand them; they will remain foolishness to him, because he is destitute of spiritual discernment. On the other hand, he who is 'born of God;' however destitute of genius and learning, will become spiritual, and capable of discerning the harmony and glory of divine truth; will experience its sanctifying effects in his heart, and produce correspondent fruits in his life.

explained. But the inspired apostles were employed, to state that 'mind of Christ,' by which men's principles and actions must be judged, both at present, and at the day of judgment; and, in this respect, they could not be liable to be judged by any man.—Some, indeed, explain the last v. as an inquiry, whether any man had so known the mind of the Lord, as to be competent to give Him any counsel or instruction. Rom. 11:33-35. But the context rather fixes the meaning to the preceding interpretation; and the apostle intended to expose the absurdity of a 'natural' man presuming to instruct 'a spiritual man,' in respect of 'spiritual things!' or of an ordinary Christian, or teacher, presuming to censure or dictate to an inspired apostle, as he thus declared himself to be! It is probable he had in mind, but he does not expressly quote, Is. 40:12-17.

(says Par.) from defect of light and corruption of heart. For, as Aristotle says, wickedness perverts the judgment, and makes men err with respect to practical principles; so that no one can be wise and judicious who is not good.

(14.) Natural.] 'Psychikos: who follows only the impulses of nature, common to the brutes; who considers only objects which strike the senses, and the things of this life. For psychē is that sort of instinct, which men have in common with the brutes, to follow which, is equivalent to following concupiscence. [Rather their "innate, impulsive faculties, objective and intellectual, as they exist before "regeneration."] Thus in Jude, 19. the psychikoi and the pneuma echontes are distinguished. And in Jos. 1, 2. God is said to have instilled into Adam, pneuma and psychēn. The psychikoi, therefore, are those who are led merely by sensual, [and other natural, (as at end of Rom. 7.)] impulses, and do not follow, as becomes rational [and holy] beings, right [inspired] reason; and, especially, do not weigh the truth and authority of religion, [full of the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit,] neither attend to the representations of others, nor use the opportunity of learning [or receive, realize, and appropriate it]; neither examine what [it] is offered to them for, nor make trial of what they have heard, so as to understand its value; but rashly reject what they perceive to be contrary to their own opinions, Ja. 3:15. Men of this kind (says Noesselt) do not, hence, admit (dechousi [receive]) the more perfect doctrine of revelation, but reject and account it foolishness. So Chrys., and Theoph. who takes psychichos for phusikos, and aptly illustrates thus: the eyes, though the most beautiful and useful of the members, yet, without light, cannot see. So the psychē cannot discern, unless enlightened by the H. S. So Theod. See also Calv., De Dieu, Grot., Salmasius, Wets., Doddr. Cappell takes psychē to answer to the Heb. nephsh, the anima common to all men, from which proceed the motions and affections, [note, end of Rom. 7.] common to all, and naturally corrupt [ed]. The pneuma is the Heb. ruch, the H. S., or the mind, reformed and regenerated by its influences. And so Vittr. and Schoett.'

(15.) All things.] I. e. which pertain to the case. Ep. (16.) 'This part of the epistle is very artificially conducted. Paul is now aiming at the great point of establishing his authority, which had been suspected, amongst them; yet he does not directly propose, but obliquely insinuate arguments against such suspicions; arguments which might possess their minds, before they were aware of what he intended to effect by them.'

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-3. Many of the Corinthians had been seduced into a mean opinion of the apostle's ministry, because he had not fully instructed them in those abstruse subjects, on which some of their teachers had particularly insisted, and about which they plausibly speculated: he therefore here assigns the reason of his conduct in this respect. The simplest truths of the Gospel, respecting the sinfulness of man, and the rich mercy of God as shown in redemption by the blood of Emmanuel; with regeneration, faith in Christ, the necessity and nature of holiness; the influences and fruits of the Spirit; the day of judgment, and eternal happiness and misery; delivered in the simplest, plainest language, suited them far better, than those deeper mysteries, which led to mere speculation, and which afforded the teacher a fairer opportunity of showing his knowledge, ingenuity, and capacity.—It is evident, that by carnal, and as men, the apostle does not here intend the prevalence of sensual appetites, but that of malignant passions; not the propensities of the animal, but those of the fallen spirit; and this may confirm the interpretation given of this, and similar words, in other places. (Rom. 8:1-13. Gal. 5:19-26.)—As 'spiritual' is opposed to 'carnal,' it must relate exclusively to the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit; and not at all to miraculous endowments. The Corinthians were enriched with the latter, but some of them seemed altogether destitute of the former, and the generality of them were but 'babes in Christ.' (1) Carnal.] 3, 4. 2 Cor. 1:12. See on Rom. 7:14. The apostle considered the Romans capable of receiving the simpler parts of 'the things of the Spirit of God;' which 'the natural man cannot receive.' (2:14.) 'Carnal,' in this place cannot mean more than 'natural;' and a man may be 'carnal' in some respects, and yet not altogether destitute of what is 'spiritual.' [Comp. note, end of Rom. 7.]

(14.) Receiveth.] 'Admit, hear, follow.' BL. Realize, appropriate? Ed. Know.] 'Fully understand and appreciate their excellence, both (Grot.) and flow not from the life of God in the soul of man, by the Spirit of grace.

4 For while one saith, I <sup>am</sup> of Paul; and another, I <sup>am</sup> of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even <sup>as</sup> the Lord gave to every man?

6 I have planted, Apollos watered; but God <sup>gave</sup> the increase.

7 So then, neither <sup>is</sup> he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase.

8 Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man <sup>shall</sup> receive his own reward, according to his own labor.

9 For we are laborers together <sup>with</sup> God: ye are God's <sup>husbandry</sup>, ye are God's <sup>building</sup>.

10 According <sup>to</sup> the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is <sup>laid</sup>, which is Jesus Christ.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

13 Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it <sup>shall</sup> be revealed by fire: and the <sup>fire</sup> shall try every man's work, of what sort it is.

in knowledge should be in proportion to their means and opportunities, and their time of professing religion; that they may be able to bear discourses of the mysteries of our religion, and not always rest in plain things. It was a reproach to the Corinthians, that they had so long sat under the ministry of Paul, and had made no more improvement. Christians are utterly to blame, who do not endeavor to grow in grace and knowledge.

II. They had mutual emulations, and quarrels, and factions among them, on account of their ministers, v. 4. These were proofs of their being carnal; that fleshly interests and affections too much swayed them. Contentions and quarrels about religion are sad evidences of remaining carnality. True religion makes men peaceable. Factious spirits act on human principles, not on principles of true religion; are guided by their own pride and passions, not by the rules of Christianity; Do ye not walk as men? It is to be lamented, that many who should walk as Christians, i. e. above the common rate of men, do indeed live and act too much like other men.

V. 5-10. The apostle instructs them how to cure this.

I. By reminding them, that the ministers about whom they contended, were but ministers, v. 5. mere instruments, used by the God of all grace. Observe, All the gifts and powers that even apostles discovered and exerted in the work of the ministry, were from God. They were intended to manifest their mission and doctrine to be divine. Both were useful, one for one purpose, the other for a different. Paul was fitted for planting, Apollos for watering; but God gave the increase. The success of the ministry must be derived from the divine blessing, v. 7. Even apostolical ministers are nothing of themselves, can do nothing with efficacy and success. The best qualified and most faithful ministers, have a just sense of their own insufficiency, and are very desirous that God should have all the glory of their success.

II. By representing to them the unanimity of Christ's ministers, v. 8. how they are employed by one Master, intrusted with the same revelation, busied in one work, and engaged in one design; having their different gifts from one and the same Spirit, for the very same purposes. All the faithful ministers of Christ, heartily concur in the great design of honoring God and saving souls, by promoting true Christianity in the world. All such may expect a glorious recompense of their fidelity, and in proportion to it; Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labor. They that are most faithful, shall have the greatest reward; and glorious work it is, in which all faithful ministers are employed. They are laborers with God, co-workers, fellow-laborers, v. 9. not indeed in the same order and degree, but in subordination to Him, working together with God, in promoting the purposes of his glory, and the salvation of precious souls; 'Ye are God's husbandry, God's building. We work under Him, and with Him, and for Him.' He had employed the former metaphor before, and now he goes on to the other of a building. Paul here calls himself a wise master-builder; a character doubly reflecting honor on him. It was honorable, to be a master-builder in the edifice of God; but it added to his character, to be a wise one. But he gives himself such a character, not to gratify his own pride, but to magnify divine grace. It is no crime in a Christian, but much to his commendation, to notice the good that is in him, to the praise of divine grace. Spiritual pride is abominable, but to notice the favors of God, to promote our gratitude to Him, and to speak of them to his honor, is but a proper expression of the duty and regard we owe Him. It was Paul that laid the foundation of a church among them. He had begotten them through the Gospel, ch. 4:15. Whatever instructors they had besides, they had not many fathers! nor would he be robbed of his own honor and respect. Faithful ministers may and ought to have a concern for their own reputation. Their usefulness depends much on it; But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon. This is a proper caution; there may be very indifferent building on a good foundation, and great care should be used, not only to lay a sure and right foundation, but to erect a regular building upon it. Ministers of Christ should take great care that they do not build their own fancies or false reasonings on the foundation of divine revelation. What they preach should be the plain doctrine of their Master, or what is perfectly agreeable with it.

V. 11-15. Here the apostle informs us what foundation he had laid at the bottom of all his labors among them,—even Jesus Christ, the chief Corner-stone, Eph. 2:20. On this foundation all the faithful ministers of Christ build. On this Rock, all Christians found their hopes. They that build their hopes of heaven on any other foundation, build on the sand. Other foundation can no man lay, beside what is laid,—even Jesus Christ. The doctrine of our Savior, and his mediation, is the principal doctrine of Christianity. Leave out this, and you lay waste all our comforts, and leave no foundation for our hopes as sinners. It is in Christ only that God is reconciling a sinful world to Himself, 2 Cor. 5:19. But of those that hold the foundation, and embrace the general doctrine of Christ's being the Mediator between God and man, there are two sorts.

I. Some build on this foundation gold, silver, and precious stones, v. 12. They are those who receive and propagate the pure truths of the Gospel; who hold nothing but the truth as it is in Jesus, and preach nothing else.

II. Others build wood, hay, and stubble, on this foundation; i. e. though they adhere to the foundation, they depart from the mind of Christ in many particulars; substitute their own fancies and inventions in the room of his doctrines and institutions. There is a time coming, when a discovery will be made of what men have built on this foundation; Every man's work shall be made manifest; shall be laid open to view, his own, and that of others. We may mistake as to ourselves and others; but that day will show us ourselves, and show us our actions in the true light, without covering or disguise; For the day shall declare it, every man's work, because it shall be revealed by fire, v. 13.; the last day, the great day of trial; see ch. 4:5. Though some understand it of the time when the Jewish nation was destroyed, and their constitution thereby abolished; when the superstructure, judaizing teachers would have raised on the Christian foundation, was manifested to be no better than hay and

V. 10-15. Thus far the apostle proceeded on the supposition, that the laborers were skilful and faithful; but he meant to lead the attention of the Corinthians to some who were not so. He knew that no man could lay any other foundation of a spiritual temple, for the glory of God, or for the sinner's hope of salvation, than what he had laid in his preaching, and which God had laid in his purpose, and by the Gospel; namely, the Person, mediatorial office, righteousness, atonement, intercession, and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. Is. 28:16. Mat. 16:18. Rom. 10:1-4. Eph. 2:19-22. 1 Pet. 2:4-6. If a man laid any other foundation than this, he could not be considered as one of 'the fellow-laborers of God.' (9) The apostle did not here put the supposition, that this was the case with any of their teachers. Yet, even on this Foundation, very different materials might be builded. The extreme absurdity of the papists, in producing this passage, in support of their doctrine of purgatory, is very obvious; but it is to be feared, that the zealous abettors of that doctrine, and many others of a similar nature, will be found to build wholly without a foundation. 'If any man build, I say, upon this foundation, let him look to the materials and nature of his work; whether he raise a stately and magnificent temple upon it, adorned, as it were, like the house of God at Jerusalem, with gold and silver, (and) large, beautiful, and costly stones; (or) a mean hovel, consisting of nothing better than planks of wood, roughly put together, and thatched with hay (and) stubble; i. e. let him look to it, whether he teach the substantial, vital truths which do indeed belong to Christianity, and which it was intended to support and illustrate; or set himself to propagate vain subtleties stubble, that would not bear the trial. But however this be, in that day,

1. Some men's works will abide the trial; will be found standard. It will appear, that they not only held the foundation, but that they built regularly and well upon it, with proper materials, and in due form and order. And such a builder shall not, cannot fail of a reward. He will have praise and honor in that day, and eternal recompense after it. Fidelity in the ministers of Christ will meet with full and ample reward in a future life. And, Lord, how great! how much exceeding their deserts!

2. There are others, whose works shall be burnt, v. 15. whose corrupt opinions and doctrines, or vain inventions and usages in the worship of God, shall be discovered, disowned, and rejected, in that day; shall be first manifested to be corrupt, and then disapproved of God and rejected. He whose work shall be burnt, will suffer loss. If he has built, on the right foundation, wood, and hay, and stubble, he will suffer loss. His weakness and corruption will be the lessening of his glory, though he may in the general have been an honest and an upright Christian: this part of his work turning no way to his advantage, though himself may be saved. Those who hold the foundation of Christianity, though they build hay, wood, and stubble upon it, may be saved. This may help to enlarge our charity. He shall be saved, yet so as by fire, saved out of the fire, snatched out of that flame which will consume his work. It intimates, that it will be difficult for those that corrupt and deprave Christianity, to be saved. On this passage, the papists found their doctrine of purgatory, which is certainly hay and stubble: a doctrine never originally fetched from Scripture, but invented in barbarous ages, to feed the avarice and ambition of the clergy, at the cost of such as would rather part with their money than their lusts, for the salvation of their souls. It can have no countenance from this text; for, (1.) This is plainly meant of a figurative fire, not of a real one: for what real fire can consume religious rites or doctrines? (2.) This fire is to try men's works, of what sort they are; but purgatory-fire is not for trial, not to bring men's actions to the test, but to punish for them. They are supposed to be venial sins, not satisfied for in this life, for which satisfaction must be made by suffering the fire of purgatory. (3.) This fire is to try every man's works, those of Paul and Apollos, as well as those of others. Now, no papists will have the front to say, apostles must have passed through purgatory-fires.

V. 16, 17. Here the apostle resumes his argument and exhortation, founding it on his former allusion, Ye are God's building, v. 9. It looks, from other parts of the epistle, where the apostle argues to the same purpose, see ch. 6: 13—20. as if the false teachers among the Corinthians were not only loose livers, but taught licentious doctrines, and, what was particularly fitted to the taste of this lewd city, on the head of fornication. Such doctrine was not to be reckoned among hay and stubble; that would be consumed, while the person who laid them on the foundation escaped the burning; for it tended to corrupt, to pollute, and destroy the church, which was a building erected for God, and consecrated to Him, and therefore should be kept pure and holy. Those who spread principles of this sort, would provoke God to destroy them. It may be understood also as an argument against their discord, and factious strifes; division being the way to destruction. But what I have been mentioning seems the proper meaning; Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? It may be understood of the church of Corinth collectively, or of every single believer among them; Christian churches are temples of God. He dwells among them by his Holy Spirit, Eph. 2: 22. Every Christian is a living temple of the living God. God dwelt in the Jewish temple, and Christ by his Spirit dwells in all true believers. The temple was devoted and consecrated to God, and set apart from every common to a holy use, to the immediate service of God. So all Christians are separate from common uses, and set apart for God and his service. They are sacred to Him,—a very good argument this, against all fleshly lusts, and all doctrines that give countenance to them. Christians are holy by profession, and should be pure and clean, both in heart [body] and conversation. We should heartily abhor, and carefully avoid, what will defile God's temple, and prostitute what ought to be sacred to Him.

V. 18—20. Here he prescribes humility, and a modest opinion of themselves, for the remedy of the irregularities in the church of Corinth, the divisions and contests among them, v. 18. We are in great danger of deceiving ourselves, when we have too high an opinion of human wisdom and arts. But he who seems to be wise, must become a fool, that he may be wise. He must be sensible of his own ignorance, and lament it; distrust his own understanding, and not lean on it. Self-flattery is the very next step to self-deceit. The way to true wisdom, is, to sink our opinion of our own to a due level, and be willing to be taught of God. The person who resigns his own understanding, that he may follow the instruction of God, is in the way to true and everlasting wisdom. The meek will He guide in judgment, the meek will He teach his way, Ps. 25: 9. He that has a low opinion of his own knowledge and powers, may be informed and improved by revelation: but the proud, conceited man, will undertake to correct even divine wisdom itself, and prefer his own shallow reasonings to the revelations of infallible truth and wisdom. The wisdom which worldly men esteem, (policy, philosophy, oratory,) is foolishness with God: in a way of comparison. There can be no more comparison between his wisdom and ours, than between his power and being and ours. And He knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain, v. 20. that they are vanity, Ps. 94: 11. God has a perfect knowledge of the thoughts of men, the deepest thoughts of the wisest men, their most secret counsels and purposes, Heb. 4: 13. And He knows them to be vanity. The thoughts of the wisest men in the world have a great mixture of vanity, of weakness and folly, in them; and before God their wisest and best thoughts are very vanity, compared, I mean, with his thoughts of things. And should not all this teach us modesty, diffidence in ourselves, and a deference to the wisdom of God; make us thankful for his revelations, and willing to be taught of God, and not be led away, by glorious pretences to human wisdom and skill, from the simplicity of Christ, or a regard to his heavenly doctrine?

V. 21—23. Here the apostle founds an exhortation against over-valuing their teachers, on what he had just said, and on the consideration that they had an equal interest in all their ministers, v. 21. Mankind are and conceits on the one hand, or legal rites and Jewish traditions on the other; which, though they do not absolutely destroy the foundation, disgrace it, as a mean edifice would do a grand and extensive foundation, build with great pomp and solemnity.

BLOOMF.
V. 16, 17. The indwelling of the Holy Spirit constitutes 'the temple of God'; this is express testimony to his Deity. 'They are said by the apostle to defile the temple of God, who corrupted the purity of the Gospel by carnal eloquence; and who rent the church by factions.' Beza.—'The like words used, (6:16—19.) by way of dehortation from fornication, and (2 Cor. 6:16.) from communion with heathen, in their idolatrous rites and heathen practices; and by way of inducement to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit;" (2 Cor. 7:1.) more naturally incline us to refer these vs. to the corrupting of the temple of God, by uncleanness and fornication, or by idolatrous practices; both which the Corinthians did.' Whitby. It does not, however, appear, that there is any necessity of confining the interpretation to this, or the other kind of defilement; and in proportion as the declaration is made general, it becomes more and more important. The verb rendered 'destroy,' is the same with that before translated 'defile.'

SCOTT.
(16.) Bloomf. thinks, 'what is here said, is not to be understood of individuals, but of the whole community of Christians, at least at Corinth; and Paul uses an O. T. mode of speaking, where God is said to dwell among the Jews, and they are said to be the temple and habitation of God. Lev. 26:11, 12. Ez. 37:27. Philo and the Rabbins use the metaphor. So Rabbi Aschek, on Hag. 2. remarks, that the Israelitish people are said to be the temple of God.' He acknowledges, however, that the Holy Spirit exerting its pleasure in that community, it may be applied in that metaphorical sense to its individuals; but why is it not actually and really true of the regenerate? 6:19. John 14:17. Rom. 8: 9—11.

very apt to make the mercies of God cross their intentions. The ministry is a very useful and very gracious institution, and faithful ministers are a great blessing to any people; yet the folly and weakness of people may do much mischief by what is in itself a blessing. They may fall into factions, side with particular ministers, and set them at their head, glory in their leaders, and be carried by them they know not whither. The only way to avoid this mischief, is, to have a modest opinion of ourselves, a due sense of the common weakness of human understanding, and an entire deference to the wisdom of God speaking in his Word. Ministers are not to be set up in competition with one another.

On this occasion also, he gives an inventory of the church's possessions, the spiritual riches of a true believer; 'All is yours; ministers of all ranks, ordinary and extraordinary. [All their gifts are for your advantage. You do not exist for the sake of teachers, but they for the sake of you.] Nay, PRACT. OBS. Ministers should suit their instruction to the state and wants of their hearers, and teach them such things, as more immediately tend to their edification; rather than insist continually on those subjects which are agreeable to their own inclinations, or those of any party.—Men may have much doctrinal knowledge, and yet be mere novices in the life of faith and experience; nay, their promptitude to speculations, and their acuteness in them, may prove them to be in a great degree 'carnal,' and very imperfectly grounded even in the first principles of experimental and practical religion. Thus many professed Christians, yea preachers, show themselves to be 'yet carnal,' by their vain-glorious emulations, their eagerness for controversy, their selfish, fiery zeal, their disposition to prefer and exalt themselves, and to despise and revile others; and their apparent delight in disturbing the peace of the church. It is an universal rule, that these evils proportionably prove, the world itself is yours.' Not that saints are proprietors of the world, but it stands for their sake; they have as much of it as Infinite Wisdom sees to be fit for them, and all with the divine blessing. 'Life is yours, that you may have season and opportunity to prepare for the life of heaven; and death is yours, that you may go to the possession of it. Things present are yours, for your support on the road; things to come are yours, to enrich and regale you for ever at your journey's end.' But it must be remembered, at the same time, that we are Christ's, the subjects of his kingdom, his property. All things are ours, on no other foot than our being Christ's. Out of Him, we are without just title or claim to anything that is good. And Christ is God's. He is the Christ of God; anointed of God, and commissioned by Him, to bear the office of a Mediator, and to act therein for the purposes of his glory. All things are the believer's, that Christ might have honor in his great undertaking, and God in all might have the glory. God in Christ reconciling a sinful world to Himself, and shedding abroad the riches of his grace on a reconciled world, is the sun and substance of the Gospel.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—6. I. The apostle challenges the respect due to him on account of his character and office, in which many among them had at least very much failed, v. 1. though possibly others might have valued him too highly, by setting him up as the head of a party, and professing to be his disciples. In our opinion of ministers, as well as all other things, we should be careful to avoid extremes. Apostles themselves were, 1. Not to be over-valued, for they were ministers, not masters; stewards, not lords. It is a very great abuse of their power, and highly criminal in common ministers, to lord it over their fellow-servants, and challenge authority over their faith or practice. For even apostles were but servants of Christ, and had no authority to propagate their own fancies, but to spread Christian faith. 2. Apostles were not to be undervalued: for though ministers, they were ministers of Christ. The character and dignity of their Master put an honor on them; and so of common ministers, if faithful. Though but stewards, they are not stewards of the common things of the world, but of divine mysteries; and,

II. He sets forth the duty of an approved steward, v. 2. Stewards in Christ's family must appoint what He hath appointed; not set their fellow-servants to work for themselves; not require anything from them without their Master's warrant; not feed them with the chaff of their own inventions, instead of the wholesome food of Christian doctrine and truth: they must teach what He hath commanded, and not the doctrines and commandments of men: they must be true to the interest of their Lord, and consult his honor. Note, The ministers of Christ should make it their hearty and continual endeavor, to approve themselves trustworthy; and when they have the testimony of a good conscience, and the approbation of their Master, they must slight the opinions and censures of their fellow-servants, v. 3. Indeed, reputation and esteem among men are a good step towards usefulness in the ministry; and Paul's whole argument, on this head, shows he had a just concern for his own reputation. But he that would make it his chief endeavor to please men, would hardly approve himself a faithful servant of Christ, Gal. 1:10. He must look upon it as a very little thing (if his Lord approves him) what judgment men form of him. It is a comfort they are not to be our final judges. Nay, we are not thus to judge ourselves; 'Yea, I judge not myself. For though I know nothing by myself, cannot charge myself with unfaithfulness, yet am I not thereby justified, this will not clear me of the charge; but He that judgeth me is the Lord. By his sentence I must abide. Such I am as He shall find and judge me to be.' Nothing will prove us safe and happy, but the acceptance and approbation of our sovereign Judge, 2 Cor. 10:18.

III. The apostle hence takes occasion to caution the Corinthians against censoriousness,—forward and severe judging of others, v. 5. judging out of season, and judging at an adventure. He is not to be understood, of judging by persons in authority, within the verge of their office, nor of private judging concerning facts that are notorious; but of judging persons' future state, or the secret springs and principles of their actions, or about facts doubtful in themselves. To judge in these cases, and give decisive sentence, is that the carnal mind is prominent and prevalent.—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, in all their studies, pursuits, sermons, publications, and conversation, to recollect, that their 'work must be tried by fire;' to anticipate the sentiments, which the day of judgment will inevitably obtrude on them, concerning their present occupations; and to reflect on the irreparable loss of spending their time of service to no purpose, or perniciously; to consider the tendency of their undertaking; to compare them all with the Word of God; and to 'judge themselves that they may not be judged of the Lord.' For if shame and sorrow could enter heaven; surely the minister, whose work shall be burned, yet 'he himself saved as through fire,' would be overwhelmed with these distressing feelings.—And surely he is deceived, who deems himself the temple of the Holy Spirit, and yet is unconcerned, or but little concerned, about personal holiness, or about the purity and peace of the church! NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. Lest the Corinthians should conclude, from what the apostle had said, that little respect or affection was due to ministers; he here showed them, in what estimation they ought to hold them, and by what measure they ought to regulate their regard to them.—Some, by 'the mysteries of God,' understand also the administration of the sacraments, which were commonly called 'mysteries,' by the ancient fathers; but, though this is a part of the minister's work; yet the external ordinances are not called 'mysteries' in Scripture; and this name, afterwards given them, helped to lead men to form a wrong judgment concerning them, which has, in every age, produced, and still does produce, most mischievous effects; by leading men to confound the sign of godliness with the thing signified, and with the power of godliness. 'That which this day is generally called a sacrifice, is the sign of the true sacrifice. If the sacraments had not a certain similitude of those things of which they are sacraments, they would be no sacraments at all; now it is for the similitude or resemblance, that they often bear the name of the things themselves.' Augustine. Thus baptism was called regeneration, and the Lord's supper, a sacrifice; till the things signified were lost sight of, and the sign alone regarded, and idolized. And alas! it is so still, not only among papists, but, to a very great degree, in the Protestant, Lutheran, and reformed churches, with their rulers and teachers.

V. 3—5. The apostle counted it 'a very small matter,' compared with the acceptance of his gracious Lord, what judgment the Corinthians, or any man, formed of him; whether they supposed him to be faithful or not; or whether they were offended with him for his faithfulness, and despised him because he had not 'come with excellency of speech or of wisdom.' Indeed, he did not rely on his own judgment concerning himself, because he was aware of the deceitfulness of the human heart; for though he was not indeed conscious of any unfaithfulness or self-seeking in his ministry; yet this was not sufficient to justify him before God, who often saw that evil in the heart, which pride and self-flattery hid from the man himself. He therefore sought to the Lord to judge him, and so waited for that day when he must appear before his tribunal. Knowing, however, that many were disposed to think unfavorably of him, through the artifices of their seducers, he exhorted them not to judge matters of this importance before the time; but to leave them, till the Lord should come to judgment, when characters and actions would appear in another light, than they did at present. to assume the seat of God, and challenge his prerogative. How bold a sinner is the forward and severe censurer! But there is One who will judge him, and those he censures, without prejudice, passion, or partiality. And there is a time coming, when men cannot fail of judging right concerning themselves and others, by following his judgment. This should make them now cautious of judging others, and careful in judging themselves. The Lord Jesus Christ will manifest the counsels of the heart, of all hearts; so must have the knowledge of them. This is a divine prerogative, Jer. 17: 10. yet it is what our Savior challenges to Himself in a very peculiar manner, Rev. 2: 23. We should be very careful how we censure others, when we have to do with a Judge from whom we cannot conceal ourselves: and when He comes to judge, every man, who deserves it, shall have praise of God. Though none of God's servants can deserve anything from Him, though there be much that is blamable even in their best services, yet shall their fidelity be commended and crowned by Him; and should they be condemned, reproached, the ministry committed to me; yet it does not follow that I am entirely free from blame. My only judge, or He alone that hath a right to judge me, is the Lord.

V. 6, 7. It is evident, that the apostle is here more immediately speaking of natural abilities and spiritual gifts; and not of regenerating and efficacious grace. Yet, if we all are, by nature, entirely depraved; if we must be born again, and new created; if it 'is God that worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure,' and if 'by grace we are saved through faith, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God;' the apostle's reasoning is at least as conclusive, against all kinds and degrees of self-preference on account of our religious attainments, and all glorying in ourselves and other men, as against that which he was directly opposing. 7:25—23. 15:9—11.

or vilified, by their fellow-servants, He will roll away all such unjust censures and reproaches, and show them in their own amiable light. Christians may well be patient under unjust censures, when they know such a day as this is coming, especially when they have their consciences testifying to their integrity.

IV. The apostle here lets us into the reason why he had used his own name and that of Apollos, in this discourse of his. He had done it in a figure, and for their sakes, that hereby he might avoid what would provoke, and so procure his advice the greater regard. Ministers should use prudence; and the advice the apostle would inculcate, was, that they might learn not to think of men above what is written, nor be puffed up for one against another, v. 6. above what he had been writing. Apostles were not to be esteemed other than planters or waterers in God's husbandry, than master-builders in his building, than stewards of his mysteries, and servants of Christ. And common ministers cannot bear these characters in the same sense that apostles did. We must call no man master on earth; one is our Master, even Christ, Mat. 23: 8, 10. We must not think of them above what is written. The Word of God is the best rule by which to judge of men. And again, judging rightly of men, and not more highly than is fit, is one way to prevent quarrels and contentions in the churches. Our commendation of our own taste and judgment commonly goes along with our unreasonable applause, and always with a factious adherence to one teacher, in opposition to others that may be equally faithful and well qualified. We shall not be puffed up for one against another, if we remember that they are all instruments employed by God in his husbandry and building, and endowed by Him with their various talents and qualifications.

V. 7—13. Here the apostle improves the foregoing hint to a caution against pride and self-conceit, and sets forth the temptations the Corinthians had to despise him, from the difference of their circumstances.

I. He cautions them by this consideration, that all the distinction made among them was owing to God, v. 7. His discourse is to the ministers, who set themselves at the head of these factions, and did but too much encourage and abet the people in those feuds. What had they to glory in, when all their peculiar gifts were from God? We have no reason to be proud of our attainments, enjoyments, or performances; all that we have, or are, or do, that is good, is owing to the free and rich grace of God. Boasting is for ever excluded. We can properly call nothing our own. It is foolish in us, therefore, and injurious to God, to boast; they who receive all, should be proud of nothing, Ps. 115: 1. Due attention to our obligations to divine grace, would cure us of arrogance and self-conceit.

II. He presses the duty of humility by a very smart irony, v. 8. There is a very elegant gradation from sufficiency to wealth, and from thence to royalty; to intimate how much the Corinthians were elated by the abundance of their wisdom and spiritual gifts; which was a humor that prevailed among them, while the apostle was away from them, and made them forget what an interest he had in all. 'Ye have reigned as kings,' says the apostle, 'that is, in your own conceit; and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. I wish ye had as much of the true glory of a Christian church on you, as you arrogate to yourselves. I should come in then for a share of the honor; I should reign with you; I should not be overlooked by you as now I am, but valued and regarded as a minister of Christ, and a very useful instrument among you.' Those do not commonly know themselves best, who think best of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Pride is a great prejudice to our improvement. He is stopped from growing wiser or better, who thinks himself at the height.

III. He comes to set forth his own circumstances, and those of the other apostles, and compares them with theirs.

1. Paul and his fellow-apostles were exposed to great hardships, v. 9. Never were any men in this world so hunted and worried. They carried their lives in their hands. An allusion is made to some of the bloody spectacles in the Roman amphitheatres [see at end of ch.]; where men were exposed to fight wild beasts, or to cut one another to pieces, to make diversion for the populace; where the victor did not escape with his life, though he should destroy his adversary, but was only reserved for another combat, and must be devoured or cut in pieces at last. So that such wretched criminals (for they were ordinarily condemned persons that were thus exposed) might very properly be called, persons devoted or appointed to death. They are said to be set forth last, [being the last appearance for that day, Whitby.] Because the meridian gladiators, those who combated one another in the after part of the day, were most exposed, being obliged to fight naked. So that (as Seneca says, epist. 7.) this was perfect butchery; and those exposed to beasts in the morning, were treated mercifully, in comparison of these. The general meaning is, that the apostles were exposed to continual danger of death, and that of the worst kinds, in the faithful discharge of their office. God had set them forth, brought them into view, as the Roman emperors brought their combat-

So Crell, Just., Vorst., Menoch. and Semler, Elsn., Heum., Wolf, Doddr., Mackn., and most recent interpreters; the ancient fathers and Gr. comtrs. appear favorable to it, and, on the whole, it seems best founded. There is a climax, too. The first metaphor is taken from persons filled with food, so as neither to need nor desire more. The second, from persons so rich, as to have no want of, nor desire for more. The third, and highest degree of the climax, is derived from one who, from being a private person, is raised to the throne, and, having therefore attained the highest step in the ladder, has nothing further to wish. So the Gr. comtrs., many eminent modern, and almost all recent interpreters. Have reigned.] This being in the Aorist (for the present) as the Gr. for are rich, should also be tr. in the present, ye reign like princes. Strange, some eminent comtrs., as Grot., Whit., Locke, Ros., should adopt so absurd a sense as the physical one; and Doddr. goes so far, as to make it a reference to Christians' being "kings and priests, a royal priesthood!" Calv., Light., Tiron., Menoch., and Krause, have seen the true sense. "I wish from my heart that ye were so abundant in all spiritual improvements: for then I might partake of your prosperity, in the credit and honor which I should enjoy, from having converted and taught you; since the fame of the pupil tends to the honor of the teacher. 11 Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place;

12 And labor, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it:

13 Being defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the earth, and are the off-scouring of all things unto this day.

14 I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you.

15 For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel.

16 Wherefore, I beseech you, be ye followers of me.

17 For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach everywhere in every church.

ants into the arena, the place of show. The apostles were shown, to manifest the power of divine grace, to confirm the truth of their mission and doctrine, and to propagate religion in the world; ends worthy of God; noble views, fit to animate them to the combat. A show; we are brought into the theatre, brought out to the public view of the world. Angels and men are witnesses to our persecutions, sufferings, patience, and magnanimity. How contentedly could they be exposed, both to sufferings and scorn, for the honor of their Master! So should we.

2. He compares his own case with that of the Corinthians, v. 10. We are fools for Christ's sake; such in common account, and we are well content to be so accounted; so that the wisdom of God, and the honor of the Gospel, be by this mean secured and displayed. 'But ye are wise in Christ: have the fame of being wise and learned Christians, and not a little value yourselves on it. We are under disgrace for delivering the plain truths of the Gospel, and in as plain a manner: ye are in reputation for your eloquence and human wisdom, which among many make you pass for wise men in Christ. We are weak, but ye are strong. We are suffering for Christ's sake,' (so being weak plainly signifies, 2 Cor. 12:10.) 'when ye are in easy and flourishing circumstances.' Or else, 'We pass for persons of but mean endowments, very striplings in Christianity; but ye look on yourselves, and are looked upon by others, as men, as those of a much more advanced growth, and confirmed strength.' The Corinthians may think themselves, and be esteemed by others, as wiser and stronger men in Christ than the apostles themselves. But Oh! how gross the mistake!

IV. He enters into some particularities of their sufferings; Even to this present hour; i. e. after all the service and suffering we have had among you and other churches, v. 11, 12, 13. They were forced to labor with their own hands, to get subsistence, and had so much, and so much greater, business to mind, that they could not attend enough to this, to get a comfortable livelihood, but were exposed to hunger, thirst, and nakedness; many times wanted meat, and drink, and clothes. They were driven about the world, without having any fixed abode, any stated habitation. Poor circumstances, indeed; yet no poorer than his, who had not where to lay his head, Luke 9:58. But, O glorious charity and devotion, that would carry them through all these hardships! How ardently did they love God, how vehemently did they thirst for the salvation of souls! They thought they had a rich amends for all the outward good things they wanted, if they might but serve Christ, and save souls. Nay, though they were made the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things. They were treated as men not fit to live, perikatharmata. It is reasonably thought by the critics, that an allusion is here made to a common custom of many heathen nations, to offer men in sacrifice, in a time of pestilence, or other like grievous calamity. These were ordinarily the vilest of men, persons of the lowest rank and worst character. Thus, in the first ages, Christians were counted the source of all public calamities, and were sacrificed to the people's rage, if not to appease their angry deities. And apostles could not meet with better usage. They suffered, in their persons and characters, as the very worst and vilest men; as the most proper to make such a sacrifice: or else as the very dirt of the world, that was to be swept away: nay, as the off-scouring of all things, the dross, the flings of all things. They were the common-sewer into which all the reproaches of the world were to be poured. To be the off-scouring of anything, is bad; but what is it to be the off-scouring of all things? How much did the apostles resemble their Master, and fill up that which was behind of his afflictions, for his body's sake, which is the church? Col. 1:24.

V. We have here the apostles' behavior under all; and the return they made for this mal-treatment, v. 12, 13. They returned blessings for reproaches, and entreaties and kind exhortations for the rudest slanders and defamation; and were patient under the sharpest persecutions. The disciples of Christ, and especially his ministers, should hold fast their integrity, and keep a good conscience, whatever opposition or hardships they meet with from the world: follow the example, and fulfil the will and precepts, of their Lord.

V. 14—16. Here Paul challenges their regard to him as their father. He tells them, 1. That what he had written was not for their reproach, but admonition, v. 14. In reproving, we should have a tender regard to the reputation, as well as reformation, of the sinner. Reproofs that expose, commonly do but exasperate; when those that kindly and affectionately warn, are likely to reform. To expose to open shame, is but the way to render shameless. 2. He shows them on what foundation he claimed paternal relation to them, and calls them his sons, v. 15. Whatever other teachers they had, he was their spiritual father: the instrument of their new birth, therefore claimed the relation and felt the bowels of a father to them. There commonly is, and always ought to be, an endeared affection between faithful ministers and those they beteg in Christ Jesus through the Gospel. They should love like parents and children. 3. We have here the special advice he urges on them, v. 16. This he elsewhere explains and limits, ch. 11:1. 'Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ. Follow me as far as I follow Christ. Be my disciples, as far as I manifest myself to be a faithful minister and disciple of Christ, and no farther. Ministers should so live, that their people may take pattern from them, and live after their [Christlike] copy, as is the people's duty. They should guide them by their lives as well as their lips; go before them in the way to heaven, and not content themselves with pointing it out.

V. 17—21. 1. Here, he tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, v. 17. to remind them of his ways in Christ, to refresh their memory as to his preaching and practice, what he taught, and how he lived among them. He also lets them know, that his teaching was the same everywhere, and in every church. He had not one doctrine for one place and people, and another for a different one. He kept close to his instructions. What he received of the Lord, that he delivered, ch. 11:23. This was the gospelsweepings of the streets and markets is thrown; and vile, contemptible persons are called so figuratively. Demosthenes calls Æschines Katharma.—Peripsēma is well rendered 'off-scouring.' Leigh. Scott.

of an amphitheatre (i. e. double-theatre) of Pompeii, now seen as it was overwhelmed, in A. D. 79, a few years after this of Paul was written. In these were the spectacles, described by Henry above. Bl. takes Theatron, here, for theama, a sight or gazing-stock, epithanations, for men condemned to death, and last for lowest; and thinks the irony (discontinued at 'and I would,' &c. v. 8. and resumed at 'for we are made,' as some, understand it) suddenly passes, at 'for we are made,' to the 'serious and literal, though the idea, contained in these words, was suggested by the preceding metaphor.' See Bl. Note, end of ch. The cut (from a painting in Pompeii) shows a gladiator, 16 times victor, now wounded in the breast, lowering his arms as vanquished, and holding up his finger to ask his life of the people. Behind, his conqueror waits, to give him his 'death-blow,' or his life, as the gay people decree!

(10.) 'Here Paul resumes the irony, to "but we are, &c.'" Bl. Ros. obs., that 'these teachers probably abstained from inculcating the doctrine of the death and crucifixion of Christ, lest they should stumble the Jews and enlightened heathens; and of this management prided themselves, imputing folly to Paul, for exposing the Christian religion to ridicule by needless disclosures.' See Bl. Fools.] 'Paul still carries on the allusion to the public spectacles among the [cruel] Romans, where they were wont to hiss, hoot, mock, and variously insult the poor victims.' Dr. A. Clarke.

(11.) Naked.] 'In want of necessary clothing; so Basil uses the Gr.' Bl. 'Surely one cannot imagine any more glorious triumph of the truth, than what it gained in these circumstances, when Paul, with an impediment in his speech, and a personage rather contemptible than graceful, appeared in a mean, [travel-worn,] and sometimes tattered dress, before persons of the highest rank, and yet commanded such attention, and made such impressions.' DODDR. Bl. (after Theoph.) makes perikatharmata and peripsēma to mean nearly the same, i. e. the dirt or filth proceeding from anything on being scoured about.

V. 15. Instructors.] Paidagogos: lit. the grave, elderly personage who conducted children to and from school, and who superintended their behavior out of school hours. See Pignor. Afterwards it came to designate the informant, the instructor, or teacher.

V. 16. Followers, &c.] 'Rather, imitate me; in modesty, so some; preserve unity by imitating me, rather than the false teachers, so others; but it seems simply his intention, to deduce from his spiritual paternity the inference, that they should be imitators of him, just as parents and teachers are, to their children, the exemplar by which they are to model their character. It extends to every branch of Christian doctrine and duty; so Theophylact.'

18 Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you.

19 But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will; and will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

20 For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

21 What will ye? shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

revelation, which was the equal concern of all men, and did not vary from itself. Note, The truth of Christ is one and invariable. What one apostle taught, every one taught. Christians may mistake and differ, but Christ and Christian truth are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, Heb. 13:8. To render their regard to Timothy the greater, he gives them his character. He was his beloved son, a spiritual child of his, as well as themselves. But he adds, 'He is faithful in the Lord; trustworthy, as one that feared the Lord, faithful in the particular office he has now received of the Lord, the particular errand on which he comes; not only from me, but from Christ. He knows what I have taught, and what my conversation has been in all places, and ye may depend on it, he will make a faithful report.'

2. He rebukes their vanity who imagined he would not come to them, by letting them know this was his purpose, though he had sent Timothy. But he adds, if the Lord will. It seems, as to the common events of life, apostles were not under inspiration. For had the apostle certainly known the mind of God in this matter, he had not expressed himself with this uncertainty. But he sets a good example to us in it. All our purposes must be formed with a dependence on Providence, and a reserve for the overruling purposes of God, James 4:15.

3. He lets them know what would follow on his coming to them, v. 19. He would bring the great pretenders among them to a trial, know what they were; not by their rhetoric or philosophy, but by the authority and efficacy of what they taught, whether they could confirm it by miraculous operations, and whether it was accompanied with divine influences, and saving effects on the minds of men. For, adds he, the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. It is not set up, nor propagated, nor established, in the hearts of men, by plausible reasonings, or florid discourses, but by the power of the Holy Spirit, in miraculous operations at first, and the powerful influence of divine truth on the minds and manners of men.

4. He puts it to their choice, how he should come among them, v. 21. i. e. according as they were, they would find him.

If they continued perverse among themselves, and with him, it would be necessary to come with a rod; i. e. to exert his apostolical power in chastising them, by making some examples, and inflicting some discises and corporal punishments, or by other censures for their faults. But this is far from being desirable, if it may be prevented. Therefore the apostle adds, that it was in their own option whether he should come with a rod, or in a quite different disposition and manner: or in love and the spirit of meekness. As much as if he had said, 'Take warning, cease your unchristian feuds, rectify the abuses among you, and return to your duty, and ye shall find me as gentle and benign as ye can wish. It is a happy temper in a minister, to have the spirit of love and meekness predominant, and yet to maintain his just authority.'

CHAP. V. V. 1-6. 1. The apostle now lets them know what was the common report concerning them, that one of their community was guilty of fornication, v. 1. It was told in all places, to their dishonor, and the reproach of Christians. The heinous sins of professed Christians are quickly noted and noised abroad. We should walk circumspectly, for many eyes are upon us, and many mouths will be opened against us if we fall into any scandalous practice. This was not a common instance of fornication, that a man should have his father's wife; either marry her while his father was alive, or keep her as his concubine, either when he was dead, or while he was alive. In either of these cases, his criminal conversation with her might be called fornication; but had his father been dead, and he, after

PRACT. OBS. The ministers of Christ ought, by all means, to be as deeply sensible of the importance of their trust, as of the dignity of their office; that, as active and self-denying laborers, as well as 'stewards of the mysteries of God,' they may be 'faithful' to Him and to his church; that they may disregard their own interest, indulgence, and reputation, and willingly endure reproach and suffering, for the honor of their Lord, and the salvation of souls.—Christians also should learn to value ministers, not, so much, in proportion to the brilliancy of their gifts, or their rank and station in the church, as their integrity and disinterested faithfulness; and those persons certainly offend the Lord, who slight such as are true to their trust; as they also do, who tempt them to be unfaithful, by flatteries, bribes, frowns, censures, or contempt. Indeed, it ought to be 'the smallest matter' with us, to be judged of men, or blamed for that which God approves, even by those whom we must love; yet it requires a superior strength of faith and grace to be so totally indifferent to the opinion of others, as not to be [improperly] influenced by it; and many are thus tempted to waver, or warp from the constancy of their testimony. Acts 20:18-28. P. O. 13-31.—If, in some respects, we are distinguished from our brethren, yet our responsibility increases with our talents; and it is seldom, that our faithfulness and diligence increase proportionably.—Fallen man is most apt to count himself full, rich, and honorable, when he is most blind, poor, and naked; and many professors of the Gospel, like glow-worms in the dark, shine most, as to their own opinion of themselves, when their real character is most obscure and doubtful.—They, whom God has most honored, have always been proportionably despised, hated, and abused by men; and their sufferings, even unto death, have made them an interesting spectacle to all the intelligent creation.—The consideration that so many eyes are upon us, when struggling with difficulties, or conflicting with temptation, should [help to] animate us to unconquerable constancy and patience; that holy angels and saints may rejoice, and that evil spirits and wicked men may be disappointed and confounded. Sc.

V. 18, 19. 'He had been delayed, and now some fancied he would not dare to encounter so formidable an opposition as he would there find. Concluding Note. V. 9, 10. 'Amphitheatres were at first temporary, and of wood; the first of stone was by Augustus. The largest was the Coliseum (whose ruins remain), begun by Vespasian, and finished by Titus; it held 87,000. The place where the gladiators (captives, slaves, or hired) fought, called arena, was covered with sand or sawdust, to prevent slipping, and absorb the blood. The part next to it was called podium, where the senators sat, and the ambassadors of foreign nations; here was the emperor's place, elevated like a pulpit or tribunal, and canopied; likewise of him who exhibited the games, and of the vestal virgins. The podium projected over the wall which surrounded the arena, and was raised 12 to 15 feet above it; and secured by a breastwork or parapet, against the irruption of wild beasts: the arena was, besides, surrounded with an iron rail, and a canal. The equites sat in 14 rows, behind the senators, and both on cushioned seats. The rest of the people sat behind, on the bare stones; their seats were called popularia. The entrances to these seats were called vomitoria; the ascending aisles, scalae or scalaria; the ranges of seats, between two passages, a cuneus, i. e. wedge. Particular places were sometimes granted as an honor. The designatores assigned every one his proper place. The highest seats Augustus assigned the women. Secret tubes sprinkled perfumes on the spectators, and poles fixed in holes, in the top of the outer walls, sustained the covering drawn over when it rained. When the wind was too high for these, they used broad-brimmed hats, or caps, and umbrellas. Nigh the amphitheatre was the spoliarium, to which the killed, or mortally wounded, were dragged out by a hook. On the day of exhibition, the gladiators were led along the arena in procession [set forth, v. 9], then matched in pairs, and their swords examined by the exhibitor. They preceded with wooden swords, &c., flourishing their arms (contantes) ['beating the air,' 9:26.] with great dexterity: on a trumpet signal they assumed their proper arms. When one was wounded, the people cried, habet, 'he has got it;' he lowered his arms in sign of being vanquished: but his fate depended on the pleasure of the people, who, if they wished him to be saved, pressed down their thumbs; if to be slain, turned them up, and he received the death-wound with fortitude. Sometimes he was rescued by the entrance of the emperor, or the will of the editor (exhibitor). The spectators expressed the same eagerness by betting on the combatants, as at the circus. Before the year U. C. 693, the people staid all day at the fights, afterwards they had an intermission at dinner. Gladiatorial combats were at first performed as part of funerals; then given by magistrates, to entertain the people, chiefly at the Saturnalia and feasts of Minerva. Incredible numbers were thus destroyed: for instance, when Trajan triumphed over the Dacians, these shows lasted 123 days, 11,000 were killed, and 10,000 gladiators fought. These men were kept and maintained in schools, by persons called lanista, who purchased and trained them, and plentifully fed them on strong food. Adam.

his deace, married her, it had been incest still, but neither fornication nor adultery in the strictest sense. But to marry her, or keep her as a concubine, while his father was alive, though he had repudiated her, or she had deserted him, whether she were his own mother or not, was incestuous fornication; when a woman had caused her daughter to be put away, and was married to her husband; Incredible wickedness! says the orator (Cicero pro Cluent.); such I never heard of in all my life besides. Not that there were no such instances of incestuous commerce, or marriages, among the heathens: but, whenever they happened, they gave a shock to every man of virtue and probity among them. Yet such a horrible wickedness was committed by one in the church of Corinth, and, as is probable, a leader of one of the factions among them; a principal man. The best churches are liable to very great corruptions.

2. He greatly blames their conduct here-separated from their company.—Present in spirit—having the whole affair clearly before his mind, perhaps by a supernatural revelation by the Holy Spirit.—Probably, the apostle expected, that this solemn sentence of excommunication would be attended by some miraculous infliction of pain and disease, to the wasting, or even the death, of his body, 11:29—34. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. 1 Tim. 1:18—20. yet, by 'delivering him over to Satan,' he seems to intend his expulsion from the visible kingdom of Christ into that of the devil; and not that Satan would inflict the correction which might follow. No doubt evil spirits are able and willing to disorder the body, or distract the mind, or destroy life, if God permit; yet it is far more reasonable to think, that God, by miracle, directly inflicted the disease, than that He merely permitted Satan to do it. It should, however, be noted, that when supernatural visitations do not accompany ecclesiastical censures, no temporal pains and penalties, of whatever sort, ought to be annexed to them. Unwarranted severities in this respect have made way for the disuse, or relaxation, of salutary discipline, throughout a great part of the Christian church; the extensively injurious effects of which can never be enough lamented, or, indeed, fully conceived by those who have not deeply considered the subject.—(2) 'Jews and Christians, when any one was to be cut off from the church, as a dead member, did it with fasting and humiliation, to show their sympathy with him, and sorrow for the scandal on the society.' Whitby.

Scott.

(1.) Fornication. 'The Gr. means any illicit, venereal connexion.' Bloomf. Named. Almost all [connexions] that Christians regard as forbidden, were by the Greeks and Romans admitted to be unlawful; see the proof in the philological comtrs. The few instances of allowed incest recorded (some 3 or 4), are chiefly of royal personages, whose high station afforded license of every kind, and that when private morals were at the lowest ebb. That the Persians married their mothers, is too incredible a story, on higher authority than that of Sext. Emp. So of Maimonides' assertion, that proselytes, being accounted to have lost kindred, could marry mothers and sisters. Procopius' remark, that, 'with the Varni it was permitted to marry a step-mother,' is of precarious authority, nor does the apostle speak of barbarians. Whether it were customary with the Egyptians (except among royal personages) is not certain. The general ignorance of Tacitus, (and our limited information,) as to the Jews' customs then, should prevent us from pressing on the sense of his remark, that 'what we call incest is allowed among the Jews.' Nor can it be proved, there was a community of all women in any society, whence the licentious doctrines reproved, could have crept into the church. For these reasons, and others, Bl. thinks, that onomazesthai, named, (which he will not tr. with Pearce, &c., reported, nor, with Ros., &c., scarce found, nor cancel it, as others, though hundreds of MSS, the Syr. and other vers., and the Gr. fathers and comtrs. have it!) is a slip of the apostle, writing in Hellenistic Greek, for nomizesthai, i. e. obtains, is approved by law and custom: used by the best writers in this meaning.

'It is not credible that the Corinthian congregation would have endured, that one of their body should live with a harlot, especially his mother-in-law. But, because this illicit connexion had been palliated by the upon; they were puffed up, v. 2. they gloried; (1.) Perhaps on account of this very scandalous person. He might be a man of great eloquence, of deep science, and for this reason very greatly esteemed, and followed, and cried up, by many among them. They were proud that they had such a leader. Pride and self-esteem often lie at the bottom of our immoderate esteem of others; and this makes us blind to their faults as to our own. The proud man either wholly overlooks or artfully disguises his faults, or endeavors to transform his blemishes into beauties. Those of the Corinthians that were admirers of the incestuous person's gifts, could overlook or extenuate his horrid practices. Or else, (2.) It may intimate, that some of the opposite party were puffed up. They were proud of their own standing, and trampled over him that fell. Probably, this was one effect of the divisions among them. The opposite party made their advantage of this scandalous lapse, and were glad of the opportunity. It is a sad consequence of divisions among Christians, that it makes them apt to rejoice in iniquity. The sins of others should be our sorrow. Nay, churches should mourn for the scandalous behavior of particular members, and, if they are incorrigible, should remove them.

3. The apostle's direction. He would have this scandalous sinner excommunicated, and delivered to Satan, v. 3—5. He had, by revelation, and the miraculous gift of discerning vouchsafed him by the Spirit, as perfect a knowledge of the case, as if he were present, and had come to the determination, not without special authority from the Holy Spirit. He says this, to let them know, that though he was at a distance, he did not pass an unrighteous sentence, nor judge without having as full cognizance of the case, as if he had been on the spot. Those who would appear righteous judges to the world, will take care to inform them, that they do not pass sentence without full proof and evidence. He had judged that he should be delivered to Satan, v. 5. and this was to be done in the name of Christ, with the power of Christ, and in a full assembly, where the apostle would be also present in spirit, or by his spiritual gift of discerning at a distance. Some think this is to be understood of a mere ordinary excommunication, and that delivering him to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, is only meant of disowning him, and casting him out of the church, that by this mean he might be brought to repentance, and his flesh might be mortified. Christ and Satan divide the world: and they that live in sin, when they profess relation to Christ, belong to another master, and by excommunication should be delivered up to him; and this in the name of Christ. Church-censures are Christ's ordinances, and should be dispensed in his name. It was to be done also when they were gathered together, in full assembly. The more public, the more solemn; and the more solemn, the more likely to have a good effect on the offended. Church-censures on notorious and incorrigible sinners, should be past with great solemnity. They who sin in this manner, are to be rebuked before all, that all may fear, 1 Tim. 5:20. Others think the apostle is not to be understood of mere excommunication, but of a miraculous power or authority they had of delivering a scandalous sinner into the power of Satan, to have bodily diseases inflicted, and to be tormented by him with bodily pains, which is the meaning of the destruction of the flesh; probably this was a mixed case. It was an extraordinary instance: and the church was to proceed against him by just censure; the apostle, when they did so, put forth an act of extraordinary power, and gave him up to Satan; not for his destruction, but for his deliverance; at least, for the destruction of the flesh, that the soul might be saved. The great end of church-censures is the good of those who fall under them; their name of matrimony, therefore they might connive at it, especially if there were any who were the man's zealous friends, and endeavored to soften the baseness of the thing. Crell. The Gentile law might forbid, but, unless aided by public opinion, could not prevent such marriages. The person, here, is supposed to have been rich and powerful, and so would not want such friends; and there might be some who undertook, upon principle, to defend such a connexion.' Bl. How much harder is it now, among Christians, in these days of sectarian rivalry, to excommunicate a rich than a poor offender! And why? Can any society, 'ours,' or another, be effectually 'built up,' when this is the case? Ed.

(2.) Mourned. 'Following the custom of the Jewish synagogue (Grot.), excommunication was, for some ages, accompanied with solemn mourning, in the church. See Vitr. "Mourning is put for excommunication, by metonymy of the adjunct, because, says Origen, the church, when about to exclude any one from its communion, put on the mourning dress, and mourned him as dead." Grot.'

Bloomf.

(3.) "I then, as absent indeed, in person, but present in heart, mind, thought, affections," viz. in solicitude and care. I have decided, do hereby decide and determine. This is not a sentence of excommunication, but an intimation, that, if not wanting in duty, they will use this apostolical authority, to take the necessary measures for excluding the noxious member. Then are suggested the steps to be taken. So.] I. e. openly, impudently, perseveringly.' Id.

The Greek fathers and comtrs., also Grot., Newc., Pearce, Crell., Locke, Hardy, Whit., Ros., Mackn., Pyle, Schl., Jaspis, Malthy, and other eminent comtrs., rightly, (I think, on the whole,) recognise in the passage a formal excommunication, (comprehended in give him over to Satan,) and also, a punishment of the flesh, which is evidently implied, by "for the destruction of the flesh." That the apostles had the power, and were authorized to punish notorious offenders with death and disease, in a supernatural manner, few will deny. (See John 20:23. Acts 13:11. 1 Cor. 11:21.) And if so, may we not (asks Mackn.) believe, that . . . the power was now exerted? especially as it was to be done, not by their own authority, but by the power of our Lord, and of the Spirit who inspired Paul to give the command. A sudden disease, immediately consequent on the act of excommunication, would show the reality of the apostle's power and mission, and awe all reflecting persons.' Bloomf.: who thinks, with Rosenm., that 'Paul affirms, he would strike the offender with a dreadful disease, in the midst of them, while assembled together, so that they would be obliged, on account of this disease, to carry him forth from their assembly, whom they would not expel for his crime.'

V. 6—8. Some expositors confidently maintain, that the incestuous person was one of the teachers who opposed the apostle; or the opposing teacher, supposing Paul had a single false teacher in mind. But in 2 Cor., where he directs them to comfort the incestuous person, as brought to deep repentance, and as in danger of being 'swallowed up

8 Therefore let us keep <sup>m</sup> the <sup>n</sup> feast, not with old leaven, neither with the <sup>o</sup> leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened <sup>p</sup> bread of sincerity and truth.

9 I wrote unto you in an epistle <sup>q</sup> not to company with fornicators:

10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world.

11 But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if <sup>r</sup> any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat.

12 For what have I to do to judge them also that are <sup>s</sup> without? do not ye judge them that are within?

13 But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away <sup>t</sup> from among yourselves that wicked person.

spiritual and eternal good, v. 5. Yet it is not merely a regard to their benefit, that is to be had, in proceeding against them.

4. He hints the danger of contagion from this example, v. 6. The bad example of a man in rank and reputation is very mischievous; spreads the contagion far and wide. It did so, probably, in this very church and ease: see 2 Cor. 12:21. They could not be ignorant of this. The experience of the whole world was for it. Concern for their purity and preservation should engage Christian churches to remove gross and scandalous sinners.

V. 7, 8. Here the apostle exhorts them to purity, by purging out the old leaven. In which observe,

1. The advice itself; addressed either, (1.) To the church in general: and so, purging out the old leaven, that they might be a new lump, refers to the putting away from themselves that wicked person, v. 13. Or, (2.) To each particular member of the church. And so it implies, that they should purge themselves from all impurity of heart and life, especially from this kind of wickedness, to which the Corinthians were addicted to a proverb. Note, Christians should be careful to keep themselves clean, as well as purge polluted members out of their society. They were also to purge themselves from malice and wickedness; all ill-will and mischievous subtlety. It is not improbable, that this was intended as a check to some who gloried in the scandalous behavior of the offender, both out of pride and pique. Christians should be particularly careful to keep free from malice and mischief. Love is the very essence and life of the Christian religion; the fairest image of God, for God is Love, 1 John 4:16. therefore it is no wonder if it be the greatest beauty and ornament of a Christian. But malice is murder in its principles, 1 John 3:15. and partakes of the spirit of him who was a murderer from the beginning, John 8:44.

2. The reason with which this advice is enforced, v. 7. This is the great doctrine of the Gospel. The Jews, after they had killed the passover, kept the feast of unleavened bread. So must we; not for seven days only, but all our days. We should die with our Savior to sin; be planted into the likeness of his death, by mortifying sin; and into the likeness of his resurrection, by rising again to newness of life, and that internal and external. We must have new hearts, and lead new lives. The whole life of a Christian must be a feast of unleavened bread. His common conversation and his religious performances must be holy. And the more there is of sincerity in our own profession, the less shall we censure that of others. Note, on the whole, The sacrifice of our Redeemer is the strongest argument, with a gracious heart, for purity and sincerity.

V. 9—13. He advises them to shun the company and converse of scandalous professors.

1. The advice itself, v. 9. Some think this was an epistle written to them before, which is lost; and some, that it is to be understood of this very epistle, that he had written this advice before he had full information of their whole case, but thought it needful now to be more particular. And therefore on this occasion he tells them, that if any man, called a brother, any one professing Christianity, and being a member of a Christian church, were a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, that they should not keep company with him, not so much as eat with such an one, that they might shame him, and bring him to repentance. Note, Christians are to avoid the familiar conversation of fellow-Christians that are notoriously wicked, and under just censure for their flagitious practices. Such disgrace the Christian name.

2. He limits this advice. He does not forbid Christians the like commerce with scandalously wicked heathens. He does not forbid them eating or conversing with the fornicators of this world, &c. They know no better. They profess no better. The gods they serve, and the worship they render to many of them, countenance such wickedness. 'You must needs go out of the world, if you will have no conversation with such men. Christians may and ought to testify more respect to loose worldlings than to loose Christians. This seems a paradox.

3. The reason is here assigned. It is impossible the one should be avoided. Christians must have gone out of the world, to avoid the company of loose heathens. Besides, while they are minding their duty, and doing their proper business, God can and will preserve them from contagion; they carry an antidote against the infection of their bad example, and are naturally on the guard. But the dread of sin wears off by familiar converse with wicked Christians. Our own safety and preservation are a reason of this difference. And then, heathens authority of their Lord; and to deliver over into the visible kingdom of Satan, all who evidently disgrace their profession; and that those, who have such discipline among them, should uniformly exercise it with exact impartiality, not respecting persons, and with due solemnity and tender compassion to the souls of offenders. But alas! it hath been so generally perverted by men's carnal passions, or rendered inefficient by family connexions, secular motives, and party influence, and an undue regard to the rich above the poor; that a more complete revival of pure and spiritual religion seems necessary, before it can produce its full effect. Far more, however, might be done in most places than now is; if fear of man, respect of persons, and carnal policy, did not deter those concerned, from decidedly acting according to their judgment. And why should we suppose, that all his letters, any more than all his sermons, must be preserved as a part of the sacred volume? John 21:24, 25. Col. 4:15, 16. Can it be thought probable, on reflection, that this zealous apostle, so admirably qualified to give epistolary instruction, who lay so long in prison, and was, in various ways, so much kept at a distance from his friends and children [in the Lord], should, in his whole ministry, write no more letters, than are now extant? PRACT. OBS. How grievous is it, that those crimes should sometimes be notoriously committed by professors of the Gospel, which heathens would be ashamed of! 'Woe be to the world because of offences!' And 'woe be to them by whom the offences come!' yea, to those also by whom they are connived at! Mat. 18:7-9. When a man has wisdom, zeal, and love, he can have but one judgment in cases of this kind; and if he possess authority or influence, he will use it, whether present or absent, in exciting those who are more immediately concerned, to prefer the honor of the Gospel to every personal or party interest; to venture all consequences in bearing testimony against scandalous crimes; and to separate from among them those who have done such deeds.—It is indeed highly desirable, that all the ministers and churches of Christ were enabled to exercise this salutary discipline, in the name and by the

of overmuch sorrow; he speaks of 'false apostles, ministers of Satan, transformed into the ministers of righteousness,' in a manner which wholly subverts this supposition. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. 7:12. 11:13—15. — 'Lewdness is the old leaven to be purged out; because the Corinthians were infamous for it, to a proverb.' And in this sprinkling of the blood consisted, as we are told by the Jewish doctors, the very essence of a sacrifice. See Cudworth's "True Notion of the Lord's Supper." Ch. 11:3. The fat and entrails were burnt upon the altar, as may be collected from the passages above referred to, as also from the declaration of the Jewish doctors, the descriptions of the Paschal Sacrifice in the Misna of the Talmud, and the testimony of the Karaites, who are known to reject all the Talmudical traditions, not founded on Scripture.' 3 Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?

4 If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church.

were such as Christians had nothing to do, to judge and censure, and avoid upon a censure past; for they are without, v. 12. and must be left to God's judgment, v. 13. But as to members of the church, they are within, are professedly bound by the laws and rules of Christianity, and not only liable to the judgment of God, but to the censures of those who are set over them, and the fellow-members of the same body, when they transgress those rules. Every Christian is bound to judge them unfit for communion and familiar converse. They are to be punished, by having this mark of disgrace put on them, that they may be ashamed, and, if possible, reclaimed thereby: and the more, because the sins of such much more dishonor God, than the sins of the openly wicked and profane can do. The church therefore is obliged to clear herself from all confederacy with them, or connivance at them, and to bear testimony against their wicked practices.

4. He applies the argument to the case before him, v. 13. 'Cast him out of your fellowship, and avoid his conversation.'

CHAP. VI. V. 1—8. In the ch. before, he had directed them to punish heinous sins among themselves, by church-censures. Here, he directs them to determine controversies one with another by church-counsel and advice. Concerning which, observe,

I. The fault he blames; going to law. Not but that the law is good, if a man uses it lawfully. But, 1. Brother went to law with brother, v. 6. one member of the church with another. The bonds of fraternal love were broken through. Christians should not contend with one another, for they are brethren. This, duly attended to, would prevent lawsuits, and put an end to quarrels and litigations. 2. They brought the matter before the heathen magistrates, v. 1. and did not compose it among themselves, Christians, and saints, at least in profession. This tended much to the reproach of Christianity. Therefore, says the apostle, 'Dare any of you, having a controversy with another, go to law, implead him, bring the matter to a hearing before the unjust?' 3. Here is at least an intimation that they went to law for trivial matters; things of little value. For the apostle blames them, that they did not take wrong rather than go to law, v. 7. which must be understood of matters not very important. In matters of great damage to ourselves or families, we may use lawful means to right ourselves; but in matters of small consequence, it is better to put up with the wrong. Christians should be of a forgiving temper. And it is more for their ease and honor, to suffer small injuries and inconveniences, than seem to be contentious.

II. He lays before them the aggravations of their fault, v. 2, 3. It was a dishonor to their Christian character, a forgetting of their real dignity, as saints, for them to carry little matters, about the things of life, before heathen magistrates. When they were to judge the world, nay, to judge angels, it is unaccountable they could not determine little controversies among one another. By judging the world and angels, some think, is to be understood, their being assessors to Christ in the great judgment-day; it being said of our Savior's disciples, that they should at that day sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Mat. 19:28. And elsewhere we read of our Lord's coming with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment on all, &c. Jude 14, 15. He will come to judgment with all his saints, 1 Thes. 3:13. They themselves are indeed to be judged, see Mat. 25:31—41. but they may first be acquitted, and then advanced to the bench, to approve and applaud the righteous judgment of Christ both on men and angels. In no other sense can they be judges. Others understand this judging of the world to be meant, when the empire should become Christian. But it does not appear that the Corinthians had knowledge of this; and if they had, in what sense could Christian emperors be said to judge angels? Others understand it, of their condemning the world by their faith and practice, and casting out evil angels by miraculous power, which was not confined to the first ages, or to the apostles. The first sense seems most natural; and at the same time, gives most force to the argument. Must you, about the affairs of this life, set them to judge, who are of no esteem in the church? Some read, and perhaps most properly, v. 4. heathen magistrates, the things that are not, ch. 1:28. 'Must they be called in to judge in your controversies, of whom you ought to entertain so low an opinion? is not this shameful?' v. 5. Some, who read it as our translators, make it an ironical speech; 'If you have such controversies depending, set them to judge, who are of least esteem among yourselves. Refer the matters in variance to any, rather than go to law about them before heathen judges. Bear and forbear, and the men of meanest skill among you may end your quarrels. I speak it to your shame,' v. 5. It is a shame, that little quarrels should grow to such a head among Christians, that they cannot be determined by arbitration of the brethren.

III. He puts them on a method to remedy this fault. And this twofold. 1. By referring it to some to make it up, v. 5. Christians should never engage in lawsuits, till all other remedies are tried in vain. Prudent Christians should prevent, if possible, their disputes, and not courts of judicature decide them, especially in matters of no great importance. 2. By suffering wrong, rather than taking this method to right themselves; It is utterly a fault among you, to go to law in this matter: it is a fault of one side always, to go to law, except in a case where the title is indeed dubious, and there is a friendly agreement of both parties to refer it to the judgment of those learned in the law, to decide it. And this is referring it, rather than contending about it, which is the thing the apostle here seems chiefly to condemn. A Christian should rather put up with a little injury, than tease himself, and provoke others, by a litigious contest. But the apostle tells them, they were so far from bearing injuries, that they actually did wrong, and defrauded, and that their brethren. It is utterly a fault, to wrong and defraud any; but it is an aggravation of this fault, to defraud our Christian brethren. The ties of mutual love ought to be stronger between them than between others. And love worketh no ill to his neighbor, Rom. 13:10.

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1—6. The Jews were allowed to settle matters of property among themselves, according to their own law; and Christians would perhaps have been permitted to exercise the same kind of authority over their own company; yet voluntary reference to arbitration seems rather to be intended. Whitby reads the clause interrogatively; 'Do ye set them to judge, who are despised in the church?' That is, the heathen magistrates. But did the church avowedly despise those very magistrates, whom the apostles commanded them to honor and obey? Mr. Locke understands it of private persons not appointed to the magistracy; yet it does not appear, that the original word was ever used in that sense. But may not the apostle refer to the vainglory and self-wisdom of the leading persons at Corinth; who would, by necessary consequence, despise such as were inferior to themselves, in knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts, in proportion as they exalted themselves? Yet the meanest real and experienced Christians, whom they proudly 'set at nought,' were competent to decide such causes, as they brought before the heathen magistrates; nay, far more competent than their despisers.

They were generally atikoî, unjust, though many of them were by no means such, but (especially in their judicial capacity) of approved integrity. See Mackn. and bp. Pearce. (3.) Judge angels.] 'The Gr. contrs. and fathers, and nearly all

Comp. Mat. 12:41, 42, 29.' See also Bl. for three other interpretations. He paraphrases, 'If you have shown such judgment as to appreciate the Christian faith, and such integrity and probity as it enjoins, and thereby will put to shame, and condemn by comparison, those of greater talents, learning, and acquisitions, are you unfit to exercise judicial and arbitrary functions on petty matters?' En.

(4, 5.) 'Even the least esteemed, &c. i. e. if ye have not wise and prudent men, I make the supposition to shame you, or if they be otherwise occupied. The Jews indeed had a petty court of 3 referees, not formally appointed by the Sanhedrim, but as private, lay arbitrators, in property cases; and to this Lightf. and Locke (but it seems too hypothetical) think there is allusion.' Bl. As splitting sects trust one another less than they do religionists of totally opposite sentiments, members of this divided church would prefer to refer quarrels to heathens, rather than trust to one of a different party! See Storr and Ros. Id.

V. 9—11. Note, 5:9—13. The apostle here plainly declares his doubts, concerning the real conversion of some professed Christians at Corinth, seeing their conduct was so contrary to the precepts of God's Word. The arrangement of the expressions in v. 11. shows, that no argument can be drawn merely from that circumstance, in respect of controverted points of doctrine. 'The apostle begins with those vices, with which a rich and luxurious city abounded, seriously warning them, that repentance and forgiveness, justification and sanctifica-

V. 9-11. Here he takes occasion to warn them against many heinous evils, to which they had been formerly addicted.

1. He puts it to them as a plain truth, of which they could not be ignorant, that such sinners should not inherit the kingdom of God, v. 9. shall not be owned as true members of his church on earth, nor admitted as glorious members of the church in heaven. He specifies several sorts of sins against the 1st and 2d commandments, as idolaters; the 7th, as adulterers, fornicators, effeminate, and sodomites; the 8th, as thieves and extortioners, that by force or fraud wrong their neighbors; and the 9th as revilers; and the 10th, as covetous and drunkards, as those who are in a fair way to break all the rest. Those who know anything of religion, must know that heaven could never be intended for these.

2. Yet he warns them against deceiving themselves; Be not deceived. Those who cannot but know the fore-mentioned truth, arc but too apt not to attend to it. Men are very much inclined to flatter themselves, that God is such an one as themselves; and that they may live in sin, and yet die in Christ; may lead the life of the devil's children, and yet go to heaven with the children of God. But this is all a gross cheat.

3. He puts them in mind what a change the Gospel and grace of God had made in them, v. 11. Such were some of you,—such things, so the Greek; very monsters rather than men. Some that are eminently good after their conversion, have been as remarkably wicked before. But you are not what you were. Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified, in the name of Christ, and by the Spirit of our God. The wickedness of men before conversion is no bar to their regeneration, and reconciliation to God. The blood of Christ, and the washing of regeneration, can purge away all guilt and defilement. Our justification is owing to the merit of Christ; our sanctification, to the operation of the Spirit: but both go together. None are cleansed from the guilt of sin, and reconciled to God through Christ, but those who are also sanctified by his Spirit. All who are made righteous in the sight of God, are made holy by the grace of God.

V. 12-20. The 12th and former part of the 13th v. seem to relate to that early dispute among Christians, about the distinction of meats, and yet to be prefatory to the caution that follows against fornication. The connexion seems plain enough, if we attend to the famous determination of the apostles, Acts 15. where the prohibition of certain foods was joined with that of fornication. Now some among the Corinthians seem to have imagined, that they were as much at liberty in the point of fornication as of meats, especially because it was not a sin condemned by the laws of their country. They were ready to say, even in the case of fornication, All things are lawful for me. This pernicious conceit Paul here sets himself to oppose: and Christians should consider what was fit, considering their profession, character, relations, and hopes. All things are lawful for me, says he, but I will not be brought into the power of any, v. 12. Even in lawful things he would not be subject to the impositions of an usurped authority: so far was he from apprehending, that, in the things of God, it was lawful for any power on earth to impose its own sentiments. Note, There is a liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, in which we must stand fast. But surely he would never carry this liberty so far, as to put himself into the power of any bodily appetite. Though all meats were supposed lawful, he would not become a glutton or a drunkard; much less would he abuse the maxim of lawful liberty, to countenance the sin of fornication, which, though it might be allowed by the Corinthian laws, was a trespass on the law of nature, and utterly unbecoming a Christian. He would not abuse this maxim about eating and drinking, to encourage any intemperance, or indulge a carnal appetite, v. 13. though the belly was made to receive food, and food ordained to fill the belly, yet, if it be not convenient for me, and much more if it be inconvenient, and likely to enslave me, if I am in any danger of being subjected to my appetite, I will abstain. But God shall destroy both it and them; at least, as to their mutual relation; a time is coming, when the human body will need no farther recruits of food. Some of the ancients understand it, of abolishing the belly as well as the food; and that though the same body will be raised at the great day, yet not with all the same members; some being utterly unnecessary in a future state, as the digestive organs for instance, when the man is never to hunger, nor thirst, nor eat, nor drink more. But whether this be true or no, a time is coming, when the need and use of food shall be abolished. The expectation we have of being without bodily appetites in a future life, is a very good argument against being under their power in the present life. This seems to me the sense of the apostle's argument; and that this passage is plainly to be connected with his caution against fornication, though some make it a part of the former argument against litigious lawsuits, especially before heathen magistrates, and the enemies to true religion. These suppose, that the apostle argues, that though it may be lawful to claim our rights, yet it is not always expedient; and it is utterly unfit for Christians to put themselves into the power of infidel judges, lawyers, and solicitors, on these accounts. But this connexion seems not so natural, as the transition to his arguments against fornication, v. 13. Meats and the belly are for one another: not so, fornication and the body. The body is not for fornication, but for the Lord.

This is the First argument he uses against this sin; it is making things to cross their intention and use. The body is not for fornication; it was never formed for any such purpose, but for the Lord, for the service and honor of God; to be an instrument of righteousness to holiness, Rom. 6:19. and therefore never of uncleanness; a member of Christ, and therefore not of a harlot, v. 15. And the Lord is for the body, i. e. as some, Christ is to be Lord of the body, to have the property in it, and dominion over it, having assumed a body, and been made to partake of our nature, that He might be Head of his church, and Head over all things, Heb. 2:5, 18. or, as some, thus, He is for its resurrection and glorification, according to what follows, v. 14. Which is a Second argument against this sin, the honor intended to be put on our bodies, v. 14. Phil. 3:21. It is an honor done to the body, that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead; and it will be an honor to our bodies, that they will be raised. Let us not make those bodies vile by sin, which, if kept pure, shall, notwithstanding their present vileness, be made like to Christ's glorious body. The hopes of a resurrection to glory, should restrain Christians from dishonoring their bodies by fleshly lusts.

A Third argument is the honor already put on them, v. 15. If the soul be united to Christ by faith, the whole man is become a member of his mystical body, the body as well as the soul. How honorable is this to the Christian! It is good to know in what tion, are joined by an indissoluble bond.* Beza.—(9, 11)—Inherit, &c.] 'The kingdom of God,' or 'of heaven,' is 'entered into,' when we truly believe, Mat. 3:2. honorable relations we stand, that we may endeavor to become them. But now, says the apostle, shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot? God forbid. Or take away the members of Christ? Were not this a gross abuse, and the most notorious injury? Is it not dishonoring Christ, and dishonoring ourselves, to the very last degree? The thought is to be abhorred. God forbid, v. 16, 17. Nothing can stand in greater opposition to the honorable relations and alliances of a Christian man, than this sin. He is joined to the Lord in union with Christ, and made partaker by faith of his Spirit. One spirit lives, and breathes, and moves, in the head and members. Christ and his faithful disciples are one, Jn. 17:21, 22. But he that is joined to a harlot is one body, for two shall be one flesh, by carnal conjunction, which was ordained of God only to be in a married state. Now shall

PRACT. OBS. The high privileges and glorious prospects of believers should suggest arguments to them against sin, and for the practice of every duty; that so, a just sense of the dignity gratuitously bestowed on them, so worthless in themselves, may render them superior to the debasing allurements of vice, and the love of worldly vanities.—It must be a shame to any religious company, if there is no man among them so wise and faithful, that his brethren dare trust him to determine their secular differences. Much deliberation, counsel, prayer, and endeavor for accommodation should precede, before a man 'dare' to enter on so perilous and disgraceful a business [as a lawsuit]. But alas! many, who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, not only refuse to bear and forgive injuries, but they 'do wrong, and defraud, and that their brethren!' Whether such men act in direct opposition to their consciences, or are misled by false principles, they should be reminded, that 'the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God;' for no one, continuing an adulterer, a one in so close a union with Christ as to be one spirit with Him, yet be so united to a harlot as to become one flesh with her? And can a greater indignity be offered to Him or ourselves? The sin of fornication is a great injury in a Christian to his Head and Lord, and a great reproach and blot on his profession. No wonder the apostle should say, 'Flee fornication, v. 18. avoid it, keep out of the reach of temptations to it, of provoking objects. Direct the eyes and mind to other things and thoughts.' Other vices may be conquered in fight, this only by flight: so speak many of the fathers.

A Fourth argument is, that it is a sin against our own bodies, v. 18. every sin, i. e. every other sin, every external act of sin besides, is without the body. It is not so much an abuse of the body as of somewhat else, as wine by the drunkard, food by the glutton, &c. Nor does it give the power of the body to another person. Nor does it so much tend to the reproach of the body, and to render it vile. This sin is in a peculiar manner styled uncleanness, pollution; because no sin has so much external turpitude in it, especially in a Christian. He sins against his own body; he defiles it, he degrades it, making it one with the body of that vile creature with whom he sins. He casts vile reproach on what his Redeemer has dignified to the last degree, by taking it into union with Himself. We should not make our present vile bodies more vile, by sinning against them. The

Fifth argument against this sin, is, that the bodies of Christians are the temples of the Holy Ghost which is in them, and which they have of God, v. 19. He that is joined to Christ, is one Spirit. He is yielded up to Him, is consecrated thereby, and set apart for his use, and is hereupon possessed, and occupied, and inhabited, by his Holy Spirit. This is the proper notion of a temple,—a place where God dwells, and sacred to his use, by his own claim, and his creature's surrender. Such temples real Christians are of the Holy Ghost. Must He not therefore be God? But the inference is plain, that hence we are not our own. We are yielded up to God, and possessed by and for God; nay, and this in virtue of a purchase made of us; Ye are bought with a price. In short, our bodies were made for God, they were purchased for Him. If we are Christians indeed, they are yielded to Him, and He inhabits and occupies them by his Spirit: so that our bodies are not our own, but his. And shall we desecrate his temple, defile it, prostitute it, and offer it up to the use and service of a harlot? Horrid sacrilege! This is robbing God in the worst sense. Note, The temple of the Holy Ghost must be kept holy. Our bodies must be kept as his whose they are, and fit for his use and residence.

Lastly, The apostle argues from the obligation we are under to glorify God both with our body and spirit, which are his, v. 20. He made both, bought both, therefore both belong to Him, and should be used and employed for Him; therefore should not be defiled, alienated from Him, and prostituted by us. No, they must be kept as vessels fitted for our Master's use. We must look upon our whole selves as holy to the Lord, and must use our bodies as property which belongs to Him, and is sacred to his use and service. We are to honor Him with our bodies and spirits, which are his; and therefore, surely, must abstain from fornication; and not only from the outward act, but from the adultery of the heart, as our Lord calls it, Mat. 5:28. Body and spirit are to be kept clean, that God may be honored by both. But God is dishonored, when either is defiled by so beastly a sin. Therefore flee fornication, nay, and every sin. Use your bodies for the glory and service of their Lord and Master. Note, We are not proprietors of ourselves, nor have power over ourselves, and therefore should not use ourselves according to our own pleasure, but according to his will, and for his glory, whose we are, and whom we should serve, Acts 27:23.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—9. The apostle comes now, as a faithful and skilful casuist, to answer some cases of conscience which the Corinthians had proposed to him, v. 1. In the former ch. he warns them to avoid fornication; here he gives some directions about marriage, the remedy God had appointed for it.

1. It was good in that juncture of time, at least, to abstain from marriage altogether, v. 1. by good, here, not understanding what is so conformable to the mind and will of God, as if to do otherwise were sin; an fornicator, or licentious, a dishonest, covetous, fraudulent, drunken, or malicious man, can have either title to the holy habitation of God and his saints, or meetness for it. Satan takes advantage of men's ignorance, pride, and lusts, to drive them from one extreme to another. Thus, when they are led to renounce superstitious scruples, they run into inexpedient or even unlawful indulgences. But 'the wisdom from above,' teaches a man to guard against mistakes on each side; to abstain from 'lawful' things when 'inexpedient,' when unprofitable or injurious to himself or others; and to exert an authority over his own inclinations, that he may not be 'brought under the power of any' of them. This is a difficult lesson, but of the highest importance; and if we consider, how soon all animal pleasures, and our present life, will terminate, the reflection may teach us moderation in the most innocent gratifications, and arm us against temptations to such as are unlawful, or unreasonable, or immoderate. SCOTT.

(17.) 'There is a beauty and propriety in this elegantly antithetical passage, not inferior to the finest examples of it to be found in the best Gr. writers;' so the scholarly Bloomfield. Ep.

V. 13—20. As fornication was so inconsistent with Christian holiness; and as the temptation of the Corinthians to it, from former bad habits, the example of their neighbors, and abundant opportunities, would be very many, they ought to 'flee from it,' as from an enemy whom they dared not to face; they should shun all incentives to it, and reject every thought of it, or solicitation to it, at once, and with prompt decision. 1 Tim. 6:11,12. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.—For it might further be observed, that other sins in general have their chief effect on the mind, rather than on the body, and commonly injure others more immediately than the man himself; but lewd persons not only sin against God, their neighbors, and their own souls, but against their own bodies also; dishonoring and abusing them to the basest purposes, and bringing on them the most painful, loathsome, and destructive diseases. Thus they, as it were, take their bodies, and, by an act of cruelty to themselves, and gradual suicide, present them for sacrifices to the filthiest demons. The case is the same, in some degree, in other kinds of sensual excess; but far more in respect of this vice than any other; as every one must know, who is acquainted with the horrible effects of lewdness in populous cities; and with the very great multitudes who are annually cut off, in early life, and in the most deplorable manner imaginable, by the various diseases, with which it has pleased God to show his abhorrence of it. (P. O. Prov. 2:10—22. 5:1—14. 6:16—35.)—The language of this [276]

ch. is remarkable: 'God,' the Father, will 'raise the bodies of believers by his own power.' 14. Jn. 5:24—29. Phil. 3:20,21. Their bodies are members of Christ, and for Him, as He for them; his property, to be devoted to Him, having been 'bought with the price' of his blood. And they are also 'the temples of the Holy Ghost,' and thus his property, so that they are not their own, but God's, to glorify Him. [Note, end of Mal.] Does not all this demonstrate, that Paul considered the God, to whom Christians especially belonged, as subsisting in three divine persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to each of whom he shows their peculiar relation? This accords with the form of baptism and benediction. Mat. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:14.—'The question, "Know ye not this?" is repeated six times in this one ch.; which may seem to carry with it a just reproach to the Corinthians, who had got a new and better instructor than himself, in whom they so much gloried? Locke. [Macknight dwells at large on this idea.] SCOTT.

(18.) Every, hyperbolic, for most, as all is often put for many; or rather, fornication, beyond all others, sinneth against, injureth the body; and what more true! Alas! that this sin should have got to such a height in the world as it has. See Dr. Gall, and late 'Reports.' Ep.

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. It is evident, that those who retained their regard to the apostle's authority at Corinth, had written to him, desiring his decision of several questions, which had been started among them; and he here proceeded to answer their inquiries, especially respecting marriage. While some of them pleaded for the lawfulness of fornication, others seem to have imbibed the sentiments of the Pythaextreme into which many of the ancients run, in favor of celibacy and virginity; but good, i. e. either, abstracting from circumstances, there are many things in which the state of celibacy has the advantage above gorgans, or other philosophers, and to have deemed marriage itself inconsistent with Christian purity, or at least unfavorable to intellectual improvement. On the other hand, the Pharisees generally taught, that it was sinful for a man to live unmarried beyond his 20th year; but at the same time, they laid down many frivolous and superstitious rules, concerning the conduct of married persons. This (v. 5.) places the husband and the wife entirely on the same ground; and as much forbids him to take another woman, as it does her to cohabit with another man; so that it is absolutely decisive against polygamy. See Iken. But even among the philosophers, it had been a question often agitated, whether wise men ought to marry. Lycurgus, Thales, Antiphanes, Socrates, &c. opposed; Musonius, Hierocles, Menander, Metellus Num. maintained, on the other hand, that the procreation and education of children, was a debt due the public: [and with reason, for if only the sensual and animalized had children, there would be an end to liberty, law, and moral progress.] See Grot., and *Ros. (5.) 'By consent (says Grot.) the abstinence might be perpetual; for volenti non fit injuria. And that such abstinence was practised by the early Christians, is plain from the ecclesiastical writers. Yet it appears, the apostle did not think this expedient in the case of the Co-

the marriage-state; or else at this juncture, by reason of the distresses of the Christian church, it would be a convenience for Christians to keep themselves single, provided they have the gift of continency, and can keep themselves chaste. The expression also may carry in it an intimation, that Christians must avoid all occasions of this sin, and flee all fleshly lusts, and incentives to them; must neither look on, nor touch, a woman, so as to provoke lustful inclinations. Yet,

II. He informs them that marriage, and the comforts and satisfactions of that state, are by divine wisdom prescribed for preventing, v. 2. fornications, all sorts of lawless lust. To avoid these, Let every man, says he, and every woman marry, and confine themselves to their own mates. And when married, let each render the other due benevolence, v. 3. consider the disposition and exigency of each other, and render conjugal duty. For, as the apostle argues, v. 4. in the married state neither person has power over their own body, but has delivered it into the power of the other: the wife hers into the power of the husband, the husband his into the power of the wife. Polygamy, as well as adultery, must be a breach of marriage-covenants, and a violation of the partner's rights. And therefore they should not defraud one another of the use of their bodies, nor any other of the comforts of the conjugal state, appointed of God for keeping the vessel in sanctification and honor, and preventing the lusts of uncleanness; except it be with mutual consent, v. 5. and for a time only, while they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves to fasting and prayer. Seasons of deep humiliation require abstinence from lawful pleasures. But this separation between husband and wife must not be for a continuance, lest they expose themselves to Satan's temptations, by reason of their incontinence, or inability to contain. If persons abstain from lawful enjoyments, they may be ensnared into unlawful ones. The remedies God hath provided against sinful inclinations, are certainly best.

III. The apostle limits what he had said about every man's having his own wife, &c. v. 2. I speak this by permission, not of command. He did not lay it as an injunction on every man, to marry, without exception. Any man might marry. No law of God prohibited the thing. But, on the other hand, no law bound a man to marry, so that he sinned if he did not; I mean, unless his circumstances required it for preventing the lust of uncleanness. It was a thing in which men, by the laws of God, were in a great measure left at liberty. Therefore Paul did not bind every man to marry, though every man had an allowance. No, he could wish all men were as himself, v. 7. i. e. single, and capable of living continently in that state. But it did not answer the intentions of Divine Providence as well, for all men to have as much command of appetite as Paul had. Natural constitutions vary; and where there may not be much difference in the constitution, different degrees of grace are vouchsafed, which may give some a greater victory over natural inclination than others. The gifts of God, both in nature and grace, are variously distributed. Paul could wish all men were as himself, but all men cannot receive such a saying, save them to whom it is given, Mat. 19: 11.

IV. He sums up his sense on this head, v. 9, 10. I say therefore to those in a state of virginity or widowhood, It is good for them if they abide even as I. Many conveniences, especially at this juncture, in a single state, render it preferable to a married one. But if they cannot contain, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn. This is God's remedy for lust. And marriage, with all its inconveniences, is much better than to burn rinthians, since he adds the injunction, that this be done "for a season (only)." It was practised by the Jews, in preparation for solemn festivals, and at other times when they wished to devote themselves to religious duties, on which occasions fasting, too, was usually enjoined. The different schools of the Rabbins recommended various periods of it; the Schammæi, a fortnight; the Hillehiani, a week. Nor was this custom unknown to the heathens; see Hets., &c., as at the unusual feast of Ceres, for nine days. To fasting, &c.] These words (omitted in six mss. and some other MSS., and several fathers) were rejected by Mill and Bengel, Krause and Griesb. but I think on insufficient grounds. Incontinency. Akrasia: infirmity; i. e. by means of your not being able to contain yourselves. Aristotle calls those akrateis who do not remain constant in a good resolution, but succumb to the allurements of vice. Grot. BLOOMF.

V. 6—9. The apostle stated the things, which have been considered, as what were allowable; but not as giving an absolute commandment. Men might use their own discretion about marrying; and married persons, concerning their conduct in that state; provided they did not needlessly thwart each other's inclinations, do injustice to one another, or throw any temptation in their own or each other's way. Some think Paul was a widower, but this is uncertain. We cannot suppose he wished marriage to cease among Christians; but only that every one might be enabled calmly to use his prudence in that respect, without being necessitated to marry, when otherwise it would not have been advisable. But the apostle knew, that his experience, in this matter, was not a rule for other men; as his superiority to the animal inclinations was a special gift of God, which He gave to one and not to another, as He saw good; and that in different proportions. [See end of Rom. 7. Men are born with the elementary faculties of the intellect, sentiments, and propensities, in a definite proportion to each other. This can be very much altered, however, by education: careful then should we be of our own and children's habits. Ed.] 4:6,7. (7.) 'As myself.' 'I. e. "could as easily bear the severities of a single life, in present circumstances, and exercise as resolute a command over their natural desires." For it would be a most flagrant absurdity, to suppose Paul wished marriage might entirely cease. It shows, therefore, how unfair and improper it is, in various cases, to strain the apostle's words to the utmost rigor, as if he perpetually used the most critical exactness; but, indeed, ch. 9:22. is so full an instance to the contrary, that it is not necessary to multiply remarks of this kind.' with impure and lustful desires. Marriage is honorable in all ; but it is a duty to them who cannot contain, nor conquer those inclinations.

V. 10—16. In this paragraph, the apostle gives direction in a case which must have been very frequent in that age, especially among the Jewish converts ; I mean, whether they were to live with heathen relatives in a married state. Moses' law permitted divorce ; and there was a famous instance in the Jewish state, when the people were obliged to put away their idolatrous wives, Ezra 10:3. This might move the scruple in many minds. And,

I. In general, he tells them, that marriage, by Christ's command, is for life ; and therefore those who are married must not think of separation, v. 10, 11. This I command, says the apostle ; yet not I, but the Lord. Not that he commanded anything on his own authority. Whatever he commanded, was the Lord's command ; dictated by his Spirit, and enjoined by his authority. But his meaning is, that the Lord Himself, with his own mouth, had forbidden such separations, Mat. 5:32. 19:9. Mk. 10:11. Lu. 16:18. They must not separate for any other cause than what Christ allows. And therefore the apostle advises, that if any woman had been separated, either by a voluntary act of her own, or by an act of her husband, she should continue unmarried, and seek reconciliation with her husband, that they might cohabit again.

11. He brings the general advice home to the case of such as had an unbelieving mate, v. 12. the Lord had not so expressly spoken to this case as to the former of divorce. It does not mean, that the apostle spake without authority from the Lord, or decided this case by his own wisdom, without the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He closes this subject with a declaration to the contrary, v. 40. I think, also, that I have the Spirit of God. But having thus prefaced his advice, we may attend,

1. To the advice itself ; which is, that if an unbelieving husband or wife were pleased to dwell with a Christian relative, the other should not separate, v. 12, 13. The Christian calling did not dissolve the marriage covenant, but bind it the faster, by bringing it back to the original institution, limiting it to two persons, and binding them together for life. But though a believing wife or husband should not separate from an unbelieving, yet, if the unbelieving desert the believer, and no means can reconcile to a cohabitation, in such a case, a brother or sister is not in bondage, v. 15. not tied up to the unreasonable humor, and bound servilely to follow or cleave to the malicious deserter ; or not bound to live unmarried, after all proper means for reconciliation have been tried ; at least, if the deserter contract another marriage, or be guilty of adultery ; which was a very easy supposition, because a very common instance among the heathen inhabitants of Corinth. In such a case, the deserted person must be free to marry again, and it is granted on all hands. And some think, that such a malicious desertion is as much a dissolution of the marriage-covenant, as death itself. For how is it possible, that the two shall be one flesh, when the one is maliciously bent to part from, or put away, the other ? Indeed, the deserter seems still bound by the matrimonial contract ; and therefore the apostle says, v. 11. If the woman depart from her husband, on account of his infidelity, let her remain unmarried. But the deserted party seems to be left more at liberty (I mean, supposing all the proper means have been used to reclaim the deserter, and other circumstances make it necessary) to marry another person. It does not seem reasonable that they should be still bound, when it is rendered impossible to perform conjugal duties, or enjoy conjugal comforts, through the mere fault of their mate : in such a case marriage would be a state of servitude indeed. But whatever liberty be indulged Christians in such a case as this, they are not allowed, for the mere infidelity of a husband or wife, to separate ; but, if the unbeliever be willing, they should continue in the relation, and cohabit as those who are thus related. This is the apostle's general direction.

2. We have here the reasons of this advice ; (1.) Because the relation or state is sanctified by the holiness of either party, v. 14. The apostle tells them, that, though they were yoked with unbelievers, yet, if themselves were holy, marriage was to them a holy state, and marriage-comforts, even with an unbelieving relative, were sanctified enjoyments. If one of the relatives were become holy, nothing of the duties or lawful comforts of the married state could defile them, and render them displeasing to God, though the other were a heathen. He is sanctified for the wife's sake. She is sanctified for the husband's sake. Both are one flesh. He is to be reputed clean, who is one flesh with her that is holy, and in like manner if the terms are exchanged ; Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy, v. 14. that is, they would be heathen, out of the pale of the church and covenant of God. They would not be of the holy seed, as the Jews are called, Is. 6:13. but common and unclean, in the same sense as heathens in general were styled in the apostle's vision, Acts 10:28. This way of speaking is according to the dialect of the Jews ; among whom a child, begot by parents yet heathens, was said to be begotten out of holiness ; and a child begotten by parents made proselytes, is said to be begotten within the holy inclosure. Thus Christians are called commonly saints ; such they are by profession, separated to be a peculiar people of God, and as such distinguished from the world ; and therefore the children born to Christians, though married to unbelievers, are not to be reckoned as part of the world, but of the church, a holy, not a common and unclean seed. What a comfort is this, where both relatives are believers !

(2.) Another reason is, that God hath called Christians to peace, v. 15. The Christian religion obliges us to act peaceably in all relations, natural and civil. We are bound, as much as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men, Rom. 12:18. and therefore surely to promote the peace and comfort of our nearest relatives, those with whom we are one flesh, nay, though they should be infidels.

(3.) A third reason is, that it is possible for the believing relative to be an instrument

V. 10—14. This exposition [the same as in Henry] of the Scripture before us, has indeed been much controverted ; and some have explained 'holy,' or 'unclean,' to mean legitimate, or illegitimate ; but in all the places, where these words are found in Scripture, there is not one which will admit of this sense. No doubt, the children of the heathen, who were lawfully married, were as legitimate as those of Christians ; yet they were never said to be 'holy.' Something more must be meant, by the believer 'sanctifying' the unbelieving party, than merely legalizing their marriage ; for that would have been valid and lawful, if both had been unbelievers ; and the children would not really be more 'holy,' in respect of their nature, if one parent was a believer, than if both were unbelievers. But as the word 'unclean' is frequently used in a relative sense, denoting unfit to be admitted to God's ordinances, and 'holy' the contrary ; as in this sense the male children of the Jews were 'holy,' and so partakers of circumcision ; while those of the Gentiles, and even such as had one idolatrous parent, were 'unclean,' and excluded from circumcision ; I cannot but conclude, after long attention to the subject, that the baptism of the infant-offspring of Christians, is here evidently referred to, as at that time customary in the churches ; and that the Corinthians knew, that this was not objected to, when only one parent was a Christian.—Hence then the argument for infant baptism runs thus : If the holy seed among the Jews was therefore to be circumcised, and to be made federally holy, by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people ; because they were born in sanctity, or were seminally holy ; for, "the root being holy, so are the branches also ;" then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian covenant, "the laver of regeneration ;" and so be entered into the society of the Christian church. Whitby. Ex. 19:6. Deut. 7:6—8. Ezra 9:1, 2. Mal. 2:10—16. Rom. 11:16—21. 'It would be proving a thing by itself, . . . to argue, that the converse of the parents was lawful, because the children were not bastards ; whereas all, who thought the converse of the parents unlawful, must of course think that the children were illegitimate.' Doddr.

(10.) 'Not so much I, as the Lord. Mat. 5:32. 19:3—10. Moses did not, the Greeks and Romans did permit the wife to separate from the husband.' Bloomf.

(12.) The rest. 'I. e. marriage, where but one party is Christian : of such Christ did not speak, nor could He without anticipating the designs of the Deity.' Id.

(14.) 'The one is so sanctified by the other, that their matrimonial converse is as lawful as if they were both of the same faith.' [So, substantially, Crell., Scater, Camer., Beza, Calv., most Dutch comtrs., Whit., Wolf, Beng.] 'Nothing can be more obvious than that the word holy, signifies persons who might be permitted to partake of the distinguishing rites of God's people. Comp. Ex. 19:6. Deut. 7:6. 14:2. 26:19. 33:3. Ezra 9:2. with Is. 35:8. 3:1. Acts 10:23, &c.' Doddr.

V. 15, 16.—Total and perpetual desertion, when accompanied by evident adultery in the deserting party, undoubtedly sets the other party at full liberty, according to the scriptural rule ; for deserting a husband or wife to live with another man or woman, or in any way evidently adulterous, must as much dissolve the marriage, as a divorce explicitly given on account of adultery ; and there is no restriction, in any part of the Holy Scriptures, laid on divorced persons, to inhibit them from marrying, though very many, imposed by human laws, are often spoken of, as if scriptural injunctions. Mat. 19:1—9. Scott.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—24. That which is good in itself, may not always be best for a man, when every circumstance is weighed; and when all the variety of inward evils and outward temptations, connected with it, are duly considered; so that those things, which are good for one, must not so much as be recommended to another; because he is incapable of overcoming the difficulties and temptations to which they expose him. To prevent the fatal effects of unchastity, and of the strong propensity of most men to it, it is generally 'expedient,' and always allowable, that 'every man should have his own wife, and every woman her own husband.' All restrictions of this allowance, uniformly tend to licentiousness; and no tongue can express the mischiefs, which arise from covetousness, licentious, and constrained celibacy.—Every part of the conduct of married persons also ought to be so regulated, as to render them agreeable to each other, and satisfied in the relation. For, not only adultery and polygamy are inconsistent with the duties of this relation, and with the mutual property of married persons in each other, but also, whatever is disobliging, and tends to weaken the attachment, and to open the way for either of them to look with greater satisfaction on another object.—Everything in the Christian's conduct should be regulated, in subserviency to his communion with God.—Those who, like the apostle, are enabled to live with purity and contentment in an unmarried state, should copy his example, by laying themselves out with double diligence to glorify God, and to be useful to mankind; they should also imitate his prudence and candor, in not pre-

V. 17—24. The preceding subject led the apostle to digress to a more general topic. Thus, if a Jew or circumcised proselyte had been converted, let him not deny his circumcision; or refuse that regard to the ceremonial law, which might tend to conciliate his unbelieving brethren: but let not the uncircumcised convert submit to that abrogated ordinance, or at all take that yoke upon him. It is obvious, the apostle is not here speaking of the way of justification, but of the conduct of justified believers. Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15, 16. The three particulars, which here, and in the texts referred to, the apostle selects, in this connexion, should not be considered as existing separately. For he who is 'a new creature,' possesses 'faith which worketh by love,' and this love constrains him to 'keep the commandments of God.' Jn. 14:15—21. 2 Cor. 5:13—17. The Gospel would teach a man how to behave in any condition, and patiently to bear its inconveniences. Every man, therefore, ought contentedly to 'abide with God,' by constantly performing the duties of that situation, in which he was converted to the faith of Christ.—Ministers were, at that time, entirely taken from among the converts to Christ in every church, most of whom had doubtless been previously employed in other occupations; and seminaries for educating men for this service were not then known; it is therefore evident, that the apostle did not mean to forbid that change of employment, when it could be made advisedly, and on good grounds, as well as from proper motives; and in other respects his general rule might admit of some exceptions.—'They should not change, on a presumption, that Christianity gave them a new and peculiar liberty so to do,' Locke.—The context favors the supposition, that those changes, which some might be induced to make, from an erroneous judgment, in respect of their liberty or duty as Christians, were the primary object, that the apostle had in view; yet his general language seems to imply, that he meant to extend the rule to various other cases.—Dr. Whitby and some others explain the words, 'Ye are bought with a price,' of those slaves, who had been charitably ransomed at the expense of their fellow Christians. But their fellow Christians obtained no property in them, by thus ransoming them, as Christ does by ransoming us; the advice is general, and not limited to these persons: and it is far more obvious to suppose, that the apostle used this expression in the same sense, in which he had before employed it. 6:12.—20.—(24) Abide with God, &c. 'Neither deserting his master on pre-of the other's salvation, v. 16. It is the plain duty of those in so near a relation, to endeavor the salvation of their souls to whom they are related. 'Do not separate. There is other duty now called for. Stay, and labor heartily the conversion of thy relative. Endeavor to save a soul. Who knows but this may be the event? It is not impossible. And though there be no great probability, saving a soul is so good and glorious a service, that the bare possibility should put one on exerting one's self.' Mere possibility of success should be a sufficient motive with us to use our diligent endeavors for saving the souls of our relations. 'What know I, but I may save his soul?' should move me to attempt it.'

V. 17—24. Here he advises them to continue in the state and condition in which Christianity found them, and they became converts to it.

I. He lays down this rule in general,—as God hath distributed to every one. Our states and circumstances in this world are distributions of Divine Providence. And again, As the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. Whatever his circumstances and condition were when he was converted to Christianity, let him abide therein, and suit his conversation to it; the rules of Christianity reach every condition, and this is the duty every Christian. The apostle adds, that this was a general rule, to be observed at all times and in all places,—So ordain I in all churches.

II. He specifies particular cases; as, I. That of circumcision. It matters not whether a man be a Jew or Gentile, circumcised or uncircumcised. For, as the apostle goes on, circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God, v. 19. In point of acceptance with God, it is neither here nor there whether men be circumcised or not. It is practical religion, sincere obedience to the commands of God, on which the Gospel lays stress. External observances, without internal piety, are as nothing. Therefore let every man abide in the calling, the state, wherein he was called, v. 20. 2. That of servitude and freedom. It was common in that age of the world, for many to be in a state of slavery, bought and sold for money, and so the property of those who purchased them. 'Now,' says the apostle, 'art thou called, being a servant? Care not for it. Be not over-solicitous about it. It is not inconsistent with thy duty, profession, or hopes, as a Christian. Yet, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather,' v. 21. There are many conveniences in a state of freedom, above that of servitude: a man has more power over himself, and more command of his time, and is not under the control of another lord; and therefore, liberty is the more eligible state. But men's outward condition does not let nor further their acceptance with God. For he that is called, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman, as he that is called, being free, is the Lord's servant. Though he be not discharged from his master's service, he is freed from the dominion and vassalage of sin. Though he be not enslaved to Christ, yet he is bound to yield himself up wholly to his pleasure and service; and yet that service is perfect freedom. Our comfort and happiness depend on scribing his own conduct to others, as obligatory on them in this respect; or despising those who are not endued with the same gift; remembering that, in this also, God has 'made them to differ.' In counselling our brethren also we should use caution; lest by exciting a man to grasp at advantages, which are out of his reach, we should cast him into circumstances of insuperable temptation; urge him to that which is contrary to his duty; and dissuade him from what is best for him, and indeed incumbent on him; for, in such matters, no man is competent to judge for another, but every one must determine for himself; or rather, he should seek counsel from God how he ought to act.—It is the express commandment of God, that married persons should not separate from each other, if it can possibly be avoided; and that such as have separated, should endeavor to be reconciled, or else live single. It is also his will, that husbands and wives should be careful to please each other in lawful things, though it leave them less time for religious exercises, than they enjoyed in a single state. Even if a believer has been married to an unbeliever, either before conversion, or by inattention to the rule of the sacred Word; the cross of that incongruous union must be patiently endured, and the duties of the relation cheerfully performed; that by kindness, by a good example, and by fervent prayers, the unbelieving party may be won over, and the immortal soul saved.—In every state and relation, we should remember, that God has 'called us to peace;' and that everything should be done to promote domestic and social harmony, as far as truth and holiness will permit. Yet] so Camer., Schmidt, Starck, Estius, De Dieu, and the Syr. And this sense, they think, is confirmed by the following consolatory words: "For he," &c. It is also ably defended by De Dieu and Wolf. But there is a certain harshness about it to which necessity alone would reconcile me. What is detrimental to human happiness, cannot be promotive of virtue. The true int. seems that of Beza, Grot., Ham., and most recent comtrs. And he remarks, that a misunderstanding of the nature of Christian liberty, had made many Christian slaves not only murmur at their situation, but seek to throw off all bondage.' BL. 28 But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you.

29 But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none;

31 And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

what we are to Christ, not what we are in the world. He who is a slave, may yet be a Christian freeman; he who is a freeman, may yet be Christ's servant. Not that he must quit the service of his master, or not take all proper measures to please him; (this were to contradict the whole scope of the apostle's discourse;) but he must not be so the servant of men, but that Christ's will must be obeyed, and regarded, more than his master's. He has paid a much dearer purchase for him, and has a much fuller property in him. He is to be served and obeyed without limitation or reserve. The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master beside Himself, should serve no man, any further than is consistent with their duty to Him. Though some understand this passage, of persons being brought out of slavery by the bounty and charity of fellow Christians; and read the passage thus, *Have you been redeemed out of slavery with a price? The fathers, and ancient comtrs., take the words in a metaphorical sense: as do Lightf., Par., &c., and Bl., whom see. Ed.

V. 25—28. The apostle here resumes his former subject, with a special reference to those who had never been married; for he seems to use the word, rendered 'virgins,' in this latitude, including both unmarried men and women. 'Here Estius takes care to add, that the apostle must be understood only . . . of virgins who were not under a vow of continence; . . . And on 28. . . Both which exceptions, seeing Paul, assisted by the Holy Spirit, thought not fit to add, we may presume that he knew nothing of that matter.'—Whitby.

meaning the words will bear, but the other seems the more natural. See ch. 6:20.

III. He sums up his advice, v. 24. This is to be understood of the state wherein a man is converted to Christianity. No man should make his faith or religion, an argument to break through any natural or civil obligations. He should quietly and comfortably abide in the condition in which he is; and this he may well do, when he may abide therein with God. The special presence and favor of God are not limited to any outward condition or performance. He may enjoy it, who is circumcised, or bound, as well as he who is free. In this respect, there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free, Col. 3:11. The favor of God is not bound.

V. 25—35. The apostle here resumes his discourse, and gives directions to virgins how to act. Notice,

I. The manner wherein he introduces them, v. 25. I have, says he, 'no express and universal law, delivered by the Lord Himself, concerning celibacy; but I give my judgment, as one who hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, in the apostleship.' Faithfulness in the ministry is owing to the grace and mercy of Christ. It is what Paul was ready to acknowledge upon all occasions, ch. 15:10. And it is a great mercy they obtain from God, who prove faithful in the ministry of his Word, either ordinary or extraordinary.

II. The determination he gives; which, considering the present distress, was, that a state of celibacy was preferable; It is good for a man so to be, i. e. to be single. I suppose, says the apostle, or it is my opinion. It is worded with modesty, but delivered, notwithstanding, with apostolical authority. It is not the mere opinion of a private man, but the very determination of the Spirit of God in an apostle, though thus spoken. And it was thus delivered, to give it the more weight. Those that were prejudiced against the apostle, might have rejected this advice, had it been given with a more authoritative air. Being then continually liable to be tossed and hurried by persecution; he did not think it so advisable for them that were single, to change conditions. The married state would bring more care and cumber along with it, v. 33, 34. and would therefore make persecution more terrible, and render them less able to bear it. Christians, in regulating their conduct, should not barely consider what is lawful in itself, but what may be expedient for them.

III. Notwithstanding he thus determines, he is very careful to satisfy them that he does not condemn marriage in the gross, or declare it unlawful. Therefore, though he says, 'If thou art in a single state, do not hastily change conditions;' yet he adds, 'If thou art married, do not seek to be unmarried, but do the duties of the married relation.' He adds, therefore, further, 'Marrying is not in itself a sin, but marrying at this time is likely to bring inconvenience, and add to the calamities of the times; therefore he thought it advisable and expedient, that such as could contain, should refrain from it; but he would not lay celibacy on them as a yoke, or, by seeming to urge it too far, draw them into any snare; therefore he says, But I spare you. How opposite in this the papist casuists are to the apostle Paul! They forbid many to marry, and entangle them with vows of celibacy, whether they can bear the yoke or no.

IV. He takes this occasion to give general rules to all Christians, to carry themselves with a holy indifferency toward the world, and everything in it. 1. As to relations; They that had wives, must not set their hearts too much on the comforts of the relation: they must be as though they had none. This advice must be carried into every other relation. Those that have children, should be as though they had none. They that were their comfort now, may prove their greatest cross. And soon may the flower of all comforts be cut down. 2. As to afflictions; They that weep, must not be dejected too much with any afflictions, nor indulge in the sorrow of the world; but keep up a holy joy in God, in the midst of trouble, so that even in sorrow the heart may be joyful, and the end of grief be gladness. And if we can but get to heaven at last, all tears shall be wiped from our eyes. The prospect of it, now, should make us moderate our sorrows, and refrain our tears. 3. As to worldly enjoyments; They that rejoice should not take too great a complacency in any of their comforts. Here is not their rest, nor are these things their portion; therefore their hearts should not be set on them, nor should they place their solace or satisfaction in them. 4. As to worldly traffic and employment; They that buy, that prosper in trade, increase in wealth, and purchase estates, should hold these possessions as though they held them not. It is but setting their hearts on that which is not, Prov. 23:5. to do otherwise. Luke 14:18, 19. They are most likely to run so as to obtain the prize, who ease their minds of all foreign cares and cumberance. 5. As to all worldly concerns, v. 31. The world may be used, but must not be abused. It is abused when not used to honor God and do good to men: when, instead of being a servant, it is made our master, our idol, and has that room in our affections, which should be reserved for God. We must keep the world as much as may be out of our hearts, that we may not abuse it when we have it in our hands.

The apostle enforces these advices with two reasons; (1.) The time is short, v. 29. We have but a short season to possess and enjoy worldly things; it is contracted, reduced, will soon be gone. Therefore set not your hearts on worldly enjoyments. Possess what you must shortly leave, without suffering yourselves to be possessed by it. Why should your hearts be much set on what you must quickly resign? (2.) The fashion of this world passeth away, v. 31. the habit, figure, appearance of the world, passeth away.

V. 32—35. By the preceding counsel, the apostle intended to preserve believers from perplexing cares and anxieties, especially in that unsettled state of the church. This counsel of the apostle was far from warranting or persuading them to shut themselves up in convents, and thus to put the lighted candle under a bushel; on the contrary, it instructed them to 'let their light shine before men,' by an uninterrupted series of 33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife.

34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married <sup>b</sup> careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry.

37 Nevertheless, he that standeth steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So <sup>i</sup> then, he that giveth her in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

It is daily changing countenance, is in a continual flux, is not so much a world, as the appearance of one. All is show, a transient show, and will be quickly gone. How proper and powerful an argument is this to enforce the former advice!

V. He presses his general advice, by warning them against the embarrassment of worldly cares, v. 3. Indeed, to be careless is a fault; a wise concern about worldly interests is a duty; but to be care-full, full of care, to have an anxious and perplexing care about them, is a sin. It is the wisdom of a Christian, so to order his outward affairs, and choose such a condition in life, as to be without distracting cares, that he may attend on the Lord [i. e. his duties] with a mind at leisure and disengaged. This is the general maxim by which the apostle would have Christians govern themselves. In the application of it, Christian prudence must direct. That condition of life is best for every man, which is best for his soul, and keeps him most clear of the cares and snares of the world. By this maxim, the apostle solves the case put to him by the Corinthians, whether it were advisable to marry? Ordinarily, the less care we have about the world, the more freedom we have for the service of God. Now the married state, at that time, (if not at all times,) did bring most worldly care along with it, v. 32, 33, 34. Not but the married person may be holy, both in body and spirit too. Celibacy is not, in itself, a state of greater purity and sanctity than marriage; but the unmarried would be able to make religion more their business at that juncture, because they would have less distraction from worldly cares. At that season, therefore, the apostle advises, that those who were single should abstain from marriage, if they were under no necessity to change conditions. And where the same reason is plain at other times, the rule is as plain, and as fit to be observed. And the very same rule must determine persons for marriage, where there is the same reason; i. e. if, in the unmarried state, persons are likely to be more distracted in the service of God, than if they were married; which is a case supposable in many respects. That condition of life should be chosen by the Christian, in which it is most likely he shall have the best helps, and the least hindrances, in the service of God, and the affairs of his own [and others'] salvation.

V. 36—38. In this passage, the apostle is commonly supposed to give advice about the disposal of children, in marriage, on the principle of his former determination. In this view, the general meaning is plain. It was in that age, especially among the Jews, reckoned a disgrace for a woman to remain unmarried, past a certain number of years: 'Now,' says the apostle, 'if any man thinks he behaves unhand-somely toward his daughter, and that it is not for her credit to remain unmarried, when she is of full age, and that, on this principle, it is needful to dispose of her in marriage, he may use his pleasure. It is no sin in him, to dispose of her to a suitable mate. But if a man has determined in himself to keep her a virgin, and stands to this determination, and is under no necessity to dispose of her in marriage, but is at liberty, with her consent, to pursue his purpose, he does well in keeping her a virgin. In short, he that giveth her in marriage, does well; but he that keeps her single, if she can be easy and innocent in such a state, does what is better; i. e. more convenient for her in the present state of things, if not at all times and seasons. Note, Children should be at the disposal of their parents, and not dispose of themselves in marriage. Yet note again, Parents should consult their children's inclinations, both to marriage in general, and to the person in particular, and not reckon they have uncontrollable power to do with them, and dictate to them, as they please. Thirdly, It is our duty not only to consider what is lawful, but in many cases, at least, what is fit to be done, before we do it.

But I think the apostle is here continuing his former discourse, and advising unmarried persons, who are at their own disposal, what to do; the man's virgin being meant of his virginity. To keep his virgin, v. 37, seems to be rather meant of preserving his own virginity, than keeping his daughter a virgin; though it be altogether uncommon to use the word in this sense. Several other reasons may be seen in Locke and Whitby. And it was a common matter of reproach, both among Jews and civilized heathens, for a man to continue single beyond such a term of years, though all did not agree in limiting the single life to the same term. The general meaning of the apostle is the same, that it was no sin to marry, if a man thought there was a necessity on him, to avoid popular reproach, much less to avoid the hurrying fervors of lust. But he that was in his own power, stood firm in his purpose, and found himself under no necessity to marry, would, at that season, and in the circumstances of Christians at that time, at least, make a choice every way most for his own conveniency, ease, and advantage, as to his spiritual concerns. And it is highly expedient, if not a duty, for Christians to be guided by such a consideration.

V. 39, 40. The whole is here closed up with advice to widows; As long as the husband liveth, the wife is bound by the law; confined to one husband, and bound to continue and cohabit with him. Note, Death only can annul the bond of marriage. But the husband being dead, she is at liberty to marry whom she will. It is certain, from this passage, that second marriages are not unlawful; for then

PRACT. OBS. V. 25—40. Those who have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and who have most studied the Word of God, and human nature, will be the most candid and cautious in giving their judgment, or passing their censures; for whatever may be good in respect of present difficulties or peculiar circumstances, they know that marriage is honorable, and fornication is abominable, in all persons and circumstances. They will therefore be careful not to speak, as if marriage were sinful in any; and they will be peculiarly cautious not to throw a snare on those that pay deference to their judgment.—Great discretion is also needful for parents and guardians, in their conduct respecting young persons; that they do not, by laying down rules and making determinations, according to their own views of what is most for their interest, lead them into dangerous temptations; for it may be 'doing well,' to permit young persons to marry, if their attachments or inclinations lead that way; when otherwise it would be 'doing better' to prevent them; as even apparent imprudence, and its troubles, are better than sin and its deplorable consequences. How absurd then most vows of celibacy and perpetual virginity be! especially in young persons, who are as yet incapable of forming a judgment for future years; and are probably induced to do it, by the plans of others concerning them, and those plans often formed from secular motives, and what is thought the most desirable way of settling the different branches of the family. The general consequence of them will be, either the violation of their vows; or a life spent amidst temptation and mental defilement; or still worse. This was man's policy. How different from the wisdom of God, even in this ch.; which contains in it more in favor of a single life, than all the rest of the Scripture taken together does!—Believers, when under no other restriction, should be sure, in contracting marriage, to remember the limitation made by the apostle, 'only in the Lord.' What miseries have many endured through the reanant of their lives, and what bad consequences have they entailed on their families, by transgressing it, on one vain pretence or other! Let every one then beware in time, that they may not rashly take a step, which they may have cause deeply to bewail to the end of life. Sc.

active services, for the glory of God and the benefit of the world. Mat. 5:14—16. Yet he only gave them this counsel for their profit; and would not by any means 'cast a snare on them,' by persuading those to a single life, who had not a sufficient command over their own passions. He did not mean that this was required of them, but that in some cases it would be comely, and enable them to wait upon God in his ordinances and commandments, without having their thoughts or affections divided and distracted by other cares or attachments. V. 36—38. Hitherto the apostle's meaning has been evident; but these vs. are not without difficulty. Some explain them of a man's resolutely continuing in a single state; supposing the 'necessity' mentioned, to be matter of personal consciousness, and not anything arising from the conduct of another; but such a construction of the original is, by their own allowance, without example. Others would refer them to the ease of a man, who had betrothed a virgin, and was in doubt whether he should complete the marriage; but 'to marry' is not the same as 'to give in marriage.' It seems therefore most obvious to explain the passage of a parcat, or guardian, who had the charge of a virgin. Scott.

The language employed in several places of this ch., has led most expositors to conclude, that the apostle did not write by inspiration, in the particulars referred to; and doubtless these intimations, thus understood, would rather prove, than invalidate, his immediate inspiration in other parts of his writings. 2 S. 7:1—4. the widow could not be at liberty to marry whom she pleased, nor to marry a second time at all. But in our choice of relations, and change of conditions, we should always have an eye to God. Marriages are then only likely to have God's blessing, when they are made in the Lord; when persons are guided by the fear of God, and the laws of God, and act in dependence on the providence of God, in the change and choice of a mate; when they can look up to God, and sincerely seek his direction, and humbly hope for his blessing on their conduct. But she is happier, says the apostle, if she so abide, i. e. continue a widow, in my judgment; and I think I have the Spirit of God, v. 40. At this juncture, at least, if not ordinarily, it will be much more for the peace and quiet of such, and give them less hindrance in the service of God, to continue unmarried. And this, he tells them, was by inspiration of the Spirit. Change of condition in marriage is so important a matter, that it ought not to be made but on due deliberation, after careful consideration of circumstances, and on very probable grounds, at least, that it will be a change to advantage in our spiritual concerns.

no sufficient ground for the distinction; sometimes he spoke by way of 'permission,' concerning what was allowable; sometimes by way of 'counsel,' concerning what was advisable; and at other times 'by commandment,' concerning what was absolutely binding on their consciences. But, in all this, he might be, and doubtless was, guided by the Spirit of inspiration; some things being expressly forbidden; others as expressly commanded; others allowed, as far as expedient or beneficial.

Concluding Note. V. 40. 'It is the almost universal opinion of comtr., that the term, doko echein [I think I have], is an emphatic meiosis, expressive of full persuasion and certainty. So Grot., Sc., Beza, Wolf, Whit., Pyle, Doddr., and Mack., who adduce several examples of this sense, both from the scriptural and classical writers. But I assent to Stade, that "the sense of doko does not, in any of these instances, so clearly denote a certainty, as to make them matter of indisputable authority." But even if it were so (observes he), there is yet a question, whether the context leads us to the same interpretation of it here: and, notwithstanding the great weight of opinion in favor of this sense, it is proper to consider what may be urged against it. The words kata ten emen gnomen [tr. "according to my opinion"], do not suggest any idea of absolute, infallible assurance (but the contrary? Ed.); and if Paul had wished his decision to rest upon such ground, by an appeal to the certain operation of the Spirit, it appears unlikely that he would have expressed it by the ambiguous phrase, doko echein. Paul, indeed, though he had no doubt of his determinations and directions being conformable to the will of God, yet might not be called unequivocally to declare that he was speaking from immediate inspiration. The whole subject, indeed, appears to be treated rather in the language of private judgment, than of divine authority; see especially v. 6, 10, 23, 35, and notes. The present cl. may be tr.: "and I trust that I also (or, even I) have the spirit of God." I entirely agree with this judicious commentator, on the general force of the expression, which seems to have been similarly understood by Theoph., our venerable Eng. Trs., also Han. and Ros. Indeed the phrase, kata ten emen gnomen, "ought to have prevented any misapprehension of the apostle's meaning, since it is," as Pa', truly remarks, "a formula of one modestly interpreting his judgment concerning a thing;" of which philological commentators give several examples.' CHAP. VIII. V. 1-3. The apostle comes here to the case of things that had been offered to idols, concerning which some had sought satisfaction. For better understanding, it must be observed, that it was a custom among the heathens, to make feasts on their sacrifices; and not only to eat themselves, but invite their friends to partake with them. These were usually kept in the temple, where the sacrifice was offered, v. 10. and if anything were left when the feast ended, it was usual to carry away a portion to their friends; what remained, after all, belonging to the priest, who sometimes sold it in the markets. See ch. 10:25. Nay, feasts, as Athenæus informs us, were always accounted, among the heathen, sacred and religious things, so that they were wont to sacrifice before all their feasts; and it was accounted a very profane thing among them, to eat at their private tables any meat, whereof they had not first sacrificed on such occasions.

In this circumstance of things, while Christians lived among idolaters, and had occasion to eat at their tables, what should they do, if anything that had been sacrificed should be set before them? What, if they should be invited to feast with them in their temples? It seems some of the Corinthians were got into an opinion, that even this might be done, because they knew an idol was nothing in the world, v. 4. The apostle seems here to argue on supposition of their being right in this thought, against their abuse of their liberty, to the prejudice of others; but plainly condemns such liberty in ch. 10. He introduces his discourse with some remarks about knowledge, that seem to carry in them a censure of such pretences to knowledge as I have mentioned; We know, says he, that we all have knowledge, v. 1. as if he had said, We who abstain, know as much as you of the vanity of idols, and that they are nothing; but we know too, that the liberty you take is very culpable, and that even lawful liberty must be used with charity, and not to the prejudice of weaker brethren. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth, v. 1. Note, The preference of charity to conceited knowledge. True love, and tender regard to our brethren, will put us on consulting their interest, and acting, as may be for their edification. Observe, There is no more common evidence of ignorance than a conceit of knowledge, v. 2. He that knows most, best understands his own ignorance, and the imperfection of human knowledge. It is one thing to know truth, and another to know it as we ought; so as duly to improve our knowledge. Much may be known, when nothing is known to any good purpose; when neither ourselves nor others are the better for our knowledge. But, adds the apostle, if any man love God, the same is known of God. If any man love God, and is thereby influenced to love his neighbor, the same is known of God; i. e. as some understand it, is made by Him to know, is taught of God; or, as others, shall be approved of God; He will accept him, and have pleasure in him. The charitable person is most likely to have God's favor. They who love God, and for his sake love their brethren, are likely to be beloved of God: and how much better is it, to be approved of God, than to have a vain opinion of ourselves!

V. 4-6. In this passage, he shows the vanity of idols; the form of expression in the original, is elliptical, but the meaning in the general is, that heathen idols have no divinity in them; therefore in the O. T. they are commonly called lies and vanities, or lying vanities. They are mere imaginary gods, many of them no better than imaginary beings; they have no power to pollute the creatures of God, and thereby render them unfit to be eaten by a child or servant of God, 1 Tim. 4:3.

And there is no other God but one. Note, The unity of the Godhead is a fundamental principle in Christianity, and in all right religion; for there is no other God but one. Others may be called gods, but they are falsely thus called. The heathens had many such, some in heaven, and some on earth; celestial deities, and terrestrial ones, men made into gods, to mediate for men with the former, and deputed by them to preside over earthly affairs; in Scripture commonly called Baalim. But all their divinity and mediation were imaginary. For, 1. To us there is but one God, says the apostle; not one God to govern one part of mankind, or one rank and order of men, and another to govern another. One God that made all, and therefore has power over all. All things are of Him, and we, and all things else, are for Him. Called the Father, here, not in contradistinction to the other persons of the sacred Trinity, and to exclude them from the Godhead, but in contradistinction to all creatures that were made by God, and whose formation is attributed to each of these three in other places of Scripture, and not appro-

V. 4-6. The Lord Jesus cannot here be spoken of, in respect of his original nature, as if inferior to the Father, any more than in those texts, which more directly speak of his mediatorial Person, character, office, and authority. Jn. 14:27,28. The One God, even the Father, signifies the Godhead, as the sole object of all religious worship; and the Lord Jesus Christ denotes the Person of Emmanuel, 'God manifest in the flesh,' One with the Father, and One with us, the appointed Mediator, and Lord of all; through whom we come to the Father, and through whom the Father communicates all blessings to us, by the operations of the Holy Spirit. So that this passage proves, that Christ the Mediator is the Object of our worship, as One with the Father and the Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead; and as opposed to all others to whom divine adoration was rendered, or by whom it was claimed; or to whom it has since been abundantly and idolatrously rendered by professed Christians. Col. 2:18-20. This, at the Reformation, was a noble protest against the worship of saints and angels, as mediators, by the papists. The Gentiles generally acknowledged one Supreme Deity; but they surrounded him with such a group of inferior gods and demigods that he seemed lost, or neglected in the crowd. Thus it has been in

But this is little more than a theory, note, end of Jer. 46.

V. 7—13. Christians, who were matured in knowledge and judgment, knew indeed that an idol was the senseless representative of a nominal deity, which had no existence. But not every professed Christian, no, nor every true believer, had 'that knowledge;' so that some of them, even to that time, ventured to eat of the idol sacrifices, who retained a superstitious regard to the supposed invisible object of worship. They had an impression on their minds, through an association of ideas not easily dissolved, that they were joining in an idolatrous sacrifice; and thus 'their consciences being weak were defiled.' They [who had knowledge] ought therefore to be far more cautious and circumspect, in using what they considered as their liberty and privilege; and not to act in such a self-confident and imprudent manner, as tended to seduce those into sin, who were weak and unconfirmed in the faith. The word tr. 'emboldened,' is lit. 'edified;' (Marg.) and thus the apostle intimated, that, instead of edifying their weaker brethren, 'in their most holy faith,' by their example and endeavors, they were confirming them in the superstitious regard, which in some degree they still retained for idols; and even inducing them to join in those idolatrous rites, by which the worshippers had 'fellowship with devils.' Thus their knowledge, of which they made so ostentatious a display, directly tended to the ruin of 'those for whom Christ died;' and, whatever might be the event, through the special grace of God preventing the fatal consequence, yet, by thus giving a wound, mortal in its nature, to a member of Christ's mystical body, they committed a very heinous sin against the Savior Himself; which would not pass without severe rebukes.—The word 'weak' often means sick or diseased; and some learned men explain these vs. not of a doubting conscience, but of an erroneous conscience; i. e. not of one, who ate, though he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; but of one, who erroneously thought he might lawfully partake of the sacrifices, with some degree of regard to the idol, and in expectation of some advantage to himself or family. Rom. 14:19—23. And, indeed, considering the inveterate habits of such as had been brought up, and perhaps grown old in idolatry, and likewise the corrupt state of the Corinthian church, it is not unlikely, that some professed Christians retained a hankering after their former usages; especially, as feasting with their neighbors and relations, on these occasions, would in part exempt them from reproach and persecution. The apostle, however, by 'a weak brother,' seems particularly to mean the man with a doubting conscience; not him with the erroneous one, at least, not ex-

Jesus Christ. Not many mediators, as the heathen imagined, but one only, by whom all things were created, and do consist, and to whom all our hope and happiness are owing. The Man Christ Jesus; but a Man in personal union with the Divine Word, or God the Son. This very Man hath God made both Lord and Christ, Acts 2:36. It is the great privilege of us Christians, that we know the true God, and true Mediator between God and man: the true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent, John 17:3.

V. 7—13. The apostle, having granted, and indeed confirmed, the opinion of some among the Corinthians, that idols were nothing, proceeds now to show them, that their inference from this assumption was not just, namely, That therefore they might go into the idol-temple, and eat of the sacrifices, and feast there with their heathen neighbors. And here he,

1. Informs them, that every Christian man at that time, was not so fully convinced and persuaded that an idol was nothing, v. 7. Though they were converts to Christianity, and professed the true religion, they were not perfectly cured of the old leaven, but retained an unaccountable respect for the idols they had worshipped before: and so their conscience being weak, was defiled; they contracted guilt; they ate out of respect to the idol, with an imagination that it had something divine in it, and so committed idolatry: whereas the design of the Gospel was, to turn men from dumb idols to the living God. This seems to be the sense of the place; though some understand it of weak Christians defiling themselves, by eating what was offered to an idol, with an apprehension, that thereby it became unclean, and made them so in a moral sense, who should eat it; every one not having a knowledge that the idol was nothing, and therefore that it could not render what was offered to it, in this sense, unclean. We should be careful to do nothing that may occasion weak Christians to defile their consciences.

II. He tells them, that mere eating or drinking had nothing in them virtuous or criminal, nothing that could make them better or worse, pleasing or displeasing to God, v. 8. It looks as if some of the Corinthians made a merit of their eating what had been offered to idols, and that in their very temples too, v. 10. because it plainly showed that they thought the idols nothing. But eating or drinking are in themselves actions indifferent. Flesh offered to idols, may in itself be as proper for food as any other; and the bare eating, or forbearing to eat, has no virtue in it. It is a gross mistake, to think that distinction of food will make any distinction between men in God's account.

III. He cautions them against abusing the liberty they thought they had in this matter. For that they mistook it, and had no allowance to sit at meat in the idol's temple, seems plain from ch. 10:20, &c. But he argues here, that even on supposition they had such power, they must be cautious how they use it; it might be a stumbling-block to the weak, v. 9. it might occasion their falling into idolatrous actions, perhaps their falling off from Christianity, and revolting again to heathenism. Such an occasion of falling they should be careful not to lay before their weak brethren, whatever liberty or power they themselves had.

This caution he backs with two considerations; 1. The danger that might accrue to weak brethren, even those weak brethren for whom Christ died, v. 11. Those whom Christ hath redeemed with his most precious blood, should be very precious and dear to us. That man has very little of the spirit of a Redeemer, who had rather his brother should perish, than himself be abridged, in any respect, of his liberty. 2. The hurt done to them, Christ takes as done to Himself, clusively.—(3) The better.] Dr. Whitby, after endeavoring to refute the argument, which some drew from these vs. against conformity to the ceremonies of the church of England, because they doubted the lawfulness of so doing, makes the following important remark: 'Nevertheless, this seemeth to press hard on them, who believe that the schism of such weak persons, will finally tend to their ruin, and render them exiles from the flock of Christ; and yet, for things indifferent, will, in this dreadful sense, cause their weak brother to offend;... since this they do for that, "which commends them not to God," which doing they "are not the better, or omitting they are not the worse." (8) For if schism and idolatry be equally damning sins, and equally "cause my brother to offend," and him to perish for whom "Christ died;" we are equally to take heed in both cases, lest our power to do the thing indifferent, become "a stumbling-block to the weak," or the erroneous in their judgment of these things. For let men imagine what other difference they please in the case, while the sad issue or event is in general the same, to wit, the perishing of my brother, and my power to have abstained from that, which through his erroneous conscience gave occasion to it, is the same, I fear the guilt will be the same.' This cannot easily be answered, by those who think non-conformity a fatal schism, and yet require things allowedly indifferent as terms of conformity. Rom. 14:13—18. v. 14.

(7.) Conscience.] 'But some in the consciousness, or secret opinion (so the word Eccl. 10:20. 1 Cor. 10:28, 29. 2 Cor. 4:2. 5:11) of the idol, as being something (i. e. a real being, or a representation of one), even yet eat of the food, as if of food offered to some really existing demon; and their perception of right and wrong being weak, and ill-informed, their conscience is defiled, and they feel self-condemned.' BL. See Waylout, on injuring conscience. How careful, on the other hand, should teachers be, not to make that matter of conscience which is not, as did the Pharisees, Mat. 23:4. Comp. Rom. 14:23.

(8.) 'But why occasion this inconvenience? The great God does not so much esteem a man for being, or disapprove of him for not being, superior to such little scruples; but the tenderness of his conscience, together with the zeal and charity of his heart, are the grand qualities He regards.'

v. 12. Injuries done to Christians, are injuries to Christ; especially to weak Christians; and, most of all, involving them in guilt; wounding their conscience, is wounding Him. He has a particular care of the lambs and flock, Is. 40:11. Strong Christians should be very careful to avoid what will offend weak ones, or lay a stumbling-block in their way.

PRACT. OBS. Satan as effectually injures some men's souls, by tempting them to be proud of their intellectual powers, as he does those of others, by alluring them to the grossest sensualities. Without holy affections and divine love, all human knowledge is worthless, and far beneath the attainments of apostate angels; but sanctifying affections, and humble, grateful love, are not only evidences of the Lord's merciful acceptance, but are important steps to a 'good understanding in the way of godliness.' The proud speculator is probably at the top of his attainments: but the loving disciple, though comparatively ignorant, shall daily be edified and make progress in heavenly wisdom; so that he shall be abundantly enriched from the fulness of Christ.—If our evidence of conversion is clear and decisive, and our views distinct and satisfactory, let us bless God for the consolation; but let us not suppose that this measure of knowledge and assurance is vouchsafed to all believers, or that we are 'better' in ourselves, or more beloved of God, than our weaker brethren, the younger children of the same family. Let us beware of self-preference on any pretence, and vainglory, and self-indulgence; and of despising those who are disquieted by needless scruples; who, though less comfortable, may perhaps serve God more conscientiously and humbly than we do. Rom. 14:2—12. Such Christians

NOTES. CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. Some expositors think, that the apostle here began a new subject; and entered on a formal vindication of his conduct among the Corinthians; but he appears rather to have digressed a little from his main subject, in order to illustrate it by his own example, and in different ways; and accordingly he resumed and concluded it in the next ch. 2:7—13. 10:15—33.—He had before declared his readiness to deny himself 'the eating of flesh for ever,' rather than 'stumble his weak brother;' and he here proceeded to show what he had actually done in this respect, to promote the Gospel. But in order to state this clearly, it was necessary to prove his apostolical office, and that he had a right to a maintenance and other privileges in that character. The Lord, by employing his ministry for their conversion, had affixed his own seal to Paul's apostolical commission. For He certainly would not thus have attested a direct imposture. So that they were the last persons, who ought to have made a doubt of this; being themselves the seal and demonstration of it. Jn. 6:22—27. 2 Cor. 3:1—3. This therefore might serve as a brief but sufficient answer to those, who examined him concerning the credentials of his commission.—(3) Mine answer, &c.] 'Namely, what is said in the preceding v. . . therefore this is improperly by some joined to the next v. . . IV. He enforces all with his own example, v. 13. He had such a value for the soul of his brother, that he would willingly deny himself in a matter of liberty, and forbear any particular food, which he might have lawfully eaten, and might like to eat, rather than lay a stumbling-block in a weak brother's way, and occasion him to sin, by following his example, without being clear in his mind whether it were lawful or no. We should be very tender of doing anything that may be an occasion of stumbling to others; though it may be innocent in itself. When it is certainly foreseen, that my doing what I may forbear, will occasion a fellow-Christian to do what he ought to forbear, I shall offend, scandalize, or lay a stumbling-block in his way; which to do is a sin, however lawful the thing itself be, which is done. And if we must be so careful not to occasion other men's sins, how careful should we be to avoid sin ourselves. If we must not endanger other men's souls, how much should we be concerned not to destroy our own.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. Blessed Paul, in the work of his ministry, not only met with opposition from those without, but discouragement from those within. It is no strange or new thing, for a minister to meet with very unkind returns for great good-will to a people, and diligent and successful services among them. Some among the Corinthians questioned, if they did not disown, his apostolical character. To their cavils he here answers, and in such a manner as to set forth himself as a remarkable example of that self-denial, for the good of others, which he had been recommending in the former chapter.

as 'have knowledge,' should also beware of abusing their liberty, and of approaching to the verge, or 'appearance, of evil,' lest by any means 'this liberty of theirs' should prove 'an occasion of stumbling others, and so of guilt to themselves. For, should a weak believer see one, who is repented to have knowledge, sitting at some of those feasts, or in some of those places of public concourse, for which many plead; (about ns plausibly as the Corinthians did in behalf of eating in the idol's temple;) might he not be tempted to do the same, though contrary to the convictions of his own conscience? And thus, through this man's proud knowledge, and carnal self-indulgence, would the soul of a weak believer 'for whom Christ died,' be endangered, and his conscience wounded; nay, many who were hopefully inquiring after salvation, may be, and doubtless are turned aside and utterly perish. How can men thus 'sin against their brethren,' and violate the law of love, without deeply offending Christ, and endangering their own souls also? What evidence can they have of being true Christians, seeing they act in a manner, which is directly contrary to the spirit of the apostle, who would 'have eaten no flesh to the end of life, rather than cause his weak brother to offend;' and to the mind of Him, who shed his precious blood, and poured out his dying prayers, for his misguided murderers? V. 4, 5. The words 'a sister, a wife' are so determinate, that they leave no doubt, that several of the apostles were married, and took their wives with them to those places, where they more stately resided. To render them 'a sister, a woman,' as some do, would form an unmeaning tautology, or rather one calculated to mislead the reader; for, 'a sister' must be a woman; and the latter word would be wholly redundant, if it were not intended to show in what relation she was supposed to stand; namely, that of 'a wife,' according to the general acceptation of the word. 'This declares in effect, that Peter continued to live with his wife after he became an apostle; and also that Peter had no rights as an apostle, which were not common to Paul. A remark utterly subversive of popery, if traced to its obvious consequences.' Doddr.—'Clemens of Alexandria not only saith, that he that marrieth hath the apostles as examples, and that Peter carried his wife with him till his martyrdom, but confutes the encaies of matrimony from these words. . . Adding, that they carried about their wives, not as wives, but as sisters, to minister to those who were mistresses of families, that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any apprehension, or evil suspicions, enter into the apartments of the women.' Whitby. maintenance for his wife, nay, and his children too, if he had any, from the churches, without laboring with his own hands to procure it, v. 6.

II. He proceeds, by several arguments, to prove his claim. 1. From the common practice and expectations of mankind. Those who addict and give themselves up to any way of business in the world, expect to live out of it, soldiers, husbandmen, and shepherds, v. 7. It is very natural, and very reasonable, for ministers to expect a livelihood out of their labors. 2. He argues it out of the Jewish law, v. 8. Is this merely a dictate of common reason, and according to common usage only? No, it is also consonant to the old law. God had therein ordered, that the ox should not be muzzled, or hindered from eating, while he was preparing the corn for man's use, and treading it out of the ear. But this law was not chiefly given out of God's regard to oxen, or concern for them, but to teach mankind, that all due encouragement should be given to them who are employed by us, or laboring for our good; that the laborers should taste of the fruit of their labors, v. 10. The law saith this about oxen for our sakes. They that lay themselves out to do our souls good, should not have their mouths muzzled, but have food provided for them. 3. He argues from common equity, v. 11. What they had sown was much better than they expected to reap. Those who enjoy spiritual benefits by the ministry of the Word, should not grudge a maintenance to such as are employed in this work. If they have received a real benefit, one would think they could not grudge them this. What, get so much good by them, and yet grudge to do so little good to them! Is this grateful or equitable? 4. He argues from the maintenance they afforded others, v. 12. You allow others this maintenance, and confess their claim just; but who has so just a claim as I from the church of Corinth? 'Nevertheless,' says the apostle, 'we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the Gospel of Christ.' We have not insisted on our right, but have rather been in straits, to serve the interests of the Gospel, and promote the salvation of souls. He denied himself, for fear of giving offence; yet claims his right, lest his self-denial should prove prejudicial to the ministry. Note, He is likely to plead most effectually for the rights of others, who shows a generous disregard to his own. It is plain, in this case, that justice, and not self-love is the principle by which he is acted.

5. He argues from the old Jewish establishment, v. 13. 'And if the Jewish priesthood was maintained out of the holy things that were then offered, shall not Christ's ministers have a maintenance out of their ministry?' 6. He asserts it to be the institution of Christ, v. 14. It is the people's duty to maintain their minister, by Christ's appointment, though it be not a duty bound on every minister to call for or accept it. He may waive his right, as Paul did, without being a sinner; but they transgress an appointment of Christ, who deny or withhold it.

V. 15-18. He had, notwithstanding, waived his privilege, and lays down his reason.

I. He tells them he had neglected to claim his right in times past, v. 15. He neither ate nor drank himself at their cost, nor led about a wife to be maintained by them, nor forbore working to maintain himself. From others he received a maintenance, but not from them, for some special reasons. Nor did he write this, to make his claim now; He asserts his right, yet does not claim his due; but denies himself for their sakes, and the Gospel.

II. He assigns the reason of his exercising this self-denial. He would not have his glorying made void, v. 15. This glorying implied nothing of boasting, or self-conceit, or catching at applause, but a high degree of satisfaction and comfort. It was a singular pleasure to him to preach the Gospel without making it burdensome; and he was resolved, that among them he would not lose this satisfaction. His advantages for promoting the Gospel were his glory, and he valued them above his rights, or his very life; Better for him to die than to have it justly said, he preferred his wages to his work. It is the glory of a minister, to prefer the success of his ministry to his interest, and deny himself, that he may serve Christ and save souls. Not that in so doing he does more than he ought; he is still acting within the bounds of the law of charity. But he acts on truly noble principles, he brings much honor to God in so doing; and those that honor Him He will honor. It is what God will approve and commend; what a man may value himself for, and take comfort in, though he cannot make a merit of it before God.

V. 6. The apostle further inquired, whether he 'and Barnabas' alone were excluded from the right of being supported, without earning their bread by labor. These two eminently useful servants of Christ were called to the apostolical office, after the ascension of Christ; and went forth together 'to preach among the Gentiles.' Acts 13:14. The circumstances in which they found themselves, probably, led them to adopt the method of subsisting by their own manual labor, in order to promote the Gospel; and they both persevered in it after they separated. Acts 15:36-41. But the other apostles, beginning their ministry among the Jews, who had been used to support their teachers, were generally maintained by them without working; and were supplied when they journeyed to other places, where churches had not been planted. Thus Paul and Barnabas, by not requiring a support, seemed to have lost their right to one; and were generally left to labor, and struggle with difficulties and necessities, for want of adequate assistance.—This view of these vs. renders their connexion with the foregoing ch. very clear. The apostle was preparing to show the Corinthians; how he waived the exercise of his liberty, in order to do good; that they might see, as in a glass, the impropriety of their selfish exercise of their liberty, 'in eating the things offered unto idols.' 13-18. 3:7-13. Acts 12:1-6. 20:32-35. 2 Cor. 11:1-6. 12:11-15. SEOTT.

V. 7-12. Had the Corinthians objected, as some suppose, that Paul, by not receiving a maintenance, seemed to allow that he was not an apostle; it would have been needless for him formally to prove himself entitled to it; but this was absolutely necessary, if he meant tacitly to instruct them by his example, to give up the self-indulgent exercise of their Christian liberty, or privilege, from love to their brethren. 1-3. 8:7-13.—Chrysostom and Theophylact observe, that he saith not, Who goeth to warfare, and is not rich? Who plants a vineyard, and heaps not up gold of the fruits of it? Who feeds a flock, and makes not a merchandise of the sheep? Teaching us, that the spiritual pastor should be content with little, and seek only what is necessary, not what is superfluous. Whitby.—If then other pastors, and even the false teachers at Corinth, had been allowed to partake of this privilege, or authority over them, much more was this due to the apostle and his helpers, who first preached the Gospel among them. Nevertheless, they had not availed themselves of this undoubted right; but had chosen to endure unceasing labor, pinching want, and every extremity, 'lest they should give any hindrance to the Gospel of Christ,' and prevent its success. Yet after all, the Corinthians would not abridge themselves of the indulgence of a luxurious meal, out of love to their weaker brethren! This is evidently the contrast intended; and a most striking contrast it was.—(9) Thou shalt not muzzle, &c.] Exactly from LXX.—(8) As a man.] See on 3:3.—'This phrase in the N. T. doth always signify, to speak, and act, and live, after the manner of a mere natural man, not acting by the guidance of divine wisdom, or not assisted by the Holy Spirit.' Whitby.

(7.) Charges.] Roman soldiers received rations, clothing, and money, so much per month. See Adam. At first it was disgraceful with the Greeks to receive military pay, but after Pericles introduced it, it became the custom of the commonwealth. Even whole troops of Grecians, too, served foreign states for pay. See Potter. The Egyptians (the model-nation of antiquity) maintained their soldiers at the public expense, note, Ez. 30: end. (8-10.) Muzzle.] Note, Deut. 25:4. The precept is still generally observed in the E. The ancients had 4 kinds of threshing. See Schoett. 'Altogether.] 'Rather, especially; i. e. may not men learn much from this example? Should.] Ought to. . . And he that reapeth ought to partake of (the fruits of) his hope. Paul means to say, If this be true of men, i. e. of all who labor for the good of others, it is still more so of ministers of the Gospel.' Bl. Ep.

V. 13-18. The O. T. is replete in every part with instructions to us at this day, though no one thinks of obeying the ceremonial law.—Probably, he [Paul] had witnessed some things in the disposition of the Corinthian Christians, which first induced him to decline receiving any support from them. What had passed since he left them still more confirmed him in his purpose; he thought himself unkindly used by them, and in this way only would he show them his sense of their misconduct. 2 Cor. 11:7-12. 12:11-21. He knew that the false teachers wanted an occasion against him; but this disinterestedness gave him an advantage over them; and it was very important that his example should be contrasted with their conduct, which could not otherwise so properly have been done. For he had been called to this ministry in so singular a manner, that 'a necessity was laid upon him,' and he could not decline 16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel.

17 For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me.

18 What is my reward then? Verily that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge; that I abuse not my power in the gospel.

[Practical Observations.]

19 For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more.

20 And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law;

21 To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law.

22 To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some.

III. He shows that this self-denial was more honorable in itself, and yielded him much more content and comfort, than his preaching did, v. 16. It is my charge, my business, the work for which I am constitu-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-18. When the Lord hears the prayers of his ministers, and blesses their labors in the conversion of sinners, He sets his seal to their commission. This should satisfy conscientious ministers in respect to their own call to the work, and be deemed a sufficient proof to others, especially to those converted by them; though no occasional usefulness will prove an unholy man to be a real Christian, or a self-confident boaster to be a 'faithful steward of the mysteries of God.'—Though ministers may see good, in some circumstances, to labor for their bread, they have an undoubted right to a decent maintenance for themselves and families; nor ought they, who reap the spiritual benefit of the minister's labors, to yield a proportion of their temporal goods, as if it were an alms, or a great favor conferred on him. How should it be expected that men will give up the prospect of lucrative employments, and creditable professions, to engage in this warfare; if they cannot do it in hope of living by their profession? How can they face the dangers and endure the hardships of ploughing up the fallow ground, by preaching to the ignorant, careless, and profligate, if pinching want be their only prospect, however diligent and successful they may be? Or how can they minister to the comfort and edification of the service, or execute it unfaithfully, without incurring the heaviest condemnation. If indeed he had, without an express command, (having previously embraced the Gospel,) deliberately and willingly engaged in the work of the ministry, from love to Christ and to the souls of sinners, and zeal for the glory of God, he might have been assured of a gracious and abundant recompense. But, as he was so wonderfully arrested, when violently persecuting the church, and entrusted with a dispensation, or stewardship, without any previous choice or willingness; a line of conduct of a peculiar nature was requisite for him, in order to show that he was not actuated by slavish fear, or mercenary principles. Acts 9:1-22. For, if this had been the case, where would have been his reward? Mat. 6:1-5, 16-18. Or, how could he, in his peculiar circumstances, distinguish himself from mercenary teachers, and thus have ground of glorying, through the grace of God, in this distinction? Or how might he possess the assurance of a gracious reward? Truly, by preaching the Gospel freely, without putting his hearers to any expense; and by enduring poverty, hunger, and labor, rather than make an inexpedient and improper use of his liberty and privilege, as an apostle of Christ. Thus he evidenced, that he acted from the genuine principles of zeal and love, and so enjoyed much comfort and assurance of hope in his own soul.—Let it here be carefully noted, that for ministers of religion to insist on their due, and use their liberty, when this hinders their usefulness, is to 'abuse their power in the Gospel.' 7:29-31. ted an apostle, ch. 1:17. a duty expressly bound on me, not in any degree a matter of liberty. Those who are set apart to the office of the ministry, have it in charge to preach the Gospel. Woe be to them, if they do not. From this none is excepted. But it is not given in charge to all, or any preacher of the Gospel, to do his work gratis, to preach, and have no maintenance out of it. When he renounces his right for the sake of the Gospel, and the souls of men, he waives his privilege and right; he does more than his charge and office in general, and at all times, obliges him to. Woe be to him, if he do not preach the Gospel; but it may sometimes be his duty to insist on his maintenance for so doing; and whenever he forbears to claim it, he parts with his right; though a man be bound to do so sometimes, by the general duties of love to God, and charity to men. It is a high attainment in religion, to renounce our own rights for the good of others; God will peculiarly recompense it. For,

IV. He informs us, that doing our duty with a willing mind, will meet with a gracious recompense from God, v. 17. Indeed, it is willing service only that is capable of reward from God. It is not the bare doing any duty, but the doing it heartily, willingly, and cheerfully, that God has promised to reward. They must preach willingly, who would be accepted of God in this duty. But whether the duty of the office be done willingly, or with reluctance; whether the heart be in it, or averse from it; all in office have a trust and charge from God, for which they must be accountable. Ministers have a dispensation of the Gospel, or stewardship, Luke 16:7. committed to them. Note, Christ's willing servants shall not fail of a recompense, and that proportioned to their fidelity, zeal, and diligence; and his slothful and unwilling servants shall all be called to an account. And how sad an account!

V. The apostle sums up the argument, by laying before them the encouraging hope he had of a large recompense for his remarkable self-denial, v. 18. What is it I expect a recompense from God for? That when I preach the Gospel, I may make it without charge, that I abuse not my power in the Gospel. Or, not so to claim my rights, as to make them destroy the great intentions and ends of my office, but renounce them for the sake of those. It is an abuse of power, to employ it against the very ends for which it is given. And the apostle would never use his power, or privilege of being maintained by his ministry, so as to frustrate the ends of it, but would willingly and cheerfully deny himself for the honor of Christ, and the interest of souls. That minister who follows his example, may have cheerful expectations of a recompense.

V. 19-23. The apostle takes occasion, from what he had before discoursed, to mention some instances of his self-denial, and parting with his liberty for the benefit of others.

1. He asserts his liberty, v. 19. He was free-born, a citizen of Rome, in bondage to none, nor depended on any for his subsistence; [free also to assert and claim his right as an apostle;] yet he made himself a servant to all.

2. He specifies some particulars wherein he made himself a servant to all. He accommodated himself to all sorts of people. In innocent things he could comply with people's usages, or humors, for their advantage. He would transgress no laws of Christ, to please or humor any man; but he would accommodate himself to all men, where he might do it lawfully, to gain some. He was the apostle of the Gentiles, and so, one would have thought, might have excused himself from complying with the Jews; yet, to do them good, and win them over to Christ, he did, in innocent things, conform to some of their usages and laws. And though he might, by virtue of that character, have challenged authority over the Gentiles, yet he accommodated himself, as much as he innocently might, to their prejudices and ways of thinking. Doing good was the study and business of his life; and, so that he might believers, when they are burdened with debts, destitute of necessaries, surrounded by indigent families, compelled to place their children in unsuitable situations, or driven themselves into other employments for bread? How can they but suspect, that their hearers are deceiving themselves, in professing to love Christ and the Gospel, while they enjoy plenty, and lay up for their children, yet leave their pastors to wear out their lives in distressing poverty?—On the other hand, it behooves ministers to be as disinterested as possible.—But if they, to whom a dispensation is given to preach the Gospel, and who act according to it, have no ground of glorying, because 'necessity is laid upon them, and woe is to them if they do not,' what will be the case of those, who willingly assume this office, and seek a designation to it, and then bestow no pains to preach the Gospel, or to preach at all; but only aim to appropriate to themselves, and to secure to their children, relatives, or dependents, as much as possible of those funds, which were established for the maintenance of such as 'labor in the Word and doctrine?' Woe! woe! to such 'idol-shepherds,' to such hireling priests; yea, to all who encourage and reward their unfaithfulness! Is. 56:9-12. Zech. 11:15-17. Mal. 1:9-11. SCOTT.

V. 19-23. The preceding instance was not the only one, in which the apostle thus denied himself. Though he 'was free' from every obligation to comply with other men's inclinations, or to conform to their customs; yet he had voluntarily become as 'a slave to all men,' or to men of every nation, rank, or religious opinion; by renouncing all personal considerations, and bearing with their prejudices, mistakes, and infirmities, as far as he could consistently with his duty; in order that he might win over the more to the faith of Christ.—Nothing could be more suited to shame those whom he addressed, out of a selfish use of their liberty, than this statement of his own principles and conduct; or more strongly mark the surprising change which had taken place in him, since the time, when, by cruel persecution, he aimed to make all the Christians everywhere conform to his own sentiments and practice, in the great concerns of religion. 24 Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain.

25 And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.

reach this end, he did not stand on privileges and punctilios.

He was willing to make the best even of the weak, v. 22. He did not despise nor judge them, but became as one of them, forbore to use his liberty for their sake, and was careful to lay no stumbling-block in their way. He denied himself for their sakes, that he might insinuate into their affections, and gain their souls. In short, he became all things to all men, that he might by all means, all lawful means, gain some. He would not sin against God, to save the soul of his neighbor, but he would very cheerfully and readily deny himself. The rights of God he could not give up, but he might resign his own, and he very often did it for the good of others.

3. He assigns his reason, v. 23. This I do for the Gospel's sake, and that I might be partaker thereof with you; i. e. for the honor of Christ, whose the Gospel is, and for the salvation of souls, for which it was designed, and that he and they might communicate in the privileges of it, or partake together of them. For these ends did he thus condescend to deny himself as to his liberty, and accommodate himself to the capacities and usages of those with whom he had to do, where he lawfully might. Note, A heart warmed with zeal for God, and breathing after the salvation of men, will not plead and insist on rights and privileges in bar to this design. They manifestly abuse their power in the Gospel, who employ it not to edification, but destruction, and therefore breathe nothing of its spirit.

V. 24—27. In these vs. the apostle hints at the great encouragement he had thus to act. He had a glorious prize, an incorruptible crown, in view. On this head, he compares himself to the racers and combatants in the Isthmian games, an allusion well known to the Corinthians, because they were celebrated in their neighborhood, v. 24. 'All run, at your games, but one only gets the race, and wins the crown.' And here he,

I. Excites them to their duty; 'So run, that ye may obtain.' It is quite otherwise in the Christian race than in your races; only one wins the prize in them, but in that you may all run, so as to obtain. You have great encouragement, therefore, to persist constantly, diligently, and vigorously, in your course. You cannot fail, if you run well. I make it my endeavor thus to run; so do you. No man ever more heartily pursued the prize in your Isthmian races, than I do after the recompense of the reward; so do you, as you see me go before you.' It is the duty of Christians to follow their ministers closely in the chase of eternal glory, and the honor and duty of ministers to lead them in the way.

II. He directs them in their course, by setting more fully to view his own example, still carrying on the allusion. 1. They that run in their games, were kept to a set diet, v. 25. 'The fighters and wrestlers in your exercises do not indulge themselves, but restrain themselves from the food they might eat, and so from the liberties they use on other occasions. And should not Christians much more abridge themselves of their liberty, for so glorious an end as winning the race, and obtaining the prize set before them? They used a very spare diet, and coarse food, and denied themselves much, to prepare for their race and combat; so do I; so should you, after my example. It is hard if, for the heavenly crown, you cannot abstain from heathen sacrifices.' 2. They were not only temperate, but inured themselves to hardships. They who fought with one another in these exercises, prepared themselves by beating the air, as the apostle calls it, or by throwing out their arms, and thereby inuring themselves, beforehand, to deal about their blows in close combat, or brandish them by way of flourish. There is no room for any such exercise in the Christian warfare. Christians are ever in close combat; and for this reason they must never flag or faint in it. They must fight, not as those that beat the air, but must strive against their enemies, with all their might. One enemy the apostle here mentions, i. e. the body; by which we are to understand, fleshly appetites and inclinations. These the apostle set himself to curb and conquer, and in this the Corinthians were bound to imitate him. They who would aright pursue the interests of their souls, must keep under their bodies. They must combat hard with fleshly lusts, till they have subdued them; and not indulge a wanton appetite, and long for heathenish sacrifices, or eat them, to please their flesh, at the hazard of their brethren's souls. The body must be made to serve the mind, not suffered to lord over it.

III. The apostle presses this advice on the Corinthians, by proper arguments drawn from the same contenders. 1. They take pains, and undergo all those hardships, to obtain a corruptible crown, v. 25. but we an incorruptible. They who conquered in these games, were crowned only with the withering leaves or boughs of trees, of olive, hays, or laurel. But Christians have an incorruptible crown in view, a crown of glory that never fadeth away, an inheritance incorruptible, reserved in heaven for them. And would they yet suffer themselves to be outdone by these racers or wrestlers? 2. The racers in these games run at uncertainty; only one receives the prize, v. 24. so every racer is at a great uncertainty whether he shall win it or no. But every Christian racer may be sure of the prize, if he run within the lines, and keep to the path of duty prescribed, which, some think, is the meaning of running not as uncertainly, v. 26. And shall not then Christians be much more exact and vigorous? 3. He sets before himself and them the danger of yielding to fleshly inclinations, and pampering the body, and its lusts and appetites, v. 27. Lest by

V. 24—27. This did not imply, that the apostle doubted of his acceptance, or perseverance; but it showed the Corinthians the nature of his assurance, and forcibly cautioned them not to rest in such hopes, as were consistent with indiscriminate self-indulgence, even in things lawful. He had abundant occasions and methods of thus 'keeping under his body, and bringing it into subjection,' without using the tortures, ansterities, and flagellations of the papists; while he willingly endured hunger, thirst, fatigue, and imprisonment, in preaching the Gospel; and was frequently 'in watchings, fastings,' and prayers, as well as habitually temperate in all things. 2 Cor. 6:3—10, 11:21—27.—The apostle seems designedly to contrast the continence and temperance of the heathen combatants, for a fading crown, with the luxurious self-indulgence of the Corinthian Christians, whom no motives, either taken from the good of their brethren, their own spiritual advantage, or the honor of the Gospel, could induce to deny themselves the gratification of a sensual feast.—'The body' seems here to be meant literally.—The depraved nature, 'the body of sin and death,' must be crucified as a malefactor; Rom. 6:5—7, 7:22—25, 8:12, 13, Gal. 5:22—26. but 'the body,' or animal frame, the exquisite workmanship of the great Creator, needs only, by wholesome and sometimes sharp discipline, to be brought under, and kept under, as a well educated child. The unsuccessful racers, or pugilists, in the public games, at most, were only exposed to some transient disgrace, while their other comforts remained to them; but in the Christian conflict, there is no alternative between the incorruptible crown, and everlasting shame and misery.

Concluding Note. Grecian Public Games. V. 26, 27. Preached.] Keruzas: heralded, proclaimed as keruz: who, at the opening of the games, publicly proclaimed the names of the combatants, and the combat in which they were to engage, agreeably to a register kept for the purpose, by the judges, who were called Hellanodicks. When their names were published, the combatants appeared, and were examined, whether they were free men, and Grecians, and of unspotted character. Then the crier, commanding silence, laid his hand on the head of the combatant, and led him in that manner along the stadium, demanding with a loud voice, of all the assembly, "Is there one who can accuse this man of any crime? Is he a robber, or a slave, or wicked and depraved in his life and manners?" Note, 1:31. Then the combatants were led to the altar of Jupiter, and there, with their relations, swore they would not be guilty of any fraud, or action, tending to the breach of the laws of the sacred games. And, to excite the ardor of the combatants, the crowns, the rewards of victory, and palm branches, lay, during the contest, full in their view, on a tripod, or table, placed in the stadium. But P. Faber conjectures, from Chrys., that the victors in the morning, did not receive their [of course faded, v. 25.] crown, till noon, when the spectators were dismissed for refreshment: and victors of the afternoon, not till evening, and some think Heb. 11:40, alludes to this; [2 Tim. 4:8, certainly seems to.] For the crowns were given with much ceremony, the victors being summoned by proclamation to the tribunal of the hellanodicks, who examined their conduct in the combat. Then a herald, taking the chaplets from the tripod, placed them on the head of such of the conquerors as were approved: and putting into their hands the palms, led them through the stadium, preceded by a trumpeter, who proclaimed, with a loud voice, their names, the names of their fathers, and of their countries, and specified their combat. As they passed along, they were saluted with the acclamations of the spectators, who showered herbs and flowers upon them. Thus Paul was the herald in the combat for immortality, as being one of the chief of those employed by Christ to introduce, into the stadium, such as contended for the incorruptible crown. He called them to the combat; declared its kind; proclaimed the qualifications for it, and its laws. Withal, he encouraged the combatants, by placing the crowns and palms full in their view.

any means I myself should be a cast-away, rejected, disapproved, one to whom the judgement of the race will not decree the crown. The allusion to the games runs through the whole sentence. Note, A preacher of salvation may yet miss it. He may show others the way to heaven, and never get thither himself. A holy fear of himself was necessary to preserve the fidelity of an apostle; and how much more necessary is it to our preservation? Holy fear of ourselves, and not presumptuous confidence, is the best security against apostasy from God, and final rejection by Him.

PRACT. OBS. V. 19-27. A mind freed from narrow bigotry, enlarged by comprehensive views of the grand object of the Gospel, and taught to keep the great end of doing good continually in view, will know when to waive minute discussions, to connive at less dangerous prejudices, and to venture down towards the ground of other men, in order to argue with them on their own principles, and to bring them to saving views of the Gospel. But while a man postpones, or subordinates, every other thing to this grand object, as far as coexists with important truth and duty, that he may gain the more, to share with him in the great blessings of salvation; and while, on the other hand, he will not give place for a moment, where essential truth or the salvation of souls are at stake; he must expect to be deemed a time-server by bigots; inconsistent by the ignorant; a bigot by the unprincipled; and unsound, weak, or unfaithful by the self-conceited. 2:14-16. Indeed, we should always watch against extremes. If we have to do with those who are superstitious, or self-righteous; while we insist on the necessity of good works, and connive at their mere external forms; we must be very careful to warn them against relying on their own performances, and decided in leading them to trust in Christ alone. If we have to do with those, who seem to be 'without law,' and would endeavor to show them, that true religion requires of us no injurious or useless observances; we must still remember, that we are 'not without law to God, but under the law to Christ;' and we must not countenance or connive at their loose principles or practices, and, in condescending to the weak and injudicious, we must not tolerate those errors or faults, which may either injure them, or disgrace the Gospel. But a simple heart, a single eye, and an habitual reliance on God for heavenly wisdom, will carry a man through such services, and past such dangers, as cannot be directed or guarded against by any rules. SCOTT.

If the judges found that a combatant had disobeyed the laws of the combat in the least particular, he was cast, the term for which was ekkrinesthai, 11:31. He was denied the crown, and sometimes beaten out of the stadium with disgrace. Such, whether cast before or after the combat, were adokimoi, not approved [i.e. cast-away]. See West's Philo.

There were, says Potter, 'four public games esteemed sacred, viz. the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, Isthmian, as instituted in honor of divinities, begun and ended with sacrifices, and held in high esteem by all Greece. Vast numbers flocked to them, and their victors, especially the Olympic, were universally honored, nay, almost adored, as having attained to the utmost felicity human nature is capable of: an Olympic victory, says Cic., was not much less honorable than a triumph at Rome. His family, and even city, shared the victor's honor. Solon's laws gave every successful Athenian 100 drachms, if at the Isthmian, and 500 if at the Olympian games. Afterwards, the latter had their maintenance in the prytaneum, or public hall of Athens.

No person not of respectable family and connexions could be a competitor, no servant, slave, thief, or of corrupt morals; and to prevent such from entering the lists at the Olympic games, the kerax or herald, proclaimed in the theatre, as the combatant was brought forth, "Who can accuse this man?" Dr. A. C. Those appointed to see that all was performed according to custom, decide controversies among the antagonists, and adjudge the prizes, were called agonarchai, brabeutai, [alluded to in v. 25.] rabbouchoi, &c. A public herald proclaimed the victor's name, to whom, in most places, a palm branch was presented, to be carried in their hands [an emblem, says Plut., of the insuppressible vigor of their mind and body]: hence palman dare [lit. to give the palm], to yield the victory. [Victors (says Adam) received for life an annual stipend from the public.]

Exercises. The principal were, 1. Running, so useful in attacking or escaping an enemy, and in great esteem amongst all ancient people; so much so with the Grecians, that they used means to burn or parch their spleen, believing this would render them swifter. Homer calls swiftness one of the most excellent endowments of man, and comp. 1 K. 1:23. The course was called stadium, [v. 24.] as being that measure, viz. 125 paces in length; when enlarged it was called dolichos, which Suidas makes 24 stadia, others 12; it seems to have been variable. Sometimes they ran back again [keeping within the white line, which marked out the path or compass in which they ran. Dr. A. C., which some think alluded to in v. 26]. Sometimes they ran in armor. 2. Leaping, sometimes with weights (usually oval with holes) on the head or shoulders, or in the hands. 3. Darting, or throwing a javelin, rod, or other large instrument, from the hand, by the help of a thong tied to its middle: sometimes an arrow, or little javelin, from a bow or sling. 4. Quitting, i. e. tossing a discus, of stone, brass, or iron, square, oblong, or oval, by the help of a thong through a hole in its middle. 5. Boxing: at first without, in later times, with their hands and arms defended by leather thongs, wound round, called cestus, first to the wrists, afterwards to the elbow, and even shoulder. In time, these were loaded with lead and iron to enforce a blow. Combatants in this used all means to make themselves fat and fleshy, the better to endure blows. 6. Wrestling; brought to an art by Theseus. In later ages, all the joints and members were soundly rubbed, fomented and suppled with oil, to prevent strains. He who gave his antagonist three falls, was victor. Sometimes they threw themselves on the ground, and continued the combat by pinching, biting, scratching, and in all manner of ways annoying, till one, (often the stronger,) was forced to yield, which he confessed by lifting a finger, till which the victory was not adjudged. The pagkraton thus combined wrestling and boxing. 7. Horse-races, either with single horses, or with two, on one of which they rode, and, at the goal, leaped on the other. Or with 2, 3, 4, &c., horses or mules, abreast, in a chariot. Afterwards only the two middle horses were attached to the pole, the rest being governed by the reins. The principal skill was in turning the nussai or goals, to fall in which, incurred danger and disgrace. 8. Music, poetry, extempore and other compositions, and various arts. [At the Olympic games, for instance, Herodotus read his matchless histories, and roused to emulation the youthful Thucydides, his listener.]

Gymnasium: first used in Lacedaemonia, afterwards common in all parts of Greece, imitated and very much augmented and improved at Rome. They were a knot of capacious buildings, holding many thousands at once, having room for philosophers, rhetoricians, and the professors of all other sciences, to read their lectures; and wrestlers, dancers, and all others that would, to exercise at the same time, without the least disturbance or interruption. Their principal parts (see cut) were, 1. Stoai, the porticos, full of exedrai, and side buildings furnished with seats, and fit for study or discourse; and here, probably, the scholars used to meet. 2. The ephebeion, where the ephēbi, or youths, exercised; or met and agreed on rules of exercise, &c. 3. The undressing room. 4. Elaiothesion, where wrestlers, or those who had bathed, anointed. [The Roman athletes used a glutinous ointment called ceroma: and wore drawers in wrestling, &c.] 5. Konisterion, where the dust with which the anointed were sprinkled, was kept. 6. Palaistra, (sometimes put for the whole gymnasium,) where the pentathlon, or 5 kinds of exercise, were performed: its bottom was covered with dust or gravel. Another room was also thus prepared. 7. Sphaisterion, for divers exercises, especially the ball. 8. Spaces between the wall and porticos, for light, and the Peristation, or piazza, a large square, for walking, leaping, discus playing, &c. 9. Xystoi, covered for wrestlers in bad weather, and Xysta, walks, open at top, for summer recreation, and in mild winter weather. 10. Baths, of different temperatures. The Greeks, in ancient times, used the bath rarely, except after great toil; afterwards, more commonly. 11. The stadium, for exercises: built with steps for spectators. 12. The stove, &c. Potter.

The cut (of a Palaestra, after Vitruvius), shows: a, halls for the philosophers; b, Ephebeum, or boy's school; c, Coryceum, or ball play-ground; d, Conisterium, or dust-place; e, Loutron, or cold bath; f, Elaiothesium, or place of oils; g, Frigidarium, or Apolyterium, place of undressing; h, arched hot stove; i, Lacouicum, or dry-stove; k, warm-bath; l, Propnaicum, or place of chimneys; m, ladder, for descending to the furnaces; n, Xyste, or covered place of exercise, for the athletes; o, stadium, 125 paces long. Ed.

The Olympic Games. These, named from the Olympian Jupiter, or the city of Olympia, were of uncertain origin; see Potter. They were instituted, says one account, by Hercules; but were little noticed till the time of Iphitus, contemporary with Lycurgus, k. of Sparta, who re-instituted the solemnity about 408 years after the Trojan war, and thus Solinus computes the Olympiads. After Chorachus (who, so Phlegon, lived in the 25th Olympiad after Iphitus) they were constantly celebrated, i. e. really in the 408th year of the Trojan war, or, as Eusebius, the 406th. They were held at Elis every 5th month, (i. e. the 21 month after 4 years,) beginning on the 11th and ending on the 15th of the lunar month, when the moon was at full. Their care and management belonged sometimes to the Pisians, but for the most part to the Eleans. First 1, then 12, 8, 9, and lastly 10, superintended, till Adrian's time. They sat naked, and under oath, and were called hellanodice, but from them there was an appeal to the Olympian senate. Certain officers, subordinated to a president, preserved order. No woman was allowed to be present.

Preparations. Every combatant must spend 10 months, at the public gymnasium at Elis, in preparatory exercises,—the last 30 days in going through the games precisely as they were to be exhibited. No apology served instead of this, and the combatants must take an oath they had thus practised, and their fathers and brethren must swear not unlawfully to disturb the games. Bribery of an adversary was severely fined. [As to the discipline, temperance, (alluded to in v. 25.) and abstinence required, Epictetus (in Dr. A. C.) says to the contender, if he would win, 'you must observe a strict regimen; live on food you dislike; abstain from all delicacies [and, adds Horace, from wine and venery]; must exercise yourself at the necessary and prescribed times, both in heat and in cold; drink nothing cooling; take no wine as formerly: in a word, you must put yourself under the directions of a pauilist, as you would under those of a physician [comp. the 'training' of English athletes]; and afterwards enter the lists. Here you may get your arm broken, your foot put out of joint, be obliged to swallow mouthfuls of dust, to receive many stripes, and after all be conquered.' So that after all hardships victory was uncertain, (comp. v. 26.) Little pellets, lettered in pairs, one pellet to each athlete, were thrown into a silver urn, and being drawn out, those two who had the same letter, wrestled together, and if there were an odd wrestler (called ephebdros, as coming after the rest), he wrestled last of all with him that had the mastery.

The Pythian Games: celebrated (at first every 9, afterwards every 5 years,) near Delphi, of uncertain origin, [see Potter,] referred variously to Anphictyon, the Amphictyones, Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Apollo, on overcoming the Python serpent, or tyrant. Tradition says, the demigods were first successful in them; some think it at first only a musical contention, the prize being then of silver or gold, or something of value, afterwards a garland. The amphictyones, the presidents, introduced (in the 4th yr. of the 49th Olympiad) all the Olympian exercises; and ordained, that none but boys should run. They also, it is said, gave these hitherto nameless games the name Pythia, from the Pythian Apollo.

The Nemean Games: named from the village Nemea, where they were held every 3 years. The presidents were elected from Corinth, Argos, and Cleona, and halted in black; the games being a funeral ceremony, in honor of Opheltes, whose death was a prelude to the bad success of all the Theban champions.

The Isthmian Games: [to these Paul particularly alludes. They were held on the Isthmus of Corinth, which connects the Peloponnesus or Morea with Europe, and between seas which open the commerce of the E. and W.] in honor of Melicertes, son of the k. of Thebes; or, as others, of Neptune, instituted by Theseus; but these 2 seem to be different games, those of Melicertes being private, and at night, and religious ceremonies rather. They were observed every 31, or rather 5th year, and held most sacred and inviolable. They were not even discontinued when Corinth was sacked and totally demolished, by the Roman Mummius. But the care of them being then committed to the Sicyonians, was restored to the Corinthians on the rebuilding of Corinth. Potter.

These notes have been thus extended, as illustrating institutions which had a favorable, governing influence (and the Olympic games lasted a thousand years!) upon ancient civilization: though love of notice, or 'glory,' is not a correct basis for national feeling. 'Whoever considers, on the one hand, to what great self-denial, in articles of food, sleep, and every other sensual indulgence, they, who were to contend in their games, were obliged; and on the other, of how great importance it is, that the youth of the community should be formed to a manly taste and resolute self-government, will undoubtedly see the great national utility of the Games in the institution and support of these games.' Doddr. It becomes teachers of youth, especially in a republic like ours, where so much may depend on individual exertion, to consider whether some general system of physical education, public and private, might not assist in accomplishing the high destiny to which God calls our nation. ## CHAP. X.

1 The sacraments of the Jews 6 are types of ours, 7 and their punishments, 11 examples for us. 14 We must flee from idolatry. 21 We must not make the Lord's table the table of devils: 24 and in things indifferent we must have regard of our brethren.

MOREOVER, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under <sup>a</sup> the cloud, and <sup>b</sup> all passed through the sea;

2 And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea;

3 And did all eat the same spiritual <sup>c</sup> meat;

4 And did all drink the same spiritual <sup>d</sup> drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that <sup>e</sup> followed them: and that Rock was Christ.

5 But with many of them God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown <sup>f</sup> in the wilderness.

6 Now these things were <sup>g</sup> our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they <sup>h</sup> also lusted.

7 Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is <sup>i</sup> written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play.

8 Neither let us commit fornication, as some <sup>j</sup> of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.

CHAP. X. V. 1-5. In order to dissuade the Corinthians from communion with idolaters, and security in any sinful course, he sets before them the example of the Jews, the church under the O. T. They enjoyed great privileges, but having been guilty of heinous provocations, they fell under very grievous punishments. In these vs. he reckons up their privileges, which, in the main, were the same with ours.

NOTES. CHAP. X. V. 1-5. Thus they [the nation of Israel] were initiated, as by baptism, into the true religion, under the instruction of Moses, the type of Christ; by the overshadowing cloud, and by the waters of the sea; and the whole nation, men, women, and children, were acknowledged as the visible church of God; in a manner which resembled that by which all professed Christians were admitted into the church by baptism. Ez. 14:15. Mat. 28:13, 20. This too (those waters, which flowed from the rock, and followed them as a river, through most of their wanderings in the wilderness) might be called 'spiritual drink,' for it typified the sacred influences of the Holy Spirit, as given to believers through Jesus Christ.—Nothing can more clearly show the absurdity of forcing figurative language into a literal meaning, and so grounding doctrines on it, as the papists have done in the monstrous notion of transubstantiation, than this text does. By such a mode of construction we might prove, that the rock was literally the person of Christ; and that 'the rock' followed the Israelites in the wilderness! Mat. 26:26-28. Luke 22:19, 20.—(1) Our fathers.] The ancestors of the Jewish nation.—(2) Baptized.] Certainly not by immersion. Mat. 20:20-23. Mark 7:3, 4. Luke 11:37-40. Acts 2:41. Heb. 9:8-10. (4) The same, &c.] 'In fact, the sacraments of the ancients were the same as ours, as they had respect to Christ alone.' Beza. Some make their sacraments types of our sacraments, i. e. shadows of shadows: but a sacrament is well defined to be 'an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace.' Jude, 5-8. SCOTT.

(1.) 'Paul having described how he mortified his own lusts, admonishes the Corinthians to the same, not trusting to spiritual gifts, (as some of them did,) for these did not place them beyond danger, but put them under greater obligation to watchfulness.' Grot. 'This he adumbrates from Heb. history, in which the wiser Jews recognised a type of the Messiah's times.' BLOOMF.

(2.) 'Theoph., from Chrys., explains: "They shared with Moses in the shade of the cloud, and passage through the sea; for seeing him first pass, they dared the waters. So, Christ first dying and rising, we also are baptized, imitating death in descending, and resurrection in coming up, [from the water.] They, therefore, were baptized unto Moses, inasmuch as they had him as a leader in the type of baptism, i. e. the being under the cloud, and the passing through the sea." So Ec., Phot., Greg., Ambr., Est., Tirin., Menoeh., and many other Roman Catholic comtrs., also Grot., Whit., and Locke. But this is harsh. See other interpretations in Poole and Wolf. Baptism was a symbolical rite, by which any one bound himself to faith and obedience to any teacher of religion, and the baptism itself was a form of initiation and inauguration

1. He prefaces this discourse with a note of regard, v. 1. Judaism was worthy of their study, it was Christianity under a veil, wrapped up in types and dark hints. The Gospel was preached to the Jews, in their legal rites and sacrifices. And the providence of God toward them, and what happened to them, notwithstanding these privileges, may and ought to be warnings to us.

2. He specifies some of their privileges. (1.) They were delivered from Egypt, v. 1. They were miraculously conducted through the Red Sea, a proper type of our redemption by Christ, who saves us, by conquering and destroying his enemies and ours. (2.) They were brought under obligation to Moses' law and covenant, as we are by baptism under the Christian law and covenant, v. 2. It was to them a typical baptism. They fed on manna, which was a type of Christ crucified, the Bread which came down from heaven, of which whoso eateth shall live for ever. Their drink, a stream from a Rock which followed them, was Christ, in type and figure. He is the Rock on which the Christian church is built; and of the streams that issue from Him do all believers drink, and are refreshed. Now all these great privileges the Jews had; and one would think this should have saved them; that all who ate of that spiritual meat, and drank of that spiritual drink, should have been holy and acceptable to God. Yet was it otherwise, v. 5. Men may enjoy many and great spiritual privileges in this world, and yet come short of eternal life. Many who were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and sea, i. e. had their faith of his divine commission confirmed by these miracles, were yet overthrown in the wilderness, and never saw the promised land. Let none presume on their great privileges, or profession of the truth; these will not secure heavenly happiness, nor prevent judgments here on earth, except the root of the matter be in us.

V. 6-14. The apostle, having recited their privileges, proceeds here to an account of their faults and punishments, their sins and plagues, which are left on record, for an example to us; a warning against the like sins, if we would escape the like punishments. We must not do as they did, lest we suffer as they suffered. Several of their sins are specified, as cautions to us; as,

1. We should shun inordinate desires after carnal objects, v. 6. God fed them with manna, but they must have flesh, Num. 11:4. They had food for their supply, but, not content with that, they asked meat for their lusts, Ps. 106:14. Carnal desires get head by indulgence, therefore should be observed and checked in their first rise: if once they prevail, and bear sway in us, we know not whither they will carry us. This caution stands first, because carnal appetites indulged are the root and source of much sin, [sec end of Rom. 7.]

2. He warns against idolatry, v. 7. The sin of the golden calf is referred to, Ex. 32:6. They first sacrificed to their idol, then feasted on the sacrifices, and then danced before it. The apostle is speaking to the case of the Corinthians, who were tempted to feast on the heathen sacrifices, things offered to idols, though they do not seem to have been under any temptation to sacrifice themselves. Even eating and drinking of the sacrifices before the idol, and as things sacrificed, was idolatry, which, by the example of the Israelites, they should be warned to avoid.

3. He cautions against fornication, a sin to which the inhabitants of Corinth were in a peculiar manner addicted. A temple among them dedicated to Venus, i. e. to lust, had above a thousand priestesses belonging to it, all common harlots. How needful was a caution against fornication, to those who lived in so corrupt a city, and had been used to such dissolute manners, especially when they were under temptations to idolatry too! and spiritual whoredom did in many cases lead to bodily prostitution. Most of the gods whom the heathens served, were represented as very patterns of lewdness; and much lewdness was committed in the very worship of many of them. Many of the Jewish writers, and many Christians after them, think that such worship was paid to Baal-Peor; and that fornication was committed with the daughters of Moab, in the worship of that idol, Num. 25. which brought on a plague, that in one day slew 23,000, beside those who fell by the hand of public justice. Note, Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, in whatever external relation they may stand to Him, and whatever outward privileges He may bestow on them.

into that religion.—They were, by passing under the cloud, and through the sea, as it were baptized, or initiated into the religion promulgated by Moses; and thus thoroughly recognised his divine mission, and bound themselves in future to obey his injunctions. And so Crell., and Hain., Vitr., Wolf, Beng., Ros., Semler, Kr., and Schl. Baptized.] The material of the cloud and sea, suggested the word. Crell. Cloud.] By day, and light by night. Pindar, A. Gellius, Thucyd., Macrobi., have similar expressions concerning Ætna.

(3, 4.) Spiritual.] 'Viz. as bestowed by divine favor, and miraculously. There is an allusion to the Lord's Supper. Rock.] Not natural, but spiritual. Christ, attending them with his omnipotent and gracious presence, is represented as the Author and Fountain of the miraculously produced water. Calv., Wolf, Glass., and Ros., who thinks the Jews' tradition, that the natural rock followed the Israelites, meant only to express this sentiment. Le Clerc says, the Jews of that age took all their comparisons from the O. T. histories, not as considering them prefigurations, but because this was thought a Jewish elegance. And so, Ros. thinks, Paul uses this Jewish way; but this idea of accommodation must be cautiously resorted to, and in no case are we unnecessarily to entangle ourselves with Rabbinical dogmas, or Jewish fancies.' Id.

(5.) Many.] 'Rather, most, i. e. nearly all, (but 2 were excepted.) so the Gr., by a scriptural and classical idiom. Overthrown.] Lit. stretched out, or strewed dead on the face of the desert, [as still happens in the Mecca pilgrimage.] It is an awful type of the eternal perdition of the wicked, as, in fact, is suggested by the words following.' Id.

V. 6-10. The apostle, in applying his subject, next observed, that these events were intended to be instructive examples to the Christian church, or figurative representations of God's dealings with his professed worshippers, in all ages; that, by the fatal consequences of Israel's disobedience and rebellion, others might be deterred from allowing an evil concupiscence after sinful or unexpedient indulgences. 9:24-27. Num. 11:4-9, 31-34. Ps. 78:17-31. 106:15. Some expositors suppose that the word, rendered 'to play,' signifies to commit fornication; but the Israelites are not, on that occasion, charged with this crime, or any other of the same nature; and a jovial, festive religion, without gross and scandalous immorality, is peculiarly congenial to human nature, as circumstanced in this world. For regard to character and worldly interest, and some remaining feeling in the conscience, restrain very large numbers of unconverted persons, from direct licentiousness; especially where the Word of God is so far known, as to render those crimes shameful, and uneasy to the conscience, which the Gentiles

9 Neither let us tempt <sup>k</sup> Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of <sup>l</sup> serpents.

10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also <sup>m</sup> murmured, and were destroyed of the <sup>n</sup> destroyer.

11 Now all these things happened unto them for <sup>o</sup> ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

12 Wherefore <sup>p</sup> let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

13 There hath no temptation taken you but <sup>q</sup> such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.

14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.

15 I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say.

Let us fear the sins of Israel, if we would shun their plagues.

4. He warns us against tempting Christ, v. 9. or provoking Him to jealousy, v. 22. He was with the church in the wilderness; the Angel of the covenant, who went before them. But He was greatly grieved and provoked by them many ways; They spake against Him and Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? For which reason God sent fiery serpents among them, Num. 21:5, 6, by which many of them were stung mortally. And it is but just to fear, that such as tempt Christ under the present dispensation, will be left by Him in the power of the old serpent.

5. He warns against murmuring; Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer, v. 10. by a destroying angel, and executioner of divine vengeance. They quarrelled with God, and murmured against Moses, when any difficulties pressed them. They were very apt to fly in the face of their leaders; were for displacing them, and going back to Egypt, under the conduct of others of their own choosing. Similar seems to have been the case of the Corinthians; they murmured against Paul and in him against Christ, and seem to have set up other teachers, who would indulge and soothe them in their inclinations, and particularly in a revolt to idolatry. Such conduct was very provoking to God, and likely to bring on them swift destruction, as on the Israelites, Num. 14:37. Murmuring against divine disposals and commands, is a sin that greatly provokes, especially when it grows to such a head as to issue in apostasy, and a revolt from God and his good ways.

(1.) The apostle subjoins to these particular cautions a more general one, v. 11. Not only the laws and ordinances of the Jews, but the providences of God toward them, were typical. Their sins against God, and backslidings from Him, were typical of the infidelity of many under the Gospel. God's judgments on them were types of spiritual judgments now. Their exclusion from the earthly Canaan typified the exclusion of many under the Gospel out of the heavenly Canaan, for their unbelief. Their history was written, to be a standing monitor to the church, even under the last and most perfect dispensation. Nothing in Scripture is written in vain. God had wise and gracious purposes towards us in leaving the Jewish history on record; and it is our wisdom and duty to receive instruction from it. On this hint the apostle grounds a caution, v. 12. He that thinks he stands, should not be confident and secure, but on his guard. Others have fallen, and so may we. And then we are most likely to fall, when we are most confident of our own strength, and thereupon most apt to be secure, and off our guard. Distrust of himself, putting him at once on vigilance and dependence on God, is the Christian's best security against all sin. God has not promised to keep us from falling, if we do not look to ourselves: his protection supposes our own care and caution.

(2.) But to this word of caution he adds a word of comfort, v. 13. Though it is displeasing to God for us to presume, it is not pleasing to Him for us to despair. We must fear and take heed, yet not be terrified and amazed; for either our trials will be proportioned to our strength, or strength shall be supplied in proportion to our temptations. Every place, condition, relation, employment, and enjoyment, abounds with snares; yet what comfort may we fetch from such a passage! For, [1.] 'No temptation,' says the apostle, 'hath yet taken you, but such as is common to man, what is human; i. e. such as you may expect from men of such principles as heathens, and such power; or else, such as is common to mankind in the present state; or else, such as the spirit and resolution of mere men may bear you through.' [2.] God is faithful. Though Satan be a deceiver, God is true. Men may be false, and the world false; but God is faithful, and our strength and security are in Him. [3.] He is wise as well as faithful, and will proportion our burden to our strength. He will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able. He knows what we can bear; and He will, in his wise providence, either proportion our temptations to our strength, or make us able to grapple with them. We need not perplex ourselves with the difficulties in our way, when God will take care that they shall not be too great for us to encounter; especially, [4.] When He will make them to issue well. He will make a way to escape, either the trial itself, however great, or at least the mischief of it.

(3.) And on this argument he grounds another caution against idolatry; Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry. It is out of tender affection that he presses this advice. Idolatry is the most heinous injury and affront to the true God. God will succor, therefore be not guilty of any idolatrous compliances. We have all the encouragement in the world to flee sin, and prove faithful to God. We cannot fall by a temptation, if we cleave fast to Him.

V. 15—22. The apostle urges the general caution against idolatry, in the particular case of eating the heathen sacrifices, as such, and out of any religious respect to the idol.

1. He prefaces his argument with an appeal to their own reason and judgment, v. 15. It is no dishonor to an inspired teacher, nor disadvantage to his argument, to appeal for the truth of it to the reason and consciences of his hearers. It comes on them with the greater force, when it comes with this conviction.

2. He lays down his argument from the Lord's supper, v. 16. a feast on the sacrificed body and blood of the Lord. And to eat of the feast, is to partake of the sacrifice, and so to be his guests, to whom the sacrifice was offered, and this in token of friendship practised, without shame or remorse. (9) Tempt Christ, &c.] This language of the apostle fully confirms the point, that all the appearances recorded in the O. T., were made by 'the only begotten Son, in the form of God,' and adored as 'JEHOVAH, the God of Israel.' Gen. 48:15, 16. Ex. 3:2, 4. 23:20—23. Is. 63:9. Acts 7:37—43. Heb. 11:24—26.—The destroyer.] Many writers suppose, that an evil angel is meant by 'the destroyer;' but this is not probable; for holy angels are continually represented as employed by the Lord, in executing vengeance on his enemies.

(7.) Play.] 'The Gr. has here a general notion (as in Herod.) 9:11. 1 Chr. 15:29. 3 Esdr. 5:3. which includes leaping, dancing, singing, and all other kinds of festal sport, not excluding lasciviousness; since, probably, like most oriental dances, these were very indecent.—Idolatry, connected as it was with gluttony, and inebriety, necessarily led [by exciting a proximate propensity] to fornication, v. 8.'

(8.) Tempt.] 'The Gr. properly means, to make trial of any one's ability, also patience. They did it by demanding signs (Theoph.); by impatience for Gospel benefits and rewards (Chrys.); impatience under adversity, and despair of divine assistance (Kr.); adhering to their vices, to see if God would support Paul's authority or not (Ros.); asking greater spiritual gifts and supernatural favors, while not duly using what they had, (as others.) The opinion of Chrys. and Kr. (and Schoett., nearly) seems best.'

(10.) Destroyer.] 'Olothreutos: the destroying angel, death; so often mentioned in the O. T. The Jews, says Lightf., call bad angels destroyers, good angels ministrators, and ascribe uncommon deaths to the angel of death, Samael. Ros. and Kr. think it said "of the plague mentioned, by personification, as the figure is applied to lightning also." A very exceptionable notion. The principle, indeed, is too often introduced by recent commentators, and forms part of a system, by which the truth is so diluted, lowered, and explained away by critical and grammatical hocus-pocus, that little or nothing stable remains.' Id.

V. 11, 12. The apostle further observed, that those things, which seemed so severe in respect of Israel, were merciful in the object; being intended as 'examples' to others, warning them to restrain their appetites and passions, and to exercise holy caution and humble fear. 6—10. Especially they 'were written for the admonition' of Christians, 'on whom the completion of the ages was come;' who had the substance of the ancient shadows, and the accomplishment of all the prophecies; who enjoyed those advantages, which were the end and perfection of the old dispensation; and who lived under the light of the last and most complete revelation, which was to be vouchsafed to the world. Rom. 10:1—4. 15:4—7. Heb. 11:39, 40. 1 Jn. 2:18, 19. It therefore was proper, that every man, who supposed himself to stand secure in the favor of God, and strong in the faith of the Gospel, without being troubled by weak and superstitious scruples, should 'take heed that he did not fall' away from his self-confident profession, and at last lie under the righteous condemnation of God, having only 'the form of godliness;' or lest he should, (like Peter, when through self-confidence he neglected to watch and pray,) fall into grievous sin, and thus wound his conscience, expose himself to severe rebukes, disgrace his profession, and injure or ruin the souls of others. 8:1—3. Prov. 11:2. Mat. 26:30—35, 69—75. Rom. 11:16—21.

(11.) End, &c.] 'I. e. the last of the Jewish ages. The last age, Pearce tr. How long to last Paul says not. An allusion to the Jewish computation, that the world was to last 6000 years; dividing it into 3 periods; the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Evangelical, (or Messianic,) dispensation, (after which, no new law or revelation would be made,) called the last days, the last times, (Ac. 2:17. 2 Tim. 3:1. Heb. 1:2. 1 Pet. 1:5, 20.) and the fulness of time, or times, in Gal. 4:4. Eph. 1:10. Lightf., and Schoett., Crell., Grot., Olcar., Wolf, J. Cappell, Par., Locke, Whit., Pearce, and Ros., satisfactorily establish this sense.'

V. 13. This cannot mean, that all believers should be rendered victorious over every particular temptation; because in that case they must all be kept from actual sin, which is contrary to fact and Scripture; yet it must imply, that no concurrence of circumstances should ever cast them into such temptation, as would render the commission of sin absolutely unavoidable; and that nothing should ever occasion their final apostasy and condemnation. Jn. 10:26—31. Rom. 8:32—39.—A way to escape.] 'A metaphor, taken from them, who, being surrounded by thieves, are in danger on every side.' Pareus, in Leigh.

V. 14—17. 'The apostle calls it 'the cup of blessing,' because when we have it in our hand, we praise and bless, with admiration of his ineffable gift, Him who shed his blood for us; and not only shed his 16 The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?

17 For we, being many, are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread.

18 Behold Israel after <sup>a</sup>the flesh: <sup>v</sup>are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?

19 What say I then? that the idol <sup>v</sup>is any thing? or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing?

20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to <sup>x</sup>devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

21 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup <sup>v</sup>of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils.

22 Do we <sup>v</sup>provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?

23 All <sup>a</sup>things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not.

24 Let <sup>b</sup>no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth.

with Him. Thus to partake of the Lord's table, is to profess ourselves his guests, and covenant people. This is the very purpose and intention of this symbolical eating and drinking; it is holding communion with God, and partaking of those privileges, and professing ourselves under those obligations, which result from the death and sacrifice of Christ; and this in conjunction with all true Christians, with whom we have communion also in this ordinance. Because the bread is one, we, being many, are one body, for we are made partakers of one bread, or loaf, v. 17. which I think is thus more truly rendered; 'By partaking of one broken loaf, the emblem of our Savior's broken body, who is the only true Bread that came down from heaven, we coalesce into one body, become members of Him and one another.' Those who truly partake by faith, have this communion with Christ, and one another: and those who eat the outward elements, make profession of having this communion of belonging to God, and the blessed frater-blood, but has made us all partakers of it.' Ambrose.—These words, 'the bread which we break,' the 'loaf, or bread, is one,' and we all partake of one loaf, and therefore are one body, show how grossly the church of Rome has varied from Christ's institution, in distributing to the communicants, severally, an unbroken wafer; so that they are neither partakers of one loaf, or bread, or of 'bread broken.'" Whit. Sc. (17.) 'Eating together in a religious manner, has been in almost all ancient nations a token of friendship.' DODDR.

V. 18—22. Perhaps some might suppose, that the name was not essential, and that God was worshipped in these rites, though under another title; (as modern speculators have asserted, that Jehovah, or Jupiter, are virtually the same; and that the Supreme Being is worshipped, with equal acceptance, 'in every age and every clime;') but the apostle assured them, that these sacrifices were not presented to God, but to the determined enemies of God and man; and he would, on no account, have his beloved fellow Christians join themselves with demons and their worshippers. Indeed, they could not render the ordinances of Christ consistent with these abominable rites; and if they attempted it, they would provoke the Lord to jealousy, by this familiarity with his detested rivals; as if they were 'stronger than He,' and could defend themselves against his judgments: even as a woman, though not guilty of gross adultery, must excite the suspicion and indignation of her husband, if she associated familiarly with the man, of whom he entertained a peculiar jealousy. Ex. 20:5. The apostle joined himself in these inquiries, to show how greatly he abhorred such a conduct, and how he should dread the consequences of being seduced into it. (20,21) Devils. Lev. 17:1—7, v. 7. Deut. 32:17. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.—Some writers contend, that this simply means intermediate beings, superior to man, but inferior to God. But are holy angels here included?

nity of his people and worshippers. This is the true meaning of this holy rite.

3. He confirms this from the Jewish worship and customs, v. 18. Those who were admitted to eat of the offerings, were esteemed to partake of the sacrifice itself, as made for them, and to be sanctified thereby; and therefore sure to worship God, and be in alliance or covenant with Him, even the God of Israel, to whom the sacrifice was made: this was a symbol or token of holding communion with Him.

4. He applies this to the argument against feasting with idolaters on their sacrifices, and to prove them that do so, idolaters. This he does, (1.) By following the principle on which they would argue it to be lawful, namely, that an idol was nothing, v. 19. They indeed seemed to argue, that, because an idol was nothing, what was offered was no sacrifice, but common and ordinary food, of which they might therefore eat with as little scruple. Now the apostle allows the food was not changed, as to its nature; was as fit to be eaten as common food, where it was set before any who knew not of its having been offered to an idol. But, (2.) He proves, that eating it, as a part of a heathen sacrifice, was, [1.] A partaking with them in their idolatry, v. 20. It was having fellowship with devils; because what the Gentiles sacrificed, they sacrificed to devils. And to feast with them on these sacrifices, was to partake in the sacrifice, and therefore to worship the god to whom it was made, and have fellowship or communion with him: just as he who eats the Lord's supper, is supposed to partake in the Christian sacrifice; or as they who ate the Jewish sacrifices, did partake of what was offered on their altar. [2.] It was a virtual renouncing of Christianity, v. 21. To partake of this Christian feast, was to have communion with Christ; to partake of the feasts made out of honor to the heathen idols, and made of things sacrificed to them, was to have communion with devils. Now this was to compound contraries; it was by no means consistent. And what a manifest self-contradiction must that man's conduct be, that would partake of the Lord's table, and yet partake of the table of demons! God and Mammon can never be served together, nor fellowship be at once had with Christ and Satan. This may also intimate, that such as indulge themselves in gluttony or drunkenness, and by so doing make their own table the table of devils, or keep up fellowship with Satan by a course of known and wilful wickedness, cannot partake truly of the cup and table of the Lord. How much reason have we to look to it, that every sin and idol be renounced by us, when we eat and drink at the Lord's table.

5. He warns them, on the whole, against such idolatry, by signifying to them that God is a jealous God, v. 22. Very probably many of the Corinthians made light of being at these heathen feasts, and thought there was no harm in it. But the apostle bids them beware, assuring them that God cannot endure a rival in matters of worship, and that it is dangerous.

V. 23—33. The apostle shows in what instances, notwithstanding, Christians might lawfully eat what had been sacrificed to idols. But,

1. He cautions against abusing our liberty in lawful things. That may be lawful, which is not expedient, will not edify. A Christian must not barely consider what is lawful, but what is expedient, and for the use of edification. A private Christian should do so even in his private conduct. He must not seek his own only, but his neighbor's wealth, [i. e. weal.] He must be concerned not to hurt his neighbor, nay, to promote his welfare; and must consider how to act, so that he may help others, and not hinder them, in their holiness, comfort, or salvation. They who allow themselves in everything not plainly sinful in itself, will often run into what is evil by accident, and do much mischief to others. Circumstances may make that a sin, which in itself is none. The welfare of others, as well as our own convenience, must be consulted in many things we do, if we would do them well.

2. He tells them, that what was sold in the shambles, they might eat without asking questions. The priest's share of heathen sacrifices was thus frequently offered to sale, after it had been offered in the temple. Now the apostle tells them, they need not be so scrupulous as to ask the butcher in the market, whether the meat he sold had been offered to an idol. It was there sold as common food, and as such might be bought and used; for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, v. 26. and the fruit and products of the earth were designed by Him, the great Proprietor, for the use and subsistence of mankind, and more especially of his own children and servants, 1 Tim. 4:4. To the pure all things are pure, Tit. 1:15. Though it is sinful to use any food in an idolatrous manner, it is no sin, after such abuse, to apply it, in a holy manner, to its common use.

3. He adds, that, if invited by any heathen acquaintance to a feast, they might go, and eat what was set before them, without asking questions, v. 27. nay, though they knew things sacrificed to idols were served up at such entertainments, as well as sold in the shambles. Christianity does by no means bind us up from the common offices of humanity, or allow us an uncourteous behavior to any of our own kind, however they may differ from us in religious sentiments or

Certainly not. Then fallen angels, or wicked spirits, must exclusively be intended; and the worship of the idolaters, though not rendered to 'the devil,' in the exact scriptural meaning of the word, which distinguishes between 'the devil, and his angels,' Mat. 25:41. was rendered to evil spirits, not perhaps by express intention, (though the character and conduct ascribed to the objects of the pagan worship, renders even this doubtful,) yet eventually; evil spirits were substituted in the place of God, and received the glory due to Him.—The Scripture knows nothing of demons, in a good sense; whatever heathen writers did, or learned modern divines now do. Acts 17:18—25. SCOTT.

(20.) 'Christians present at heathen sacrificial feasts, were considered by other heathens, as persons favorable to their idolatrous religions; as those, who were present at the sacred feasts of the Christians, thereby declared publicly that they belonged to the society of Christians.' See Bl. To say 'but the idol is nothing,' Paul shows to be a mere quibble. 'The cup of demons, alludes to the cup poured out at the heathen libations to the gods, and drunk at the sacrificial feasts; for, says Mede, the heathen thought, the supreme and celestial deities were to be worshipped with a pure mind, accompanied with hymns, and praises; the demons with sacrifices. To drink of this libation-wine was strictly forbidden by the Jewish Rabbins, and considered as apostasy.' Bl. Ed.

V. 23. 'Paul now returns to what he had treated of at ch. 8. "All things," I repeat, (from 6:12.) "are permitted to me." Expedient, says Chrys., refers to his own destruction, edify, to stumbling a brother. We should not consider our own gratification at all, when it injures the spiritual good of our neighbor, and in all cases prefer that to our own.' Bloomf. A wider good is always to be preferred to a simply selfish one; the evident good most; the will of the All-knowing, and All-good, will thus be our supreme motive.

25 Whatsoever <sup>e</sup> is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience' sake :

26 For <sup>d</sup> the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

27 If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go ; whatsoever <sup>e</sup> is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience' sake.

28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat <sup>f</sup> not, for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience' sake : for <sup>g</sup> the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof :

29 Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other : for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience ?

30 For if I by <sup>h</sup> grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give <sup>i</sup> thanks ?

31 Whether <sup>j</sup> therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

32 Give <sup>k</sup> none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the <sup>l</sup> Gentiles, nor to the church of God :

33 Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

practices. And when Christians were invited to feast with infidels, they were not to ask needless questions about the food set before them, but eat without scruple. Anything fit to be eaten, that was set before them at a common entertainment, they might lawfully eat. It is to be understood of civil feasting, not religious; for these last, among the heathens, were feasts on their sacrifices, which he had condemned before, as a participation in their idolatrous worship. At PRACT. OBS. Men may seem to be converted; they may give a specious account of convictions, terrors, and comforts, in regular succession, and make a credible profession of faith; they may be admitted members of the visible church, where the strictest discipline is exercised, and stately hear the most faithful instruction; they may be greatly distinguished by external privileges and gifts; they may be baptized, in any form, and receive the 'spiritual meat,' and 'drink' of the Lord's supper, in the purest societies; and yet, not 'feeding on Christ Himself in their hearts by faith, with thanksgiving.' God will not be well pleased with them, but they will die short of Canaan, and perish with the multitude of the ungodly. Heb. 3:14-19. 4:1,2.—So vain are all, even the most scriptural outward signs, or sacramental pledges of salvation, without that 'inward and spiritual grace,' which is signified by them!—In these quiet times, we have 'no temptation' to resist, 'but such as is common to man;' and if we cannot now stand our ground against the world, the flesh, and the devil, what should we do in the fiery trial of persecution?—Whether the world smiles or frowns, it is a

V. 25. Shambles.] 'Neither regularly built shops, nor booths, but only stalls, set out in a certain part of the forum. The priests sometimes sold idolment in the market. Nay, (so Theoph.) some poor or mean persons, also, used sometimes to salt it and lay it up for private use.' Bl. Questions.] 'The Jews vexed themselves with innumerable scruples in their entertainments, as to the food, the company, the mode of eating; whether the fruits and condiments of the table were rightly titled, sacred or profane, clean or unclean; whether the meat was of an idol-offering, or torn, or strangled, or improperly slaughtered. All which the Gospel abolished.'

V. 26. 'As the earth is the Lord's, nothing is naturally impure, but only so in the opinion of any one.'

V. 28. Some versions and manuscripts omit the concluding clause; but there appears to me a peculiar beauty in the repetition, and it is entirely in the apostle's manner.—(26, 28) The earth, &c.] From the LXX, who well tr. the Heb. Ps. 24:1.

(28.) 'But if any one present, (v. 32.) say to you, this dish is made of flesh sacrificed to an idol, insinuating that he considers your eating of that dish, as a joining in the worship of the idol, do not eat of it, on account of not offending him who showed it, and of conscience. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Now when I say conscience, I do not mean thine own conscience; for thou knowest that the eating of such a dish, is not a worshipping of the idol; but the conscience of the other, who views it in that light.'

a common feast they might expect common food; and they needed not to move scruples in their own minds, whether what was set before them was otherwise or no. Note, Though Christians should be very careful to know and understand their duty, yet they should not, by needless inquiries, perplex themselves.

4. Yet even at such an entertainment, he adds, if any should say it was a thing that had been offered to idols, they should refrain; Eat not, for his sake that showed it, and for conscience-sake. Whether it were the master of the feast, or any of the guests; whether it were spoken in the hearing of all, or whispered in the ear; they should refrain, for his sake who suggested this to them, whether he were an infidel, or an infirm Christian; and for conscience-sake, out of regard to conscience, that they might show a regard to it in themselves, and keep up a regard to it in others. This he backs with the same reason as the former; for the earth is the Lord's. There is food enough provided by our common Lord, of which we may eat without scruple. Note, The same doctrine may be variously improved, as here; and again, Christians should be very cautious of doing what may thus prejudice the conscience of others, and weaken its authority with them, which is by all means to be kept up.

5. He urges them to refrain, where they will give offence, while yet he allows it lawful to eat what was set before them as common food, though it had been offered in sacrifice. 'Another man's conscience is no measure to our conduct. What he thinks unlawful, is not therefore made unlawful to me, but may be a matter of liberty still; and as long as I own God as the Giver of my food, and render Him thanks for it, it is very unjust to reproach me for using it.' This must be understood abstracted from the scandal given, by eating in the circumstance mentioned: though some understand it to mean, 'Why should I, by using the liberty I have, give occasion to those who are scandalized, to speak evil of me?' According to that advice of the apostle, Rom. 14:16. Let not your good be evil spoken of. Christians should take care not to use their liberty to the hurt of others, nor their own reproach.

6. The apostle takes occasion, from this discourse, to lay down a general rule for Christians' conduct, and apply it to this particular case, v. 31, 32. namely; that in eating and drinking, and in all we do, we should aim at the glory of God, at pleasing and honoring Him. This is the fundamental principle of practical godliness. The great end of all practical religion must direct us, where particular and express rules are wanting. Nothing must be done against the glory of God, and the good of our neighbors, connected with it. Nay, the tendency of our behavior to the common good, and the credit of our holy religion, should give direction to it. And therefore nothing should be done by us, to offend any, whether Jew, or Gentile, or the church, v. 32. The Jews should not be unnecessarily grieved or prejudiced, who have such abhorrence of idols, that they reckon everything offered to them thereby defiled, and that it will pollute and render culpable all who partake of it; nor should heathens be countenanced in their idolatry, by any behavior of ours, which they may construe as homage or honor done to their idols; nor young converts from Gentilism take any encouragement from our conduct, to retain any veneration for the heathen gods and worship, which they have renounced: nor should we do anything that might be a mean to pervert any members of the church from their Christian profession or practice. Our own humor and appetite must not determine our practice, but the honor of God, and the good and edification of the church. We should not so much consult our own pleasure and interest, as the advancement of the kingdom of God among men. A Christian should be a man devoted to God, and of a public spirit.

7. He presses all on them by his own example, v. 33. A preacher may press his advice home with boldness and authority, when he can enforce it with his own example. He is most likely to promote a public spirit in others, who can give evidence of it in himself. And it is highly commendable in a minister to neglect his own advantages, that he may promote the salvation of his hearers. This shows that he has a spirit suitable to his function. It is a station for public usefulness, and can never be faithfully discharged by a man of a narrow spirit and selfish principles.

dangerous enemy; but if we are believers, we shall be enabled to overcome it, with all its terrors and fascinations; Jn. 16:31-33. 1 Jn. 2:15-17. 5:4,5. nor will our faithful God, who 'keepeth his covenant and mercy to them that fear Him, suffer us to be tempted above what we are able.'—In all cases, we should 'flee from temptation,' and every occasion of sin; and not foolishly or ostentatiously parley with it.—If we would be deemed wise and prudent, let us show our wisdom by a circumspect conduct, and not by curious speculations.—Nor let Christians venture into those places, and join in those sacrifices to 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life,' 1 Jn. 2:15-17. which are of no ill repute even in this favored land. Let us not be amused and imposed on with 'vain words,' about the innocence of this or the other worldly pleasure; these apologies are seldom grounded in truth; but if they were, are such indulgences 'expedient?' Do they tend to edification? Do they consist with charity? Might not the time and money be better employed? Does not the example grieve or mislead others? SCOTT.

'Perhaps thou wilt reply, But why is my liberty ruled by another's conscience. Besides, if, by the free gift of God, to whom the earth belongs, I be allowed to partake of all kinds of food, why am I spoken of as an evil doer, for eating that meat for which I give thanks to God?'

In answer, I say, for this very reason, that ye are allowed to partake of all kinds of food, whether ye eat or drink, or whatever ye do, ye are bound to do all to the glory of God, by doing it agreeably to his will. By your meat, therefore, be ye no occasion of sin, neither to the unbelieving Jews, by lessening their abhorrence of idols, nor to the unbelieving Greeks, by confirming them in their idolatry, nor to the church of God, by making the ignorant think you idolaters. Even as I endeavor to please all men in all things innocent, not seeking my own advantage only, but that of the many also, that, by rendering myself acceptable to them, I may promote their salvation, to the great glory of God.'

MACKNIGHT. This reasoning may, doubtless, with great propriety, be applied to using the products of slave-labor.

V. 29-33. We may explain the passage, as the objection of the Corinthians to the apostle's directions; but it may be understood also as his inquiry: Why should they so incautiously use their liberty, as to give cause for its being condemned, in the consciences of other men? Or why should they so use those good gifts of God, which they received with thanksgiving, as to give cause for slander or offence? Rom. 14:18-18. SCOTT.

CHAP. XI.

1 He reproveth them, because in holy assemblies 4 their men prayed with their heads covered, and 6 women with their heads uncovered, 17 and because generally their meetings were not for the better, but for the worse, as, 21 namely, in profaning with their own feasts the Lord's supper. 23 Lastly, he calleth them to the first institution thereof.

BE ye followers <sup>a</sup> of me, even as I also am of Christ.

2 Now I praise you, brethren, that <sup>b</sup> ye remember me in all things, and keep <sup>c</sup> the <sup>d</sup> ordinances, as I delivered them unto you.

3 But I would have you know, that the head <sup>e</sup> of every man is Christ; <sup>f</sup> and the head of the woman is the man; <sup>g</sup> and the head of Christ is God.

4 Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head.

5 But every woman <sup>h</sup> that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be <sup>i</sup> shorn; but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the <sup>j</sup> image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

8 For <sup>k</sup> the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man;

9 Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have <sup>l</sup> power on her head, because of the angels.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—16. Paul, having answered the cases put to him, proceeds in this ch. to the redress of grievances. The first v. is put, by those who divided the epistle into chs., as a preface to the rest of the epistle, but seems to have been a more proper close to the last ch., in which he had enforced the cautions he had given against the abuse of liberty, by his own example, v. 1. and the way of speaking, in v. 2. looks like a transition to another subject. But whether it more properly belongs to this, or the last ch. it is plain from it, that Paul not only preached such doctrine as they ought to believe, but led such a life as they ought to imitate. Ministers are likely to preach most to the purpose, when they can press their hearers to follow their example. Christ's pattern is a copy without a blot; so is no man's else. We should follow no leader farther than he follows Christ. He passes next to reprehend and reform an indecency of which the women were more especially guilty.

1. He begins with a commendation of what was praiseworthy in them, v. 2. and the body of the church might, in the main, have continued to observe the ordinances and institutions of Christ, as received of the apostle, though in some things they deviated from, and corrupted them. When we reprove, it is very prudent and fit also to commend; it will show the reproof is not from ill-will, and a humor of censuring and finding fault; and therefore procure more regard.

2. He lays a foundation for his further reprehension, by asserting the superiority of the man over the woman, v. 3. Christ, in his mediatorial character and glorified humanity, is at the head of mankind. He is not only first of the kind, but Lord and Sovereign: so the man is the head of the two sexes; not indeed with such dominion as Christ has over the kind, or God has over the Man Christ Jesus, but yet a superiority and headship; and the woman should be in subjection, and not assume or usurp the man's place. This is the situation in which God has placed her; and for that reason she should have a mind suited to her rank, and not do anything that looks like an affectation of changing places. Somewhat like this the women of the church of Corinth seem to have been guilty of, who were under inspiration, and prayed and prophesied even in their assemblies, v. 5. It is indeed an apostolical canon, that the women should keep silence in the churches, ch. 14:34. 1 Tim. 2:12. which some understand without limitation, and seems very well to agree with the connexion of the apostle's discourse, ch. 14. but others with a limitation, in case of inspiration. Or, though a woman might not preach even by inspiration, (because teaching is the business of a superior,) yet she might pray, or utter hymns by inspiration, even in the public assembly. She did not show any affectation of superiority over the man by such acts of public worship. It is plain, the apostle does not in this place prohibit the thing, but the manner of doing it. And yet he might utterly disallow the thing, and lay an unlimited restraint on the woman, in another part of the epistle. These things are not contradictory. It is to his present purpose to reprehend the manner wherein the women prayed and prophesied in the church, without determining, in this place, whether they did well or ill in so doing. Note, The manner of doing a thing enters into the morality of it. We must not only be concerned to do good, but that it be well done.

3. The thing he reprehends, is, the woman's praying or prophesying uncovered, or the man's doing either covered, v. 4, 5. To understand this, it must be observed, that it was a signification either of shame or subjection, for persons to be veiled or covered, in the Eastern countries, contrary to the custom of ours, where the being bare-headed betokens subjection, and being covered, superiority and dominion. And this will help us the better to understand,

4. The reasons of his reprehension. (1.) The man that prays or prophesies with his head covered, dishonoureth his Head, i. e. Christ, the Head of every man, v. 3. by appearing in a habit unsuitable to the rank in which God has placed him. We should even in our dress and habit, avoid everything that may dishonor Christ. The woman, on the other hand, who prays or prophesies with the head uncovered, dishonoureth her head, i. e. the man, v. 3. She appears in the dress of her

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1. This v. is most evidently connected with the conclusion of the preceding ch.; it referred to what the apostle had written concerning his own conduct, in ch. 9. and it concludes the subject which began in ch. 8.

(1.) 'Lest he might seem to extol his own example, Paul refers it to Christ.' ROSENM.

V. 2—16. The apostle here entered on another subject; and began to discuss several particulars respecting the public assemblies of the Christians at Corinth; which, with some digressions, he continued to the end of ch. 14. Several women had been endued with the Spirit of prophecy, which enabled them, by immediate inspiration, to offer prayers for the congregation, or to give instructions, or even to predict future events; for it is not at all reasonable to suppose, that a woman could be said to 'prophesy,' merely by being present when another prophesied. Ex. 15:20, 21. Judg. 4:4. 5:1. 1 S. 2:1—10. 2 K. 22:14. Luke 2:35—38. Acts 2:14—21. 21:7—14, vv. 8, 9. This seems to have been the only case, in which women were allowed to speak in public, and in this respect some abuses had crept in, 14:34, 35. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.—Some think these prophetesses had their hair dishevelled, after the manner of the Pythian priestesses of Apollo; if so, it would be an additional reason for the apostle thus strenuously to oppose them [in this thing].—Many conjectures have been formed concerning the meaning of the following expression, 'because of the angels;' but, probably, the apostle referred to the presence of holy angels, who had witnessed the creation of man as spectators, or were even in some respects joint worshippers with believers, in their public assemblies; which therefore ought to be regulated with the most exact propriety, that these heavenly worshippers might not witness anything unbecoming so holy an occasion. (4.) Head.] 'I. e. master, chief: so the classics. In v. 3. however, God is said to be the Head, as being the cause of Christ, say the Gr. fathers and comtrs.' Bloomf. The expression, like that of 'Father and Son,' is used in accommodation to the inexplicable relation which the Divine and human bear to each other in Emmanuel. The head of the woman, &c.] See on v. 11. (5.) Propheying.] Bloomf. thinks this cannot certainly mean teach and preach, as the apostle expressly forbids this to women, 14:34, 35. He suggests that they might be permitted to improvise, or to pronounce certain poetical praises, like Luke 1:67. 'where the very term is used. Schl. Comp. 1 K. 18:29. 1 S. 10:5, 6. and Philo, describing Moses' canticle at the Red Sea, as "propheteia, from enthusiasm;" and in Esth. 6:12.' Dishonoureth.] For a man to be covered, seems to have been esteemed a mark of a kind of servitude; for a woman to be uncovered in public, was, and still is, accounted in the E. a disgraceful impropriety, and one mark of a prostitute. For a woman to be shorn, was accounted, so antiquaries and philologists prove, the greatest dishonor and disfigurement to a female; 'hence it was only adopted as a sign of extreme grief (see Deut. 21:12.), or imposed as a mark of infamy and disgrace on adulteresses and harlots. See Wets. and Kyp. Ros. suspects it was usual in Greece, for the women to be unveiled in the temples; and thinks some, through hatred of Judaism, wished to introduce this in the Corinthian church. Selden says, a neglect of being veiled in public was a lawful cause of divorce with the Jews: and from the earliest antiquity, Gen. 24:65. The Greeks thought it (so Wets. proves, says Bl.) a flagrant impropriety. Schoett. says, Lightf. proves, that, in Jewish worship, the men had their heads covered, (mitres and caps were part of the Mosaic institution,) and the women theirs uncovered; and adds, what is brought forward, of veiling the head in worship, refers to the Romans, not the Greeks. See Bloomf. ED.

(7.) Man, invested by God with authority over the whole creation, may be considered as the image (and so Diog. and Lucian express it) or type of God, and as it were, a ray from his brightness (Gr. doxa, glory, Heb. kebol), just as viceroys and rulers are sometimes metaphorically said to be images of their sovereign. So Plut., &c. For, says Rosenn., 'man is placed in the highest rank of this world, and in respect to woman, as a kind of secondary god.' [Comp. Gen. 5:1. 2:23. and Ex. 4:16. where Moses is to be to Aaron, in a certain sense, instead of God. ID.

(10.) Power.] 'The veil married women wore on their heads, in token of subjection to their husbands, Gen. 24:65. (called radid, says Goodwin, from radad, subjection), and thus the dress which indicated she considered herself subject; and Chardin [see Bush] says, married women in Persia wear for this a peculiar habit.' 'A sign of subjection would not be called power, exousia; therefore some think it a female ornament of braids, set with jewels, see Wolf; others a veil, but denoting the superiority of the married over the maiden, her inferior in dignity among the Jews, also in the E. and in Europe, which her name, domina, mistress, [Mrs.] indeed implies. Thus the Sept. calls Sarah's veil, Gen. 20:16. the honor of her face. Comp. Virg. Aen. 7. 814. Bp. Middleton refers to the power or license the veil gave the wearer to appear in public.' 12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman: but all things of God.

13 Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?

14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him?

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering.

16 But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it.

19 For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you.

superior, and throws off the token of her subjection. She might, with equal decency, cut her hair short, or cut it close, the common dress of the man in that age. This would be a manifest affectation of that superiority which God had conferred on the other sex. And this was properly the fault of these prophetesses in the church of Corinth. The sexes should not affect to change places. The order in which Divine Wisdom has placed persons and things, is best and fittest: to endeavor to amend it, is to destroy all order, and introduce confusion. Women should keep to the rank God has chosen for them, and not dishonor their head; for this, in the result, is to dishonor God. (2.) Another reason against this conduct was, that the man is the image and glory of God, the representative of that glorious scandals in the Christian assemblies: [and such we know were sometimes sent. (Tertull.) The word here, aggelos, however, is only used, says Bl., of incorporeal spirits] and, indeed, their presence in religious assemblies, [to which also Bl. refers the text, in accordance with the Jewish opinion, of ministering spirits attendant in the house of God, and symbols of his presence,] is favored by Eccles. 5:16. [Tobit 22:15.] and the figures of cherubim in the tabernacle and temple. Doddr. Ep.

(11.) Man and woman are expletives of each other; and, in general, man has the guiding or reflective faculties in greater proportion, woman the affective; man more wisdom, woman more love, perhaps. Some women are, indeed, better fitted to rule than some men, yet it is the exception, both in mind and body: but when the views and feelings of the parties are as they always should be, neither will desire or even think to domineer, for the will is identical, as it were, even (it is the apostle's own comparison, v. 3.) as Christ's and God's will are the same. Would that the holiness, the profound purpose of marriage, were better understood!

(14, 15.) Long hair. Note, 1 Pet. 3:3. and Vol. III. p. 303, note (40) and cut (35). The modern orientals carry this idea of the apostle so far, that the men shave all the head but a scalp-lock, young women wear it hanging even to the ground, and for a young man to wear the hair long, is infamous. See Bush. on vs. 10 and 15. Both the Jews (see Lightf. &c.) and the Greeks (see Wets.) thought long hair indecorous, and cut it short. The Sarmatians (as their descendants) and Lacedæmonians, wore it long. 'Perhaps it was always prevalent in the cold N.' See Bl. 'The hair of women naturally grows to greater length than that of men.'

(16.) Seems, &c. Thinks good to dispute this, I have only to say, we have no such custom here; or, we apostles have no such custom as this; nor in any other of the churches planted by myself, or the other apostles. So Doddr.

V. 17—22. 'It seems evident from hence, that heresy is something worse than the schism above-mentioned.' Doddr.—It is almost unaccountable that a Christian church, in a short time after this eminent apostle had left them, should run into so abominable a profanation of this sacred institution. But the public feasts of the Greeks were frequently conducted in this manner, which appears to us as inconsistent dominion and headship which God has over the world. It is the man who is set at the head of this lower creation, and therein bears the resemblance of God. The woman, on the other hand, is the glory of the man, v. 7. she is his representative. Not but she has dominion over the inferior creatures, as she is a partaker of human nature, and so far is God's representative too, but it is at second-hand. She is the image of God, inasmuch as she is the image of the man, v. 8. The man was first made, and made head of the creation here below, and therein the image of the divine dominion; and the woman was made out of the man, and shone with a reflection of his glory, being made superior to the other creatures here below, but in subjection to her husband, and deriving that honor from him out of whom she was made. (3.) The woman was made for the man, to be his help-meet, and not the man for the woman. She was naturally, therefore, made subject to him, because made for him, for his use, and help, and comfort. And she who was intended to be always in subjection to the man, should do nothing, in Christian assemblies, that looks like an affectation of equality. (4.) She ought to have power on her head, because of the angels. Power, i. e. a veil, the token, not of her having power or superiority, but being under the power of her husband, subjected to him, and inferior to the other sex. Rebekah, when she met Isaac, and was delivering herself into his possession, put on her veil, in token of her subjection, Gen. 24:50. Thus would the apostle have the women appear in Christian assemblies, even though they spake there by inspiration, because of the angels, i. e. say some, because of the evil angels; others, because of the good angels. Jews and Christians have had an opinion, that these ministering spirits are many of them present in their assemblies. Their presence should restrain Christians from all indecencies in the worship of God. We should learn from all, so to behave in the public assemblies of divine worship, as to express a reverence for God, and a content and satisfaction with that rank in which He has placed us.

5. He thinks fit to guard his argument with a caution, lest the inference be carried too far, v. 11, 12. The man and the woman were made for one another, and made to be a mutual comfort and blessing, not one a slave, and the other a tyrant. Both were to be one flesh, Gen. 2:24. and this for the propagation of a race of mankind. As the woman was first formed out of the man, the man is ever since propagated [glorious privilege] by the woman, v. 12. all by the divine wisdom and power of the First Cause so ordaining it. The authority and subjection should be no greater, than are suitable to two in such near relation and close union to each other. As it is the will of God that the woman know her place, so it is his will also, that the man abuse not his power.

6. He enforces his argument from the natural covering provided for the woman, v. 13—15. 'Judge in yourselves, consult your own reason, hearken to what nature suggests; Is it comely for a woman to pray to God uncovered? Should there not be a distinction kept up between the sexes, in wearing their hair, since nature has made one?' It should be our concern, especially in Christian and religious assemblies, to make no breach on the rules of natural decency.

7. He sums up all, by referring them who were contentious, to the usages and customs of the churches, v. 10. He does not silence the contentious by mere authority, but lets them know, that they would appear to the world as very odd and singular, in their humor, if they would quarrel for a custom to which all the churches of Christ were at that time utter strangers, or against a custom in which they all concurred, and that on the ground of natural decency.

V. 17—22. Here the apostle sharply rebukes them for much greater disorders than the former, in their partaking of the Lord's supper, which was commonly done in the first ages, as the ancients tell us, with a love-feast annexed. It is plain, from the beginning of the ch. that he was glad to commend as far as he could. But such scandalous disorders, in so sacred an institution, called for sharp reprehension. They quite turned the institution against itself. The ordinances of Christ, if they do not make us better, will be very apt to make us worse; if they do not melt and mend, they will harden. Corruptions will be confirmed in us, if the proper means do not cure them.

1. He tells them, that, on coming together, they fell into divisions, schisms. There may be schism, where there is no separation of communion. Uncharitableness, alienation of affection, especially if it grows up to discord, and feuds, and contentions, constitute schism. Christians may separate from each other's communion, and yet be charitable one towards another; they may continue in with civility as with piety. The self-conceited Corinthian teachers carried their notions of Christian liberty to an excess, almost inconceivable at present; they not only joined in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbors, but they introduced the customs of them into the church, and so, perverted this sacred feast; and to show the folly of man's wisdom, they were left thus to disgrace themselves more than any other church, because they thought themselves wiser than others. 4:9—13.—It is also wonderful that the apostle should express so favorable an opinion of the professed Christians at Corinth in general, notwithstanding these gross abuses; and we should thence learn caution in condemning whole religious societies, because of those evils, which perhaps but few fully approve, though numbers are seduced to connive at them.—'The Judaizing converts thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at their festivals; four large cups of wine, saith Lightf., at the paschal supper; and to be quite drunk, saith Buxtorf, at the feast of Purim.' Whitby. Esth. 9:21—32. If such sentiments were publicly avowed, at the time when the apostle wrote, our astonishment at the facts advanced may be abated; but our abhorrence should be proportionably increased.—'Though the Corinthians had written to Paul, requesting his . . . directions in several points; . . . yet they had not said one syllable about the enormities which had crept in amongst them, and in the blame of which they all shared: . . . his information, concerning these irregularities, had come to him from other quarters. (1:11, 12. 5:1, 2.)' Paley. Scott.

(18, 19. Divisions.) Schismata, synonymous, says Bl., with haireseis, heresies, v. 19. But there seems a distinction, which Milton thus draws: 'Sects may be in a true church as well as in a false, when men follow the doctrine too much for the teacher's sake, whom they think almost infallible; and this becomes, through infirmity, implicit faith; and the name sectary pertains to such a disciple.—Schism is a rent or division in the church, when it comes to the separating of congregations, and may also happen to a true church as well as to a false; yet in the true needs not tend to the breaking of communion, if they can agree in the right administration of that wherein they communicate, keeping their other opinions to themselves, not being destructive to faith. . . —Heresy is in the will and choice, professedly against Scripture; error is against the will, in misunderstanding the Scripture, after all sincere endeavors to understand it rightly. Hence it was said well, by one of the ancients, 20 When ye come together therefore into one place, <sup>u</sup> this is not to eat the Lord's supper.

21 For in eating, every one taketh before other his own supper : and one is hungry, and <sup>v</sup> another is drunken.

22 What ! have ye not houses to eat and to drink in ? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that <sup>w</sup> have not ? What shall I say to you ? shall I praise you in this ? I praise you not.

23 For <sup>x</sup> I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus, <sup>y</sup> the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread :

24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat ; this is my body, which is broken for you : this do <sup>z</sup> in remembrance of me.

the same communion, and yet be uncharitable. This last is schism, rather than the former. The apostle had heard a report of the Corinthians' divisions, and he tells them he had too much reason to believe it. For, adds he, there must be heresies also ; not only quarrels, but factions, and perhaps such corrupt opinions as strike at the foundation of Christianity, and all sound religion. Not that men are necessitated to be guilty of them ; but the event is certain, and God permits them, that they who are approved, may be set to view, and appear faithful by their constant adherence to the truths and ways of God, notwithstanding the temptations of seducers. Note, The wisdom of God can make the wickedness and errors of others a foil to the piety and integrity of the saints. 2. He charges them not only with discord and division, but with scandalous disorder, v. 21. Heathens used to drink plentifully at their feasts on their sacrifices. Many of the wealthier Corinthians, seem to have taken the same liberty at the Lord's table, or at least at their love-feasts. They would not stay for one another ; the rich despised the poor, and ate and drank up the provisions themselves brought, before the poor were allowed to partake ; thus some wanted, while others had more than enough ; and a divine ordinance, which should have been a bond of mutual amity and affection, was made an instrument of discord and disunion. The poor were deprived of the food prepared for them, and the rich turned a feast of charity into a debauch ! Thus to eat the outward elements, was not to eat Christ's body. There is a careless and irregular eating of the Lord's supper, which is as none at all ; it will but increase guilt. It was a contempt of God's house, or of the church, v. 22. thus to come to the Lord's table, to feast, cabal, and quarrel, and keep the poor from their share. Religious feasts should be attended religiously, and it is a heinous evil, and [a sin] severely to be censured, for Christians to treat their fellow-Christians with contempt and insolence, but especially at the Lord's table. This is doing what they can to pour contempt on divine ordinances. Let us carefully look to it, that nothing in our behavior at the Lord's table have this appearance.

V. 23—34. To rectify these gross corruptions and irregularities, the apostle sets the sacred institution here to view. This should be the rule in the reformation of all abuses.

I. He tells us how he came by the knowledge of it, v. 23. He was not among the apostles at the first institution of it, but he had the knowledge of it by revelation from Christ : and what he had received, he communicated, without varying from the truth a tittle, without adding or diminishing.

II. He gives us a more particular account of the institution, than we meet with elsewhere ; an account, 1. Of the Author ; our Lord Jesus Christ. The King of the church only has power to institute sacraments. 2. The time of the institution, the very night wherein He was betrayed ; just as He was entering on his sufferings, which are therein to be commemorated. 3. The institution itself ; our Savior took bread, and when He had given thanks, or blessed, as Mat. 26:26. He brake, and said, Take, eat ; this is my body, broken for you ; this do in remembrance of Me. And in like manner He took the cup, when He had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood ; this do, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of Me, v. 24, 25. In which observe,

(1.) The materials of this sacrament ; both, [1.] As to the visible signs, bread and the cup, the former called bread many times over in this passage, even after what the papists call consecration, yea, called bread, though it be at the same time said to be the body of the Lord ; a plain argument that the apostle knew nothing of their monstrous and absurd doctrine of transubstantiation. The latter is as plainly a part of this institution

“err I may, but a heretic I will not be.” .. It is a human frailty to err, and no man is infallible here on earth. But so long as all [sects] profess to set the Word of God only before them as the rule of faith and obedience, and use all diligence and sincerity of heart, by reading, by learning, by study, by prayer, for illumination of the Holy Spirit, to understand the rule and obey it, they have done what man can do. God will assuredly pardon them, as He did the friends of Job. Milton, of True Rel., Heresy, Schism, Toleration. Prose Works, Boston, 1826. Ed.

(21.) It was an ancient Grecian custom, at the feasts of Plutus, and of Peace, for the rich and poor to partake in common, each person bringing his own provision, and throwing it into the common mess. Common meals, in imitation of those of our Lord and the apostles, were (it seems) instituted after divine service, on the Lord's day, and either preceded (which seems most probable) or (as others say) followed the eucharist. Bl. In these agapæ, founded to promote a feeling of Christian equality, what each one contributed ceased to be his own, but selfishness frustrated the end of them. Drunken.] Drink to satiety. Bloomf. Ed.

(22.) Houses to eat and drink in.] By their conduct the rich would put to shame those who, if they must contend with poverty, ought to be left to bear their want at home, and not to be shamed with it abroad, and insulted (for, as Juv. says, the hardest part of poverty is ridicule) by so rude a comparison with the abundance enjoyed by their richer brethren, especially at a meal intended to put all on the same footing. Bl. The cut, of a Grecian house, shows the luxury to which the apostle alludes : and may serve to illustrate the manners of that age. Great wealth is not favorable to gospel-feelings, yet all seek it with avidity ! 'Seldom,' says Bickersteth, 'do Christians gain a large measure of riches or dominion, of science or learning, without suffering in their best interests ; and rather need our prayers, than congratulations.'

V. 23—28. This account of the institution of the Lord's supper entirely coincides with that which has been considered, and fully confirms the interpretation given of it. It was of great importance, that it should be here repeated and enforced, that the obligation of the institution, to the end of the world, might be fully ascertained. The words, 'which is broken for you,' are here added, to those recorded by Matthew and Mark ; and substituted for 'which is given for you,' in Luke's gospel. Mark 14:22—25. Luke 22:19, 20. Notes, Mat. 26:26—29. The body of Christ, as 'broken,' in his sufferings and death, is represented by the bread broken ; but an unbroken wafer does not represent this most material circumstance.—It is also here added, that as 'oft as they drank of the cup,' they ought to do it 'in remembrance of' Christ ; in order that the frequent recollection of his love, his sufferings, and their obligations to Him, might have a proper effect on their hearts and lives. Whenever they attended on this sacred service, they would 'show the Lord's death,' i. e. profess their faith in it, and declare its end and efficacy ; till He should come to judgment. To evade this decisive declaration, by saying, till the time when Christ should come, by his spiritual illumination on the mind, to take men off from carnal ordinances, is a striking instance of perverse ingenuity, used in defence of rooted prejudices.—This [its being required that every man should examine himself in order to attend on this ordinance] expressly shows it to be every Christian's duty to attend on this sacrament ; and that both the bread and the wine should be administered to all without exception. Indeed, in one place, it is in the original, 'shall eat this bread, or drink this cup, &c.' (27) ; and the needless variation in our version has caused some cavils of the papists ; yet the v. would as readily prove, that the wine alone, as that the bread alone should be received ; but, in fact, it only shows, that both bread and wine should be received, in a serious, believing, and reverential manner.—Much has been written, by some expositors, concerning the love-feasts, supposed to have accompanied the administration of the Lord's supper in primitive times, as having given occasion to the disorders, which the apostle here reproves ; but it is not certain, that he at all refers to them ; and indeed, it is not certain, or very probable, that they were at this time in use. 2 Pet. 2:12—14. Jude 11—13. Scott.

25 After the same manner also he took the eup, when he had supped, saying, This eup is the New Testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

27 Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, <sup>c</sup>unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

28 But let a man examine <sup>d</sup> himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh <sup>e</sup>damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

30 For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

31 For <sup>f</sup>if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged.

32 But when we are judged, we <sup>g</sup>are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another.

as words can make it. Matthew tells us, our Lord bid them all drink of it, ch. 26:27. as if he would, by this expression, lay in a caveat against the papists' depriving the laity of the cup. Bread and the cup are both made use of, because it is a holy feast. Nor is it here, or anywhere, made necessary, that any particular liquor should be in the cup. In one evangelist, indeed, it is plain wine was the liquor used by our Savior, though it was, perhaps, mingled with water, according to the Jewish custom; see Lightfoot on Mat. 26. But this by no means renders it unlawful to have a sacrament, where persons cannot come at wine.* In every place of Scripture in which we have an account of this part of the institution, it is always expressed by a figure. The eup is put for what was in it, without once specifying what the liquor was, in the words of the institution. [2.] The things signified by these outward signs; they are Christ's body and blood, his body broken, his blood shed, together with all the benefits which flow from his death and sacrifice; it is the New Testament in his blood. His blood is the seal and sanction of all the privileges of the new covenant; and worthy receivers take it as such, at this holy ordinance. They have the New Testament, and their own title to all the blessings of the new covenant, confirmed to them by his blood.

(2.) The manner in which the materials are to be used; our Savior's actions, which are, taking the bread and cup, giving thanks, breaking the bread, and giving about both the one and the other; the actions of the communicants, which were, to take the bread and eat, to take the cup and drink, and both in remembrance of Christ. But the external acts are not the whole, or the principal part, of what is to be done at this holy ordinance; each has a significancy. Our Savior, having undertaken to make an offering of Himself to God, and procure, by his death, the remission of sins, with all other gospel-benefits, for true believers, did, at the institution, deliver his body and blood, with all the benefits procured by his death, to his disciples; and continues to do the same, every time the ordinance is administered to true believers. This is here exhibited, or set forth, as the food of souls. And as food, though ever so wholesome or rich, will yield no nourishment without being eaten, here the communicants are to take and eat, or to receive Christ and feed on Him, his grace and benefits, and by faith convert them into nourishment to their souls. They are to take Him as their Lord and Life, yield themselves up to Him, and live on Him. He is our Life, Col. 3:4.

* The common red wine of the Levant was probably used, and if any other liquid be substituted, a red colored liquid suggests itself as most impressive, for obvious reasons. Rev. Mr. Schaeffer, Missionary to Turkey, in a learned article in the Bib. Repos., for Oct., 1836, mentions the arguments known to him in favor of our Lord's having used must, sryup, and water in the institution of the Eucharist; and states the reasons which induce him to maintain, that common fermented wine was used. The question does not seem to admit of certainty. Ed.

Christ, to keep fresh in our minds an ancient favor, his dying for us, as well as to remember an absent friend, even Christ interceding for us, in virtue of his death, at God's right hand. [2.] It was to show forth Christ's death, to declare and publish it. It is not barely in remembrance of Christ; of what He has done and suffered, that this ordinance was instituted; but to commemorate, to celebrate, his glorious condescension and grace in our redemption. We declare his death to be our life, the spring of all our comforts and hopes. And we glory in such a declaration; we show forth his death, and spread it before God, as our accepted sacrifice and ransom. We set it in view of our own faith, for our own comfort and quickening: and we own, before the world, by this very service, that we are the disciples of Christ, who trust in Him alone for salvation, and acceptance with God.

It is moreover hinted here, concerning this ordinance, 1st. That it should be frequent; as often as ye eat this bread, &c. The ancient churches celebrated this ordinance every Lord's day, if not every day when they assembled for worship. 2dly. That it must be perpetual. It is to be celebrated till the Lord shall come, the second time. This is our warrant for keeping this feast. It was our Lord's will that we should thus celebrate the memorials of his death and passion, till He come and put an end to the present state of things, and his own mediatorial administration, by passing the final sentence. The Lord's supper is not a temporary, but a standing and perpetual, ordinance.

III. He lays before the Corinthians the danger of receiving unworthily; of prostituting this institution as they did, and using it to the purposes of feasting and fiction, with intentions opposite to its designs, or a temper of mind altogether unsuitable to it; or keeping up the covenant with sin and death, while professedly renewing and confirming their covenant with God. 1. Such contract great guilt, guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, v. 27. of violating this sacred institution; of despising his body and blood. 2. They run a great hazard, v. 29. They are likely to bring down punishment, liable to damnation, to spiritual judgments, and eternal misery. But fearful [i. e. over-cautious] believers should not be discouraged from attending at this holy ordinance, by the sound of these words, as if they bound on (23.) Received.] Bloomf. shows, this can mean nothing else than by revelation from Christ, 15:3. Gal. 1:11, 12. 2 Cor. 12:1. 'This epistle seems to have been written before any of the gospels; and it seems to be intimated, Gal. 1:17, &c., that when Paul wrote it, he had seen none of the apostles. It is very remarkable this institution should make a part of that immediate revelation with which Christ honored him; and it affords a strong argument for its perpetuity. For had others of the apostles (as Barclay presumes to insinuate) mistaken what passed at the last passover, and founded the observation of the eucharist on that mistake, surely Christ would rather have corrected this error in his new revelation to Paul, than have administered such an occasion of confirming Christians in it.' V. 29—34. The scruples and consequent neglect of numbers, who seem in other things to obey Christ, have no ground in this passage, except in the apparent harshness of our tr., in which the word that signifies 'judgment,' is ren. damnation; and this commonly means eternal punishment. Indeed, the conscious unworthiness, and lamented infirmities of those, who desire to express their gratitude for redeeming love, are widely different from the profanations of these Corinthians, who yet were not at all supposed to have sinned beyond the hope of pardon; and generally they, who deem themselves most unworthy, are least likely to receive 'unworthily;' which is commonly the sin of the careless, or proud, and self-sufficient.—It is manifest, that the custom, which some scrupulously adhere to, as a matter of conscience, often to the injury of their health, of receiving the Lord's supper fasting, has not the smallest ground in Scripture, and is, in fact, a mere superstition; as is the still much more common notion, that irreverence, or even involuntary defects and mistakes, in this sacrament, are far more heinous and perilous, than in other acts of worship; or even in administering or receiving baptism.—It should also be observed, that the apostle does not speak of worthy or unworthy participants; but of eating and drinking unworthily. Not the character of the person, but the manner of receiving the Lord's supper, forms his direct subject.—'We do not presume to come to this thy table, trusting in our own righteousness; but in thy manifold and great mercies. We are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under thy table.' Communion service. The self-righteous must then receive most unworthily, because he proudly thinks himself worthy; and that man comes in the most worthy manner, who approaches in deep humility, profound reverence, simple dependence on the mercy of God, through the atoning blood of Christ, and lively gratitude for favors so entirely undeserved. themselves the sentence of damnation, by coming to the table of the Lord unprepared; the Holy Spirit never indited this passage of Scripture to deter serious Christians from their duty, though the devil has often made this advantage of it, and robbed them of their choicest comforts. The Corinthians came to the Lord's table as to a common feast, not discerning the Lord's body, not making a difference or distinction between that and common food; nay, they used much more indecency at this sacred feast, than they would at a civil one. This was very sinful in them, and very displeasing to God, and brought down his judgments on them;

PRACT. OBS. We ought to imitate no man, any further than he imitates Christ, whose example alone is absolutely perfect; nor should we desire that others should follow us, except as we are enabled to follow our Lord and Master. —In order to know our duty in various particulars, we should accurately study our relations to God, and to each other, in society, and in the church. —Even nature, and the common sense of mankind, require that men and women should preserve a due distinction in their apparel, behavior, and appearance; and the contrary to this is contemptible and odious. The particulars by which this distinction shall be expressed, are greatly determined by custom; but, however fashions may vary, an effeminate man, and a masculine woman, will always be disgusting and disgraceful. —Not only should our sense of the Lord's special presence, influence our conduct in this manner; but even that of the holy angels, who, in our assemblies, must witness many things unworthy of the sacred service, and which ought carefully to be avoided. Alas! how often do animosities and personal or party-contentions divide religious societies, and corrupt the apparently united worship! Indeed, in the present state of human nature, such 'schisms' and 'heresies' cannot altogether be avoided; but, while we adore the wisdom of God in overruling these evils for the manifestation of those who are approved by Him, we must by no means palliate the guilt of such persons, who thus divide and distract the church. The Lord, indeed, can take occasion from the most aggravated profanations, to establish regulations the most beneficial, of which this ch. gives us a striking specimen; but that display of his wisdom and goodness is far from (34.) At home. 'Mr. Amiran and Mr. Cradock think this a prohibition of love-feasts; but I think it evident from antiquity, they were retained in the church long after, though dubious whether they prevailed so soon.' Doddr.

NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1—3. The Corinthians were favored with a rich abundance of miraculous gifts, by the power of the Holy Spirit, which they exercised principally in their public assemblies; and, as they were divided into parties, it seems that they vied with each other, in the display of these endowments. (Notes, 14.) This gave rise to vainglory, envy, corrupt emulation, and repinings, which were equally opposite to piety and charity. To remedy these grievous evils, the apostle began his observations on the subject, by reminding them of what they had been a short time before. Gal. 4:8—11. Eph. 2:11—13. These [their idols] were dumb idols, notwithstanding all that was boasted concerning their oracles; and therefore could not confer on their deluded votaries those gifts of tongues, and that utterance, which the converts to Christianity had now received, and which must be ascribed exclusively to the sovereign grace and power of God. It was therefore proper for them to understand, that all such gifts were confined within the limits of the Christian church. The context leads us to suppose the apostle meant, that this confession, [that Jesus is Lord,] from the mouth even of a nominal Christian, being made under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, (as wicked Balaam prophesied,) was 'a spiritual gift,' which might benefit others, though it should prove of no use to the possessor. The expression, 'say, that Jesus is the Lord,' more obviously signifies the profession of the true doctrine concerning Christ, than the exercise of saving faith in Him, especially in a discourse concerning 'spiritual gifts;' or, as some tr., 'spiritual men,' or men possessing spiritual gifts, such as are afterwards enumerated, (3—10) to qualify them for public stations some were punished with sickness, and some with the sleep of death. Note, A careless and irreverent receiving of the Lord's supper may bring temporal punishments. Yet the connexion seems to imply, that even those who were thus punished, were in a state of favor with God, at least many of them, v. 32. divine chastening is a sign of divine love, Heb. 12:6. It is kindness to use the rod, to prevent the child's ruin, and better to bear trouble in this world, than to be miserable to eternity. God punishes his people now, to prevent their eternal woe.

IV. He points out the duty of those who would come to the Lord's table. 1. In general, v. 28. Let a man consider the sacred intention of this holy ordinance, its nature and use; and compare his own views in attending on it, and his disposition of mind for it; and when he has approved himself to his own conscience in the sight of God, then let him attend. Such self-examination is necessary to a right attendance at this holy ordinance. 2. The duty of those who were yet unpunished for their profanation of this ordinance, v. 31. If we would thoroughly search and explore ourselves, and condemn and correct what we find amiss, we should prevent divine judgments. We must not judge others, lest we be judged, Mat. 7:1. but we must judge ourselves, to prevent our being judged and condemned by God. We may be critical as to ourselves, but should be very candid in judging of others.

V. He closes all with a caution against all the irregularities of which they were guilty, v. 33, 34. Our holy duties, through our own abuse, may prove matter of condemnation. A sad, but serious truth! Oh! let all look to it, that they do not come together at any time to God's worship, and all the while provoke Him, and bring down vengeance on themselves.

What else was amiss in this matter, he tells them he would rectify, when he came to them.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—11. The apostle comes now to treat of spiritual gifts, which abounded in the church of Corinth, but were greatly abused. Now concerning these spiritual gifts, i. e. the extraordinary powers they had received from the Spirit,

1. He would not have them ignorant, either of their original or use. They came from God, and were to be used for Him. Right information is of great use to all religious practice.

2. He puts them in mind of the sad state out of which they had been recovered, v. 2. If they well understood that, they could not but know, that all true spiritual gifts were from God. Now observe,

(1.) Their former character; they were Gentiles, not God's peculiar people, but of the nations whom He had in a manner abandoned. The Jews were, before, his chosen people; to them the knowledge and worship of the true God were in a manner confined, and the rest of the world were in a manner without God, Eph. 2:12. Such Gentiles were the body of the Corinthians, before their conversion to Christianity. What a change was here! Note, It is of great use to the Christian, to think what once he was; Ye were Gentiles.

(2.) The conduct they were under; carried away to these dumb idols, even as ye were led. They were hurried on to the grossest idolatry, the worship even of stocks and stones, through the force of a vain imagination, and the fraud of their priests, practising on their ignorance: for whatever were the sentiments of their philosophers, this was the practice of the herd. Miserable abjectness of mind! And those who despised excusing the criminals, or exempting them from punishment. Rom. 3:5—8. We should rejoice, that we are under no temptation to pervert the Lord's supper to an intemperate revel; but we may seriously inquire, whether profanations, equally flagrant and expressive of contempt, are not common among us. How often do custom and ostentation lead sinners of superior rank to exhibit their petty distinctions, even in attending on this sacrament, which especially requires our most humble gratitude! How often is it made the support of Pharisaical pride, or the cloak with which hypocrites cover dishonesty, or secret licentiousness! We must most strenuously and decidedly protest against them; and pray earnestly and constantly to God, to incline those who have authority, to use, with impartial decision, proper and effectual methods of terminating such scandalous practices; doing all we can in the mean time, in our several places, to counteract and prevent them; without fearing reproach or persecution.—A penitent heart, a simple reliance on God's free mercy by faith in Christ, according to 'the new covenant in his blood;' a thankful recollection of his sufferings and of his love; a desire 'to show his death,' to profess our obligations to Him, and to give up ourselves to his service, in doing good to his people, and to all men for his sake, constitute the proper preparation for acceptably communicating. All, who aim, and pray to be enabled to come in this frame of heart and mind, are bound in gratitude, and by their professed subjection to Christ, to 'show the Lord's death till He come.' There should, however, be an habitual self-examination; and a more particular one, at those times, when we have opportunity. SCOTT.

these gross conceptions of the vulgar, yet countenanced them by their practice. O dismal state of Gentilism! Could the Spirit of God be among such stupid idolaters, or they be influenced by it? How did the prince of this world triumph in the blindness of mankind! How thick a mist had he cast over their minds!

3. He shows them how they might discern those gifts that were from the Spirit of God, true spiritual gifts. Many Jews, exorcists and magicians, went about, pretending to work wonders by the Spirit of God, (Light-foot's Horæ in loc.) and many among the Gentiles pretended to inspiration. Now the apostle tells them, none could act under the influence, or by the power of the Spirit of God, who disowned and blasphemed Christ: for the Spirit of God bore uncontrollable witness to Christ, by prophecy, miracles, his resurrection from the dead, the success of his doctrine among men, and its effect on them; and could never so far contradict it-

V. 4-11. All these endowments the Holy Spirit freely bestowed, in that measure and diversity which He saw good, and to be conducive to the common advantage of the church; so that no one had any ground of glorying over others, or of repining, as if forgotten in this distribution. —There is indeed much difficulty, at present, in determining precisely what the apostle meant by each of the terms here used, which doubtless were readily understood at the time when the gifts spoken of were exercised; but the sense which appeared most probable has been chosen; and great exactness on such a subject is not at all necessary. —All these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit; dividing to every one severally as He will (11); compared with, 'It is the same God, which worketh all in all,' suggests a conclusive proof of the Personality, Sovereignty, and Deity of the Holy Spirit. But its true force was distinctly seen by the ancient comtrs., especially Theod.; thus 'he again calls gifts, energies, as energized by the divine nature.' And so Locke. The energmata [tr. operations] undoubtedly alludes to the inward impulse of the Spirit. —Those learned persons [most German theologians since Eich.] too often forget, [as in their view of this passage,] that the dispensation of the Gospel was, in the time of the apostles, altogether extraordinary, supernatural, and miraculous, as indeed we might reasonably expect, that a system meant to work such a mighty, moral regeneration would be. Bl. Ep.

(3.) 'It is not surprising that we are ignorant of the proper meaning of these words, (8-10) now we have lost the things.' PARÆUS.

(9.) 'Faith, as an extraordinary gift, in this connexion, must in the general signify, a firm persuasion of being called out by God, at any particular time, to perform some miracle, and accordingly going about it without any suspicion of fear, in confident dependence on a correspon-self, as to declare Him accursed. And, on the other hand, no man could say Jesus was the Lord, (i. e. live by this faith, and work miracles to prove it,) but it must be by the Holy Ghost. To own this truth before men, and maintain it to death, and live under the influence of it, could not be done without the sanctification of the Holy Ghost. No man can call Christ Lord, with a believing subjection to Him, and dependence on Him, unless that faith be wrought by the Holy Ghost. No evil spirit would lend assistance, if it were in his power, to spread a doctrine and religion so ruinous to the devil's kingdom. The substance of what the apostle asserts and argues here, is, that, whatever pretences there were to inspiration or miracles, among those who were enemies to Christianity, they could not be from the Spirit of God; for no man could believe this with his heart, or prove with a miracle that Jesus was Christ, but by the Holy Ghost. So that the extraordinary operations and powers among them did all proceed from the Spirit of God. He adds,

4. These spiritual gifts, though proceeding from the same Spirit, are yet of various kinds. A free cause may produce variety of effects; the same giver bestow various gifts, v. 4. diversities of gifts, such as revelations, tongues, prophecy, interpretations of tongues. There are differences of administrations, or different offices, and officers to discharge them, different ordinaances and institutions, see v. 28-30. also diversities of operations, or miraculous powers, v. 10. as here, but it is the same God which worketh all in all: gifts, administrations, and operations, however different they may be in themselves, in this they agree; all are from God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the Spring and Origin of all spiritual blessings and bequests. And several of the kinds are here specified, v. 8-10. Several persons had their several gifts, some one, some another. To one was given the word of wisdom, i. e. say some, a knowledge of the mysteries of the Gospel, and ability to explain them; an exact understanding of the design, nature, and doctrines, of the Christian religion. Others say, an uttering of grave sentences, like Solomon's proverbs. Some confine this word of wisdom to the revelations made to and by the apostles. To another, the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit; i. e. say some, the knowledge of mysteries, ch. 2:13. wrapped up in the prophecies, types, and histories of the O.T.: say others, a skill and readiness to give advice and counsel in perplexed cases. To another, faith, by the same Spirit; i. e. the faith of miracles, or a faith in the divino power and promise, whereby they were enabled to work miracles; or, an extraordinary impulse from above, whereby they were enabled to trust God in any emergency, and go on in the way of their duty, and own and profess the truths of Christ, whatever were the difficulty or danger. To another, the gift of healing, by the same Spirit; i. e. healing the sick, either by the laying on of hands, or anointing with oil, or with a bare word. To another, the working of miracles, the efficacies of powers; such as raising the dead, restoring the blind to sight, giving speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, and the use of limbs to the lame. To another, prophecy, i. e. ability to foretell future events; which is the more usual sense of prophecy; or to explain Scripture by a peculiar gift of the Spirit. See ch. 14:24. To another, the discerning of spirits; power to distinguish between true and false prophets, or to discern the real and internal qualifications of any person for an office, or to discover the inward workings of the mind by the Holy Ghost, as Peter did those of Ananias, Acts 5:3. To another, divers kinds of tongues, or ability to speak languages by inspiration. To another, the interpretation of tongues, or ability to render foreign languages readily and properly into their own. With such variety of spiritual gifts were the first ministers and churches blessed.

5. The end for which these gifts were bestowed, v. 7. They were not distributed for the mere honor and advantage of those who had them, but for the benefit of the church, to edify the body, and spread and advance the Gospel. Whatever gifts God confers on any man, He confers them, that he may do good with them, whether they be common or spiritual; and the more he profits others with them, the more abundantly will they turn to his account in the end, Philip. 4:17. Spiritual gifts are bestowed, only that men may with them profit the church, and promote Christianity.

6. The measure and proportion in which they are given, v. 8. It is according to the sovereign pleasure of the Donor. What more free than a gift? And shall not the Spirit of God do what He will with his own? May He not give to what persons He pleases, and in what proportion He pleases; one gift to one man, and another to another; to one more, and another fewer, as He thinks fit? 'Such [v. 8-10.] were the supernatural gifts with which the first preachers and ministers of the Gospel were endowed; and by which they effectually and speedily established the Gospel in the most populous provinces of the Roman empire. But these gifts were equally necessary for the upholding of the church. For the greatest part of the first believers, having been originally heathens, were utterly destitute of all spiritual ideas, and had but very imperfect notions of morality; many of them being men of low birth, their minds were not much cultivated by education. Few of them were acquainted with the sacred books of the Jews. And with respect to the writings of the apostles and evangelists, they were not published till a considerable time after numerous churches were planted in many countries of Asia and Europe. In these circumstances, the knowledge of the Gospel which the brethren derived from the few preachings of the inspired teachers, which they had an opportunity to hear, could not, at the beginning, be either accurate or extensive. And, therefore, to remedy that defect, the converts from idolatry were forced into churches, and appointed to assemble together, for their mutual instruction, and for the joint worship of God. And lest, through ignorance or prejudice, they might have misled one another, the spiritual gifts were bestowed on a number of them, to fit them for presiding in the public worship. Others of them had an inspiration which qualified them for speaking to the edification, exhortation, and comfort of the rest. Others were fitted to lead the devotion of the congregation, by an inspiration which furnished them with prayers and hymns for public use. Others, by the gift of interpreting foreign tongues, translated, into the common languages, such parts of the writings of Moses and the prophets, as were read in their public meetings; as also the 12 For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so <sup>q</sup> also is Christ.

13 For by one Spirit are we all <sup>r</sup> baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or <sup>s</sup> Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to <sup>t</sup> drink into one Spirit.

14 For the body is not one member, but many.

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

18 But now hath God set <sup>u</sup> the members every one of them in the body as <sup>v</sup> it hath pleased him.

19 And if they were all one member, where were the body?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21 And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

22 Nay much more, those <sup>w</sup> members of the body which seem to be more feeble, are necessary:

23 And those members of the body which we think to be less honorable, upon these we <sup>x</sup> bestow more abundant honor; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

24 For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked:

25 That there should be no <sup>y</sup> schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another.

26 And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it.

purposes shall be served, and his own donatives bestowed? The Holy Ghost is a Divine Person. He works divine effects, and divides divine gifts, as He will, by his own power, and according to his own pleasure, without dependence or control.

V. 12—26. The apostle here makes out the truth of what was above asserted, and puts the gifted men among the Corinthians in mind of their duty, by comparing the church of Christ to a human body.

I. One body may have many members, and the many members of the same body make but one body, v. 12. and the body is not one member only, but many. So also is Christ, that is, Christ mystical, as divines commonly speak, Christ and his church, as head and members, yet but one body, all the members baptized into the same body, and made to drink of the same Spirit, v. 13. Jews and Gentiles, bond or free: the Spirit's operation, signified by the outward administration, called therefore the washing of regeneration, Tit. 3: 5. makes us members; and by communion at the other ordinance we are sustained, not merely by drinking the wine, but by drinking into one Spirit. The outward administration is a mean appointed of God for our participation in this great benefit; but it is baptism by the Spirit, it is internal renovation, and drinking into one Spirit, partaking of his sanctifying influence from time to time, that makes us true members of Christ's body, and maintains our union with Him.

II. Each member has its particular form, place, and use. 1. The meanest member, though less useful, makes a part of the body, v. 15, 16. So every member of the body mystical, though it cannot have the same place and office, yet is as much a member, the meanest as the noblest, and as truly regarded by Him. All his members are dear to Him. 2. There must be a distinction of members in the body, v. 17, 19. They are many members, and for that reason must have distinction among them, and yet are but one body, v. 20. One member of a body is not a body; this is made up of many; and among these many there must be a distinction; difference of situation, shape, use, &c. So in the body of Christ; its members must have different uses, and therefore have different powers, and be in different places, some having one gift, and others a different one. So it is for the beauty and good appearance of the church, that there should be diversity of gifts and offices in it. 3. The disposal of members to a natural body, and their situation, are as God pleases, v. 18.

We may plainly perceive the divine wisdom in the distribution of the members; but it was made according to the counsel of his will; He distinguished and distributed them as He pleased. So also in the members of Christ's body: they are chosen out to such stations, and endued with such gifts, as God pleased. He who is sovereign Lord of all, disposes his favors and gifts as He will. And who should gainsay his pleasure? 4. All the members of the body are, in some respect, useful and necessary to each other; nay, those members of the body which seem to be more feeble (the bowels, &c.) are necessary, v. 21, 22. God has so fitted and tempered them together, that they are all necessary and useful, and none redundant, but each serves some good purpose or other. Nor is there a member of the body of Christ but may and ought to be useful to his fellow-members, and at some times, and in some cases, is needful to them. Those who excel in any gift, cannot say they have no need of them, who in that gift are their inferiors, while perhaps, in other gifts, they exceed them. Nay, the lowest members of all have their use, and the highest cannot do well without them. 5. Such is the man's concern for his whole body, that on the less honorable members more abundant honor is bestowed, and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. Those parts which are not fit, like the rest, to be exposed to view, which are either deformed or shameful, we most carefully clothe and cover; whereas the comely parts have no such need. The wisdom of Providence has so contrived and tempered things, that the more abundant regard and honor should be paid to that which most wanted it, v. 24. So should the members of Christ's body behave toward their fellow-members: instead of despising them, or reproaching them, for their infirmities, they should endeavor to cover and conceal them, and put the best face on them they can. 6. Divine wisdom has contrived and ordered things in this manner, that the members of the body should not be schismatics, divided from each other, and acting on separate interests, but well affected to each other; tenderly concerned for each other, having a fellow-feeling of each other's griefs, PRACT. OBS. V. 1—27. Acute speculators are often most ignorant of practical subjects; those who are most elated with the gifts bestowed on them, are commonly most forgetful of the Giver, and the proper use of them; and 'spiritual gifts' have frequently been the support of spiritual pride.—There have been many who advanced a claim to inspiration, or extraordinary illumination of one kind or other; and there still are those who advance such claims; but appearances of this kind must be counterfeit in all, who refuse the Lord Jesus those honors, which He demanded to Himself. Even a capacity of speaking in a proper and scriptural manner, on any topic of religion, will not profit a man; except he have grace, humbly and simply to improve his talent, for the edification of others, without seeking, as he is more exposed to temptation, his own glory or emolument. We have therefore little cause to envy those, who are eminent in abilities and popularity, to covet these dangerous distinctions, to glory in any measure of them bestowed on us, or to despise such as are destitute of them. Numbers have thus been ruined: being lifted up in pride, they have come short of that salvation, which they preached to others; or they have been betrayed into such evils, as have caused them to terminate their days in disgrace and distress. And the few, who have not been apparently injured, by eminency in gifts and popularity, have generally had more to relate concerning 'thorns in the flesh, and messengers of Satan to buffet them,' than their less gifted and admired brethren had any conception of. We ought most earnestly to inquire, as our grand concern, whether we have been 'baptized into the body of Christ,' by his regenerating grace; and whether we are 'drinking into his Spirit,' by receiving daily from his fulness. We should also watch against pride, ambition, envy, discontent, selfishness, contempt of others; and thus seek the good of the church, of those in our own sphere of action, and of every individual, by properly improving our talents, and performing the duty of our station. If situated in the lowest place, we should not disdain its services as beneath us; if advanced to a higher station, we should not imagine, that we do not stand in need of the prayers and help of our feeblest and most obscure brethren; for these are essential to the perfection of the whole. Nay, we should guard and take care of the weak and feeble believer; even as the God of nature has, with exquisite skill and kindness, defended those parts of the body, which, though essential to life and health, might otherwise easily be wounded and destroyed; and cover with affectionate attention the infirmities and uncomeliness of those, whom we have reason to regard as real believers, and who are exposed to disgrace and contempt; that so 'the more abundant honor may be given to that part which lacked; seeing the more honorable of our brethren have no need of such particular assistance and support from us. Our kind Creator hath effectually provided, that there should be 'no schism in our natural body; but He has for wise reasons seen good to make trial of the members of the mystical body of Christ, in this respect; and through the remainder of error and sin in real Christians, through the intrusion of hypocrites, and the artifices of the enemy, many disgraceful and lamentable divisions still prevail; which we should pray against, and endeavor to heal, to the utmost of our power, and with persevering earnestness.

V. 15—26. From the preceding illustration, the Corinthians might see the folly and perniciousness of their cumulations, covetings, and murmurs. The very idea, of every member coveting to be the most honored part, is associated with that of the destruction of the body; which necessarily consists of many different members, so formed and placed, as to become one regular whole.

and a communion in each other's pleasures and joys, v. 25, 26. God has tempered the members of the body natural in the manner mentioned, that there might be no schism in the body, v. 25. no rupture or disunion among the members, nor so much as the least mutual disregard. This should be avoided also in the spiritual body of Christ. There should be no schism in this body, but the members should be closely united by the strongest bonds of love. All decays of this affection are the seeds of schism. Where Christians grow cold towards each other, they will be careless and unconcerned for each other. And this mutual disregard is a schism begun. The members of the natural body are made to have a care and concern for each other, to prevent a schism in it. So should it be in Christ's body; the members should sympathize with each other. As in the natural body, the pain of the one part afflicts the whole, the ease and pleasure of one part affects the whole; so should Christians reckon themselves honored in the honors of their fellow-Christians, and should suffer in their sufferings. Note, Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty. So far from slighting our brethren's sufferings, we should suffer with them; so far from envying their honors, we should rejoice with them, and reckon ourselves honored by them.

V. 27-31. Here the apostle sums up the argument, and applies this similitude to the church of Christ. Concerning which, observe, 1. The relation wherein Christians stand to Christ, and one another. The church, or whole collective body of Christians in all ages, is his body, v. 27. and members in particular, or particular members. Each stands related to the body as a part of it, and all have a common relation to one another, dependence on one another, and should have a mutual care and concern. Note, Mutual indifference, and much more contempt, and hatred, and envy, and strife, are very unnatural in Christians. It is like the members of the same body being destitute of all concern for one another, or quarrelling with each other. This is the apostle's scope in this argument. He endeavors in it to suppress the proud, vaunting, and contentious spirit, that had prevailed among the Corinthians, by reason of their spiritual gifts. 2. The variety of offices instituted by Christ, and gifts or favors dispensed by Him, v. 28. First, Apostles, the chief ministers entrusted with all the powers necessary to found a church, and make an entire revelation of God's will. Secondarily; Prophets, or persons enabled by inspiration to prophesy, interpret Scripture, or write by inspiration, as the evangelists did. Thirdly, Teachers, those who labor in word and doctrine, whether with pastoral charge, or without it. After that, miracles, or miracle-workers. Then gifts of healing, or those who had power to heal diseases. Helps, or such as had compassion on the sick and weak, and ministered to them. Governments, or such as had the disposal of the charitable contributions of the church, and dealt them out to the poor. Diversities of tongues, or such as could speak divers languages. Concerning all which observe,

(1.) The plenteous variety of these gifts and offices. What a multitude! (2.) Their order. They are here placed in their proper ranks; those of most value first. What holds the last and lowest rank, is, diversity of tongues. And yet it is manifest, from ch. 14. that the Corinthians valued themselves exceedingly on this gift. How proper a method it is to beat down pride, to let persons know the true value of what they pride themselves in! Men but too commonly value themselves most on what is least worth: and it is of great use to bring them to a sober mind, by letting them know how very greatly they mistake. (3.) The several distribution of these gifts, not all to one, nor to every one alike. All members and officers had not the same rank in the church, nor the same endowments, v. 29, 30. This were to make the church a monster; all one, as if the body were all ear or all eye. We must be content with our own rank and share, if they be lower and less than those of others. We must not be conceited of ourselves, and despise others, if we are in the higher rank, and have greater gifts. Every member of the body is to preserve its own rank, and do its own office; and all are to minister to one another, and promote the good of the body in general, without envying, or despising, or neglecting, or ill-using, any one particular member. How blessed a constitution were the Christian church, if all the members did their duty!

He closes this ch. with an advice, (as the generality read it,) and a hint. Grace is therefore to be preferred before gifts; and of gifts, those are to be preferred, which are of greatest use; and true charity is greatly to be preferred to the most glorious gifts. To have the heart glow with mutual love, is vastly better than to glare with the most pompous titles, offices, or powers.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1-3. Here the apostle shows, what more excellent way he meant in the close of the former ch., i. e. charity, or, as it is commonly elsewhere rendered, love: not what is meant by charity, in our common use of the word, which most understand of almsgiving, but love, in its fullest and most extensive meaning; true love to God and man; a benevolent disposition of mind towards our fellow-Christians, growing out of sincere and fervent devotion to God. This living principle of all duty and obedience is the more excellent way of which the apostle speaks; preferable to all gifts. Nay, without this, the most glorious gifts are nothing, of no account to us, of no esteem in the sight of God. He specifies,

1. The gift of tongues, v. 1. Could a man speak all the languages on earth, with the greatest propriety, elegance, or fluency; could he talk like an angel, and yet be without charity, it would be all empty noise, mere unharmonious and useless sound, that would neither profit nor delight. It is not talking freely, nor finely, nor learnedly, of PRACT. OBS. V. 27-31. In proportion as the members of Christ have not the same care of others as of themselves, very injurious consequences will manifestly ensue. [Indeed, most quarrels among Christians are about precedences. H.] If all filled up their several places in entire and equal love, there could be no envyings, jealousies, murmurs, vainglory, self-seeking, or disregard of others, any more than there is in heaven. (Note, Mat. 6:10.) We should, in that case, every one reciprocally care for all the rest; we should sympathize with the afflicted, tempted, distressed, or fallen believer, and help him as we could; we should feel ourselves sharers in the disgrace and reproach of the poor and needy; deem ourselves honored and prospered, in the reputation, success, and usefulness of our more distinguished brethren; and rejoice in the consolation of such as were glad in the Lord. The meanest Christian would not then repine, or envy the most exalted, but rejoice and bless God on his account; the most eminent would not disregard the meanest, but would peculiarly endeavor to encourage and help him. Thus the good of the whole, and of every part, would be the uniform object of all, in every station, without any exception; and with the subordination of all personal interests and satisfactions to this superior end. V. 31. The Christians at Corinth, indeed, 'coveted earnestly,' or were envious of the best gifts, or such as were deemed most splendid and honorable; but the apostle was about to show them a more excellent way, even that of love; which would influence them to be content with the gifts already conferred, and to be principally zealous in making an useful improvement of them. Our tr., indeed, renders the cl. as an exhortation; but it may with equal exactness be tr., 'Ye do covet earnestly,' &c. and so imply a reprehension of the corrupt emulation of the Corinthians; and this certainly coincides far better with the argument of the apostle. For exhorting them to 'covet the best gifts,' or those that were most valued, which the Holy Spirit distributed us He saw good, would have sanctioned that ambitious temper, which he evidently aimed to repress. the things of God, that will save ourselves, or profit others, if we are destitute of holy love. It is the charitable heart, not the voluble tongue, that is acceptable with God. The apostle specifies first this gift, because hereupon the Corinthians seemed chiefly to value themselves, and despise their brethren.

2. Prophecy, and the understanding of mysteries, and all knowledge. This, without charity, is as nothing, v. 2. Had a man ever so clear an understanding of the prophecies and types under the old dispensation, ever so accurate a knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity, nay, and this by inspiration of the Spirit of God, without charity all this would stand him in no stead. A clear and deep head is of no signification, without a benevolent and charitable heart.

3. Miraculous faith, the faith of miracles, or the faith by which persons were enabled to work miracles; the most wonder-working faith, to which nothing is in a manner impossible, is itself nothing without charity. Moving mountains is a great achievement in the account of men; but one dram of charity is, in God's account, of much greater worth than all the faith of this sort in the world. They may do many wondrous works in Christ's name, whom yet He will disown, and bid depart from Him, as workers of iniquity, Mat. 7:22. Saving faith is ever in conjunction with charity, but the faith of miracles may be without it.

4. The outward works of charity, v. 3. Should all a man has be laid out in this manner, if he had no charity, it would profit nothing. The external act of giving alms may proceed from a very ill principle. Vainglorious ostentation, or a proud conceit of merit, may put a man to a large expense this way, who has no true love to God or men. Note, If we leave charity out of religion, the most costly services will be of no avail to us. If we give away all we have, while we withhold the heart from God, it will not profit.

5. Even sufferings, and those of the most grievous kind, v. 3. Should we sacrifice our lives for the faith of the Gospel, and be burnt to death in maintenance of its truth, this will stand us in no stead without charity, unless we are animated to these sufferings by a principle of true devotion to God, and sincere love to his church and people, and good-will to mankind. It is possible, that the very same principle [nay, fanaticism, obstinacy, party zeal, vainglory, or obstinate attachment to one's own system, and other selfish motives] may have worked up some to resolution enough to die for their religion, who never heartily believed and embraced it. But vindicating religion, at the cost of our lives, will profit nothing, if we feel not the power of it: and true charity is the very heart and spirit of religion. If we feel none of its sacred heat in our hearts, it will profit nothing, though we be burnt to ashes for the truth. How strange a way of recommending themselves to God are they in, who hope to do it by burning others, by murdering, and massacring, and tormenting their fellow-Christians, or by any injurious usage of them! My soul, enter not thou into their secrets. If I cannot hope to recommend myself to God by giving mine own body to be burnt while I have no charity, I will never hope to do it by burning or maltreating others, in open defiance to all charity.

V. 4—7. The apostle gives us in these vs. some of the properties and effects of charity, both to describe and commend it, that we may know whether we have this grace, and that, if we have not, we may fall in love with what is so exceedingly amiable, and rest not till we have obtained it. It is an excellent grace, and has a world of good properties belonging to it. As,

1. It is long-suffering. It can endure evil, and injury, and provocation, without being filled with resentment, indignation, or revenge. It will put up with many slights and neglects from the person it loves, and wait long, to see the kindly effects of such patience on him.

2. It is kind; is benign, bountiful, courteous and obliging; seeks to be useful, and not only seizes on opportunities of doing good, but searches for them. Under these two generals all the particulars of the character may be reduced.

3. Charity suppresses envy; is not grieved at the good of others, neither at their gifts, nor at their good qualities, their honors, or their estates. If we love our neighbor, his welfare, bliss, and satisfaction will be an addition to ours, instead of impairing or lessening it. This is the proper effect of kindness and benevolence: envy is the effect of ill-will. The mind which is bent on doing good to all, can never wish ill to any.

4. Charity subdues pride and vainglory; is not puffed up; is not bloated with self-conceit, nor arrogant; not insolent, apt to despise others, or trample on them, or treat them with contempt and scorn. Those who are animated with a principle of true brotherly love, will in honor prefer one another, Rom. 12:10. They will do nothing out of a spirit of contention, or vainglory, but in lowliness of mind will esteem others better than themselves, Phil. 2:3. True love will give us an esteem of our brethren, and raise our value for them; and this will limit our self-esteem, and prevent the tumors of self-conceit and arrogance, [helping us to look up rather than down.] The Gr. for vaunteth itself, hears other significations; nor is the proper meaning, as I can find, settled; but in every sense and meaning, true charity stands in opposition to it. The Syriac renders it, does not raise tumults and disturbances. Charity calms the angry passions, instead of raising them. Others render it, It does not act insidiously with any, or seek to insnare them, or tease them with needless importunities and addresses. Some understand it of dissembling and flattery, when a fair face is put on, and fine words said, [with a selfish end,] without any regard to truth, or intention of good. Charity abhors such falsehood and flattery. Nothing is commonly more pernicious, [than this mode of selfishness,] nor more apt to cross the purposes of true love and good-will.

5. Charity is careful not to pass the bounds of decency; it beareth not unseemly, does nothing indecorous, nothing that in the common account of men is base or vile; behaves towards all men, as becomes their rank and ours; is not for breaking order, confounding ranks, bringing all men [down] to a level; but for keeping up the distinction God had made between men, and acting decently in its own station, and minding its own business, without taking on it to mend, or censure, or despise, the conduct of others. Charity would do nothing that misbecomes it.

6. Charity is an utter enemy to selfishness; seeketh not its own; does not inordinately desire or seek its own praise, honor, profit, or pleasure. Indeed, self-love, in some degree, is natural to all men, and a reasonable love of self is by our Savior made the measure of our love to others, that charity which is here described, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. The apostle does not mean, that charity destroys all regard to self; he does not mean, that the charitable man should never challenge what is his own, but utterly neglect himself and all his interests. Charity must then root up that principle which is wrought into our nature. But charity never seeks its own to the hurt of others, or with the neglect of others. It many times neglects its own for the sake of others; prefers their welfare, and satisfaction, and advantage, to its own; and it ever prefers the weal of the public, of the commufit of their brethren, the apostle, in this ch., declares the most eminent of these gifts to be comparatively nothing, and 'love' to be everything. 2:3—5. 12:27—31. 14:1—5. 2 Cor. 10:7—11.—He meant to show, in the strongest instances imaginable, that nothing could prove a man a true believer, who had not love. Some of the cases he states cannot be supposed to have ever existed.—Charity.] Rather, love, as the original truly means; 'charity' has now a more confined sense, but 'must here be taken in the noblest sense, for such a love to the whole church, and the whole world, as arises from principles of true piety, and ultimately centres in God.'—Love, which most directly transforms us into the image of God, and which shall continue to exert its influence, when faith is superseded by sight, and hope by enjoyment; when in his light we shall see light, and when, amidst the fullest communications of his love, we shall for ever love Him and each other, with ardors which the best hearts, in their best moments on earth, can neither attain nor conceive.' Doddr.

V. 4—7. The effects of 'love,' here enumerated, show that the apostle primarily intended those exercises of that holy affection, which respect mankind. Yet it is equally evident, that no natural benevolence, which subsists in an unbeliever's heart, can at all answer to the description which he has given. Indeed he evidently meant that love, which is 'the fruit of the Spirit' in the believer's heart, and by which especially 'faith worketh.' Gal. 5:1—6, v. 6, 22—26, v. 22. 1 Pet. 1:22. 1 John 3:13—15. 4:7, 8. The humble penitent, obtaining pardon and peace by faith in Christ, finds his self-confidence and his attachment to the world deprived of dominion, and greatly weakened; he is also taught to love the perfections, the holiness, and the cause of God; the person, truth, and precepts of Christ, and his image in his people; to love his neighbors, and even his enemies, after the example of Christ, and in obedience to his commands; and he now desires, that they should all be happy, and that God should be glorified in their salvation. This love, therefore, includes all parties, nations, and characters, in its expansive exercise; though still capable of more particular attachments. It regards both the temporal and eternal interests of mankind, and the external comfort, as well as spiritual advantage, of believers; and, in subordination to the love of God, it seeks to promote the benefit of mankind, and the nity, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to its private advantage. [For] it would not advance, or aggrandize, or enrich, or gratify itself, at the cost and damage of the public.

7. It tempers and restrains the passions; is not easily provoked,—exasperated. It corrects a sharpness of temper, sweetens and softens the mind, so that it does not suddenly conceive, nor long continue, a vehement passion. Charity will never be angry without a cause, and will endeavor to confine the passions within proper limits, that they do not exceed the measure that is just, either in degree or duration. Anger cannot rest in the bosom where love reigns. It is hard to be angry with those we love, but very easy to drop our resentments, and be reconciled.

8. Charity thinks no evil; cherishes no malice, nor gives way to revenge, so some. It is not soon, nor long angry; is never mischievous, nor inclined to revenge; does not suspect evil of others,—it does not (so the Gr.) reason out evil, charge guilt on them by inference and innuendo, when nothing of this sort appears open. True love is not apt to be jealous and suspicious; it will hide faults that appear, instead of hunting and raking out those that lie concealed; it will never indulge suspicion without proofs, but rather will incline to darken and disbelieve evidence against the person it affects. It will hardly give into an ill opinion of another, and will do it with regret and reluctance when the evidence cannot be resisted; hence it will never be forward to suspect ill, and reason itself into a bad opinion on mere appearances, or give way to suspicion without any. It will not make the worst construction of things, but put the best face that it can on circumstances that have no good appearance.

9. The matter of its joy and pleasure is here suggested: (1.) Negatively; It rejoiceth not in iniquity, takes no pleasure in doing injury or hurt to any; nor in the faults and failings of others. The sins of others are rather the grief of a charitable spirit, than its sport or delight; it is the very height of malice, to take pleasure in the misery of a fellow-creature. (2.) Affirmatively; It rejoiceth in the truth, [all truth,] is glad of the success of the Gospel, commonly called the truth, by way of emphasis, in the N. T.; and rejoices to see men moulded into an evangelical temper by it, and made good, do well, and approve themselves men of probity and integrity.

10. It beareth all things, it endureth all things. Some read the first, covers all things. So the original also signifies, 1 Pet. 4:8. Charity will draw a veil over the faults of others, as far as it can in consistence with duty. Thus we do by our own faults, and thus charity would teach us to do by the faults of others; and be faithful to God and to others. Or, it beareth all things; will pass by and put up with injuries, without indulging anger, or cherishing revenge; will be patient on provocation, and long patient, holds firm, though much shocked, and borne hard upon; sustains all manner of injury and ill usage, and bears up under it, and perseveres in this firmness. What a fortitude and firmness fervent love will give the mind! What cannot a lover endure for the beloved, and for his sake! How many slights and injuries will he put up with! How many hazards will he run, and how many difficulties encounter!

11. Charity believes and hopes well of others; believeth all things, hopeth all things. Indeed, charity does by no means destroy prudence, and, out of mere simplicity and silliness, believe every word, Prov. 14:17. Wisdom may dwell with love, and charity be cautious. But it is apt to believe well of all, to entertain a good opinion of them when there is no appearance to the contrary; nay, to believe well when there may be some dark appearances, if the evidence of ill be not clear. All charity is full of candor, will judge well, and believe well, as far as it can with any reason; and will rather stretch its faith beyond appearances for the support of a kind opinion; but it will go into a bad one with the utmost reluctance, and fence against it as much as it fairly and honestly can. And when, in spite of inclination, it cannot believe well of others, it will yet hope well, and continue to hope as long as there is any ground for it. How well-natured and amiable a thing is Christian charity! How lovely a mind is that which is tintured throughout with such benevolence, and has it diffused over its whole frame! Happy the man who has this heavenly fire glowing in his heart, flowing out of his mouth, and diffusing its warmth over all with whom he has to do! How lovely a thing would Christianity appear to the world, if those who profess it were more actuated and animated by this divine principle, and paid a due regard to a command on which its blessed Author laid a chief stress! A new commandment give I to you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. Jn. 13:34. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, v. 35. Blessed Jesus! let thy professed disciples be distinguished and marked out by this characteristic!

V. 8—13. Here the apostle goes on to commend charity, and show how much preferable it is to the gifts on which the Corinthians were so apt to pride themselves, to the utter neglect, and almost extinction, of charity. This he makes out,

1. From its longer continuance and duration; Charity never faileth; is permanent, perpetual, lasting as eternity; whereas the extraordinary gifts on which the Corinthians valued themselves, were only to edify the church on earth, and that not during its whole continuance in this world; but in heaven would be all superseded, which yet is the very seat and element of love. Prophecy must fail, i. e. either the prediction of things to come, (which is its most common sense,) or the interpretation of Scripture by immediate inspiration. Tongues will cease, i. e. the miraculous power of speaking languages without learning them. There will be but one language in heaven. And knowledge will

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—7. How are they deluded, who expect acceptance and reward, for those good works, which are as scanty in their degree, as they are corrupt and selfish in their principle! And how are even true Christians often fascinated, to overrate ostentatious eloquence, gifts, and abilities, and to undervalue honest, simple, and unadorned love, which seeks only to do them good!—But where does this heavenly love reside, which the apostle so warmly panegyrtizes? Is she returned to heaven, being wearied out with our contentions and selfishness on earth? Or does she dwell in some obscure retreat, at a distance from the disputes of the world, and of the church? Certainly she is but seldom seen among us; she has but few votaries and little influence; and is treated with strange neglect almost everywhere. Alas! numbers, who might be supposed 'to be somewhat,' if we only looked at their talents, knowledge, and zeal; appear to be 'nothing,' or very little, if 'love' be the touchstone of their characters.—Indeed, this ch. may be considered as an answer to all the wrangling pamphlets of angry disputers about religious truth, of different names and sentiments. Many of these seem incapable of long-suffering, or kindness, to any but their own party; so that envy, boasting, railing, ridicule, slander, and acrimony, are the prominent features of the portrait, which they exhibit to the view of the public! In the most unseemly manner, they sound their own praises; vent their own resentments; expose and triumph over their opponents; peace and prosperity of the church, as its grand objects. This love is the unequivocal evidence of regeneration; and it is a better touchstone of men's professed faith in Christ, than even the love of God; because its effects may more easily be examined and ascertained, and there is less danger of false affections in it. 1 John 3:16, 17. 4:20, 21. It was also that part of the Christian temper, in which the Corinthians were peculiarly defective; the apostle therefore selected this subject, to show them how low an estimate ought to be made of their religion, and so to abate their high opinion of themselves.—We must further observe, that he described 'love,' as a man would gald, by enumerating its properties, in the abstract. Wherever it subsisted, it had those properties, whether its quantity were small or great; and by this a man might estimate his own attainments in real religion. Some love might exist, where great remains of selfish passions obstructed its exercise; as a little gold may be mixed with a large alloy of base metal; but it would then become less conspicuous, and the man's state more doubtful.—It is obvious to every attentive reader, that, in this beautiful description of the properties and effects of love, the apostle meant to show the Corinthians, that their conduct had, in most particulars, been an entire contrast to it. Gal. 5:13—18. James 3:13—18.—He seems also, without intend-forget all decent regard to superiors; and turn religious investigation into a vainglorious, selfish, if not scurrilous, contest for victory! It is evident, that many of this character are 'easily provoked,' and hardly pacified; that they think evil of others, and rejoice in detecting the faults and follies of those who differ from them. In short, the attentive observer will perceive that every part of the apostle's definition of love forms a complete contrast to the conduct of great numbers, who, in different ages, have had numerous admirers for their zeal and ability, in contending for the sentiments or forms of their own sect or party.—But alas! we need far more 'love' than is generally possessed, to animadvert on such abuses, without being betrayed into a measure of imitation. Let us then rather inquire, whether this divine love inhabit and influence our hearts? .. If some sparks of this heavenly flame have been kindled in our hearts, we know there is much of a contrary nature, to counteract its efficacy. Here then is a call for watchfulness, diligence, and prayer; that our 'love may abound yet more and more, in knowledge, and in all judgment;' and that our selfish nature may be more entirely subdued and mortified. Phil. 1:9—11, v. 9. 1 Thes. 4:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3, 4. 1 Pet. 1:22, 23. Hence we shall also see still more our need of the cleansing blood of Christ; and shall learn to walk humbly before God, and to bear with others; as conscious that we need the patient forbearance both of the Lord and of our brethren. vanish away; knowledge to be had out of the common way; (see ch. 14: 6.) a knowledge of mysteries supernaturally communicated. Such knowledge was to vanish away. Some, indeed, understand it of common knowledge, acquired by instruction, taught and learnt. But it is plain, the apostle is here setting the grace of charity in opposition to supernatural gifts. And it is more valuable, because more durable; it shall last, when they shall be no more; it shall enter into heaven, where they will have no place, because they will be of no use; though, in a sense, even our common knowledge may be said to cease in heaven, by reason of the improvement that will then be made in it. V. 13. Faith cordially and practically receives the 'sure testimony of God,' concerning invisible things, appropriates his instruction, and thus welcomes his salvation, by looking to the divine Redeemer, and relying on Him, and the promises of God in Him. Jn. 3:27—36, vv. 35, 36, Heb. 11:1, 2, 1 Jn. 5:9—12. — Hope, with longing and patient waiting, expects the promised blessings, as to be perfected in eternal life; and thus it is the 'anchor of the soul,' keeping it steadfast in obedience, and patient waiting, amidst every kind of opposition and discouragement. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 Jn. 3:1—3. And love to God, and to mankind for his sake, as before described, is the active principle of all those willing services, in which the Christian does good to others, according to the will of God. 'These three abide,' and must abide, as essential to godliness, under every dispensation, and in every age; whatever other changes take place; but 'the greatest of these is heard even by apostles and inspired men! How much short do others come of them! But these gifts were fitted to the present imperfect state of the church, valuable in themselves, but not to be compared with charity, because they were to vanish with the imperfections of the church, nay, and long before, whereas charity was to last for ever.

3. He takes occasion hence, to show how much better it will be with the church hereafter, than it can be here. A state of perfection is in view, v. 10. When the end is once attained, the means will of course be abolished. There will be no need of tongues, and prophecy, and inspired knowledge, in a future life, because then the church will be in a state of perfection, complete both in knowledge and holiness. The difference between these two states is here pointed at in two particulars; (1.) The present state is a state of childhood, the future that of manhood, v. 11. Such is the difference between earth and heaven. What narrow views, what confused and indistinct notions of things, have children, in comparison of grown men! And how naturally do men, when reason is ripened and matured, despise and relinquish their infant thoughts, put them away, reject them, esteem them as nothing! Thus shall we think of our most valued gifts and acquisitions in this world, when we come to heaven. (2.) Things are all dark and confused now, in comparison of what they will be hereafter, v. 12. Now we can only discern things at a great distance, as through a telescope, and that involved in clouds and obscurity; but hereafter the things to be known will be near and obvious, open to our eyes; and our knowledge will be free from all obscurity and error. 1 Jn. 3:2. We shall know how we are known, entering into all the mysteries of divine love and grace. O glorious change! To pass from darkness to light, from clouds to the clear sunshine of our Savior's face, and in God's own light to see light! Ps. 36:9. It is the light of heaven only, that will remove all clouds and darkness from the face of God. It is at best but twilight while we are in this world; there it will be perfect and eternal day.

4. To sum up the excellences of charity, he prefers it not only to gifts, but to other graces, to faith and hope, v. 13. True grace is much more excellent than any spiritual gifts whatever. And faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces, of which charity is the chief, being the end to which the other two are but means. This is the divine nature, the soul's felicity, or it is complacential rest in God, and holy delight in all his saints. And it is everlasting work, when faith and hope shall be no more. Faith fixes on the divine revelation, and assents to that; hope fastens on future felicity, and waits for that; and in heaven, faith will be swallowed up of vision, and hope in fruition. There is no room to believe and hope, when we see and enjoy. But love fastens on the divine perfections themselves, and the divine image on the creatures, and our mutual relation both to God and them. These will all shine forth in the most glorious splendor in another world, and there will love be made perfect; there we shall perfectly love God, because He will appear perfectly amiable for ever, and our hearts will kindle at the sight, and glow with perpetual devotion. And there shall we perfectly love one another, when all the saints meet there, when none but saints are there, and saints made perfect. O blessed state! How much surpassing the best below! O amiable and excellent grace of charity! How much does it exceed the most valuable gift, when it outshines every grace, and is the everlasting consummation of them! When faith and hope are at an end, true charity will burn for ever, with the brightest flame. Note, They border most on the heavenly state and perfection, whose hearts are fullest of this divine principle; and burn with the most fervent charity. It is the surest offspring of God, and bears his fairest impression. For God is Love, 1 Jn. 4:8, 16. And where God is to be seen as He is, and face to face, there charity is in its greatest height; there, and there only, will it be perfected.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. The apostle, in the foregoing ch., had himself preferred, and advised the Corinthians to prefer, Christian charity to all spiritual gifts. Here he teaches them, among spiritual gifts, which they should prefer, and by what rules they should make comparison. He begins,

I. With an exhortation to charity, v. 1. The original, for follow after, here, when spoken of a thing, signifies a singular concern to obtain it; and is commonly taken in a good and laudable sense. It is an ex-converted state; for so we now clearly see them to have been; let us learn to value things according to their intrinsic worth; and not, as children, admire all that glitters, whether it be gold or tinsel; let us cease from our childish pursuits about externals and non-essentials; that we may value and seek an increase of faith, hope, and love from the Giver of all good gifts; and while we contend, that 'faith alone justifies' the sinner, by forming his relation to the Savior; and that hope only can support the soul, amidst all the trials of life and death; let us remember, that love is still greater than these most needful graces, being the evidence of our title to eternal life, the meetness for that holy and unspeakable felicity, and the blessed earnest and beginning of it. SCOTT.

love.' Not that love can do the office of faith, in justifying the sinner, or do anything towards it; any more than the eye can perform the function of the ear; nor can this 'love' be found in any man, who is not partaker of faith and hope. But faith and hope are the means, or the intermediate nets of the mind, by which a proud, selfish, carnal, condemned criminal, is brought to love a reconciled God, and to love men in general, and Christians in particular, for his sake. Faith and hope are only requisite for us, as sinners, in this imperfect state; but perfect love will flourish for ever, as the business, element, joy, and glory of heaven itself; uniting God and all holy creatures in the most perfect harmony and felicity, without the least alloy of any contrary principle, through all the ages of eternity. Mk. 12:23—34. Rom. 13:8—10. Gal. 5:1—6, 22—26. 1 Jn. 4:7—12. Sc.

(13.) 'Faith, Hope, and Charity, these three together exist in the present scene only; but in the future world, Faith and Hope will be done away, and therefore the greatest of these is Charity.' Bl. But in the heavenly state is there not a continued exercise of faith and confidence in the continuance of God's power, goodness, &c.; and we cannot conceive of happiness in which there shall not be a pleasing anticipation or hope of its increase and continuance. ED.

NOTES. CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. By 'the gift of prophesying,' the apostle seems to have intended, an immediate communication from the Spirit of God, concerning the meaning of the Holy Scriptures, or some point of doctrine or practice, in which the church or individuals wanted instruction at the time. This was a gift bestowed on several, by which they became occasional or extraordinary teachers in the church; and it appears to have been generally accompanied by the power of predicting future events, when circumstances required it. 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 20.

2 For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue, <sup>b</sup> speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for <sup>c</sup> no man <sup>d</sup> understandeth him; howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries.

3 But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort.

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church.

5 I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive <sup>e</sup> edifying.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by <sup>f</sup> revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?

7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the <sup>g</sup> sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

8 For if the trumpet <sup>h</sup> give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?

9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words <sup>i</sup> easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air.

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification.

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a <sup>j</sup> barbarian; and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.

12 Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of <sup>k</sup> spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret.

It seems, that, for a person who spake with tongues to be also endued with the gift, of interpreting his discourse into the language understood by his hearers, that so the church might be edified by what he spake, was not generally the case. Or perhaps, to counterpoise a gift, which was so much calculated to elate the possessors, he might be left incapable of giving utterance, with propriety, perspicuity, or promptitude, suited to a public assembly, even in his native tongue, to those divine truths which he spake fluently in another language, under the influence of the Holy Spirit; and another man might be miraculously enabled to understand, and interpret into the language of the audience, what was thus spoken, who yet himself might be unable to speak fluently, in the language which he interpreted. Even in ordinary cases, clearly understanding a language, and being able to speak fluently in it, are very distinct attainments.—'Why was the gift of tongues conferred? That the mysteries of God might be openly made known to more people and nations. Then surely, prophecy, to which the gift of tongues was intended to be subservient, must be of superior excellency.' Beza. 'This, therefore, was a great abuse of this gift, that when they had a mystery revealed to them, they did not utter it in a language understood by the assembly, but only by themselves; and so they did not edify the church by it, though it was given, as all the other gifts were, for edification. (12:7.)' Whitby.—(1) Follow after.] Pursue love. Heb. 12:14. 'The word diokete properly signifies, to pursue with an eagerness, like that with which hunters follow their game. And it may be intended to intimate, how hard it is to obtain, and preserve, a truly benevolent spirit in the main series of life; considering on the one hand the many provocations we are like to meet with, and on the other, the force of self-love, which will, in so many instances, be ready to break in upon it.' Doddridge. SCOTT.

(1.) 'Yet seek after and studiously cultivate . . . but chiefly.' B.
V. 6—12. 'At this day, among the papists, they are used, in their sermons, always to quote the sacred Scriptures in Latin, without adhortation to get this excellent disposition of charity on any terms, whatever pains or prayers it may cost.

II. He directs them which spiritual gift to prefer, from a principle of charity; 'Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy, or chiefly that you may prophesy. While they made charity their chief scope, they might be zealous of spiritual gifts, but especially of prophesying, i. e. of interpreting Scripture. This preference would most plainly discover that they were indeed on such pursuit, and intent upon it.

III. He assigns the reasons of this preference. And it is remarkable here, that he only compares prophesying with speaking with tongues, the gift on which the Corinthians principally valued themselves. This was more ostentatious than the plain interpretation of Scripture; more fit to gratify pride, but less fit to pursue the purposes of Christian charity; it would not equally edify, or do good to, the souls of men. For,

1. He that spake with tongues, must wholly speak between God and himself; none of his own countrymen could understand him, v. 2. Note, What cannot be understood, can never edify; but he that prophesies, speaks to the advantage of his hearers; they may profit by his gift. Interpretation of Scripture will be for their edification; they may be exhorted and comforted by it, v. 3. And indeed these two must go together. Duty is the proper way to comfort; and they that would be comforted, must bear being exhorted.

2. He that speaks with tongues, may edify himself, v. 4. so every minister should do; and he that is most edified himself, is in the disposition and fitness to do good to others; but he that speaks with tongues, or language unknown, can only edify himself; others can reap no benefit from his speech. Whereas the end of speaking in the church is to edify the church, v. 4. to which prophesying, or interpreting Scripture by inspiration, or otherwise, is immediately adapted. Such is prophesying, or preaching, and interpreting Scripture, compared with speaking in an unknown tongue.

Indeed, no gift is to be despised, but the best are to be preferred. I could wish, says the apostle, that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied, v. 5. Every gift of God is a favor from God, and may be improved for his glory, and as such is to be valued and thankfully received; but then those are to be most valued, that are most useful, v. 5. Benevolence makes a man truly great. It is more blessed to give than to receive. And it is true magnanimity to study and seek to be useful to others, rather than to raise their admiration, and draw their esteem. Such a man has a large soul, copious and diffused, in proportion to his benevolence, and bent of mind for public good. Greater is he who interprets Scripture to edify the church, than he who speaks tongues to recommend himself. And what other end he who spake with tongues could have, unless he interpreted what he spake, is not easy to see. Note, That makes most for the honor of a minister, which is most for the church's edification, not that which shows his gifts to most advantage. He acts in a narrow sphere, while he aims at himself; but his spirit and character increase in proportion to his usefulness, I mean his own intention and endeavors to be useful.

V. 6—14. In this paragraph he goes on to show, how vain a thing that ostentation of speaking unknown and unintelligible language must be. It was altogether unedifying and unprofitable, v. 6. Unintelligible language is like piping or harping, without distinction of sounds; it gives no more direction how a man should order his conversation, than a pipe with but one stop, or a harp with but one string, can direct a dancer how he should order his steps, v. 7. Or, it is like a trumpet giving an uncertain sound, a sound not manifest; either not the proper sound for the purpose, or not distinct enough to be discerned from every other sound. To speak words that have no signification to those who hear them, is to leave them ignorant of what is spoken; it is speaking to the air, v. 9. He compares the speaking in an unknown tongue to the gibberish of barbarians, v. 10. Whatever proper signification the words of any language may have in themselves, and to those who understand them, they are perfect gibberish to men of another language, who understand them not, v. 11.

The apostle, having thus established his point, in the next two vs. applies it; 1. By advising them to be chiefly desirous of those gifts that were most for the church's edification, v. 12. This is the great rule he gives; which, 2. He applies to the matter in hand, that, if they did speak a foreign language, they should beg of God the gift of interpreting it, v. 13. That these were different gifts, see ch. 12:10. Let him therefore pray for the gift of interpreting what he speaks in an unknown tongue; or rather covet, and ask of God, the gift of interpreting, than of speaking in a language that needs interpretation; this being most for the church's benefit, and therefore among the gifts that excel, v. 12. They should perform all religious exercises in their assemblies so, that all might join in them, and profit by them. 3. He enforces this advice with a proper reason, that, if he prayed in an unknown tongue, his spirit might pray, i. e. a

(6.) Revelation, &c.] Doddr. and Locke despair of the true sense. Mackn. paraphrases, 'revelation peculiar to an apostle; or by the word of knowledge, the gift of a superior prophet; or by prophecy, the inspiration proper to an inferior prophet; or by doctrine, the inspiration proper to an ordinary pastor.' This Bloomf. rather prefers to others, objecting, however, to 'peculiar,' 'superior,' and 'inferior,' as groundless. He suggests the omission of the particle ē ('or') after speak, (which is supported by several MSS., the Syr., and some Lat. verss., Theoph., and Phot.) and proposes, 'Unless I shall speak distinctly, and with an interpretation of what I say, whether that speech be in the way of [knowledge] gnōsis (12:3.), [prophecy] prophēteia (12:10.), [doctrine] didaskē. (12:28.)'

(7.) And even.] 'So the Vulg., and there is not a more manifest mistake in their whole tr. than our Eng. trs. have here made: homōs (it should be read without the accent) means likewise, as the Gr. contrs. tr. (8.) 'The ancients used wind instruments not merely to direct the steps in marching, but also (and especially the trumpet) to signify to the soldiers what they were to do, whether to advance, or retreat, take to arms, or go to quarters; in fact to do all that is now done by the trumpets, flutes, drums. V. 13—19. Had the apostle lived about the era of the Reformation, 14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth; but my understanding is unfruitful.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing <sup>m</sup> with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding <sup>n</sup> also.

16 Else, when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that oocupieth the room of the unlearned, say Amen, at thy giving of <sup>o</sup> thanks? seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest.

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified.

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all:

19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

20 Brethren, be not <sup>p</sup> children in understanding: howbeit in malice be <sup>q</sup> ye children, but in understanding be <sup>r</sup> men.

21 In the law 'it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a <sup>v</sup> sign, not to them <sup>w</sup> that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

spiritual gift might be exercised in prayer, or his own mind might be devoutly engaged, but his understanding would be unfruitful, v. 14. i. e. the sense and meaning of his words would be unfruitful; he would not be understood, nor therefore would others join in his devotions. It should be the concern of such as pray in public, to pray intelligibly, not in a foreign language, nor in a language above the level of the audience. Language that is most obvious and easy to be understood, is the most proper for devotions, and other religious exercises.

V. 15-20. The apostle here sums up the argument hitherto, and,

I. Directs them how they should sing and pray in public, v. 15. He does not forbid their praying or singing under a divine afflatus, or when they were inspired for this purpose, or had such a spiritual gift communicated to them; but he would have them perform both, so as to be understood by others, that others might join with them. Public worship should be performed so as to be understood.

II. He enforces the argument with several reasons:

1. That otherwise the unlearned could not join in the worship, for they did not understand it, v. 16. He who occupies the place of the unlearned, i. e. as the ancients interpret it, the body of the people, who, in most Christian assemblies, are illiterate, how should they declare their consent and concurrence? i. e. say Amen, So be it. God grant the thing we have requested! All should say Amen, inwardly; and it is not improper to do it audibly, as the ancient Christians did. See Just. Mart. apol. 2. near the end. Now, how should the people say Amen to what they did not understand? Note, There can be no concurrence in those prayers that are not understood. The intention of public devotions is, therefore, entirely destroyed, if they be performed in an unknown tongue. He who performs, may pray well, and give thanks well, but not in that time and place, because others are not, cannot be, edified, v. 17. by what they understand not.

2. He alleges his own example, to make the greater impression. Concerning which, observe, (1.) He did not come behind any of them in this spiritual gift, v. 18. It was not envy at their better furniture, that made Paul depreciate what they so highly valued; such a spirit of envy is too common in the world. But he took care to guard against this misconstruction of his purpose, by letting them know, there was more ground for them to envy him on this head, than for him to envy them. Note, When we beat down men's unreasonable value for themselves, or any of their possessions or attainments, we should let them see, if possible, that this does not proceed from an envious and grudging spirit, else we miss our aim. So Paul did. He spake more languages than they all. Yet, (2.) He had rather speak five words with understanding, i. e. so as to be understood, and instruct and edify others, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue, v. 19. A truly Christian minister will value himself much more on doing the least spiritual good to men's souls, than on procuring the greatest applause and commendation to himself. This is true grandeur and nobleness of spirit; it is acting up to his character; it is approving himself the servant of Christ, and not a vassal to his own pride and vanity.

3. He adds a plain intimation, that the fondness they discovered for this gift, was but too clear an indication of the immaturity of their judgment, v. 20. Children are apt to be struck with novelty, and strange appearances. Do not you act like them; show a riper judgment, and act a more manly part; be like children in nothing but an innocent and inoffensive disposition. A double rebuke is couched in this passage, both of their pride on account of their gifts, and their arrogance and haughtiness towards each other, and the contests and quarrels proceeding from them. Note, Christians should be harmless and inoffensive as children, but should have wisdom and knowledge ripe and mature. They should not be unskilful in the word of righteousness, Heb. 5: 13. though unskilful in all the arts of mischief.

V. 21-25. In this passage, pursuing the argument, he reasons from other topics; as,

1. Tongues, as the Corinthians used them, were rather a token of judgment from God, than mercy to any people, v. 21. Is. 28:11. Comp. Deut. 28:46, 49. To both these places, it is thought, the apostle refers. Both are delivered by way of threatening, and one is supposed to interpret the other. The meaning in this view, is, that it is an evidence that a people are abandoned of God, when He gives them up to this sort of instruction, to the discipline of those who speak in another language. And should Christians covet to be in such a state, or bring the churches into it? Yet thus did the Corinthian preachers in effect, who would always deliver their inspirations in an unknown tongue.

2. Tongues were rather a sign to unbelievers than to believers, v. 22. The gift and written expressly against the church of Rome, he could not more emphatically have exposed the absurdity, and wickedness, of worshipping God, and performing all public services in Latin, of which the common people understand not one word. No wonder the rulers of that church lock up the Scriptures, also, in an unknown tongue, seeing they must otherwise bear too evident a testimony against them. — (15) With the understanding. That is, say most commentators, so as to be understood. This, indeed, is implied, and principally intended; yet an example of such an use of the words cannot easily be adduced. But might not the apostle mean, that they, who spoke publicly in a language not understood by the auditors, however fervent their affections, or excellent their gifts might be, seemed to act like men without understanding, or who made no use of their understanding, seeing no man, however irrational and enthusiastical, could act more evidently against the plain dictates of sober reason and sound judgment?—Does not the apostle's argument about prayer, without any preconceived form, fully show, that if any one prayed, or gave thanks, in a language understood by the congregation, the people might, if nothing else prevented, cordially say Amen to his words? And does not this remark sufficiently answer many common objections and arguments against prayer of this kind? It, however, by no means decides, whether that, or a liturgy, as to public worship, is most conducive to general edification, in the present state of the church. [See B. Jenks's 'Liberty of Prayer.']

(14.) Spirit . . . understanding. Pneuma . . . nous: 'my mind prayeth, (I understand what I am praying,) but my meaning (the meaning of my words) does not profit another, who understands not that foreign language.' Ros., Bl. Perhaps here is an intimation of what is now clearly seen by philosophers, viz. the distinction between what is technically called 'the sentiments,' or 'affective faculties,' and 'the intellectual,' or 'perceptive and reflective faculties,'—at least, teachers, moral, political, social, and religious, and parental, would do well to bear in mind, that feeling without intelligence, confidence instead of conviction, blind impulse instead of reasoning knowledge, is not only a cause of bigotry, intolerance, and persecution in religion, as well as censoriousness, and tyranny in domestic life, but, in our state of national half-education, allows the ruinous triumphs of uncharitableness, sectarianism, party-zcal, and mobs, over brotherly forbearance, piety, national happiness, truth, and law. And how, in God's worship, can a blind, impulsive sentiment, excited by external solemnities and pomps, the tones of an organ, or the vagaries of imagination, be more acceptable to the Pure Intelligence, than the unguided, unreasoning devotions of the idolater and fanatic, or the necessary actions of a brute?

(15.) The best to be done is, to ask of God, in prayer, to be enabled to pray with the Spirit, &c., and to pray with meaning. See Bl. and Mackn.—Sing. [Psalm: here, as in Rom. 15:19. Eph. 5:19. and elsewhere, psallein signifies, to celebrate the divine praises in verse; (see Jas. 5:13. where proseuchetai and psalleto, are, as here, antithetical;) whether always in a regular hymn, is not clear. I conceive it was, in general, only a composition, in such poetic numbers as would admit of being adapted to music, though I imagine it was often only recited. This, indeed, would especially appear from the passage of Ja. We may also collect from the term psallein, here employed (especially in comparison with its use in other parts of the SS.), and also eulogēsēs [bless], just after, that the subject of the speeches of those who had the gift of tongues, was usually prayers to, and praises of God, either in hymns, or in that sort of style, half prose and half poetry, so characteristic of the genius of oriental writing.]

(16.) Unlearned. Note, Acts 4:13. 'It also denotes hearers, in distinction from teachers, and the supernaturally gifted.' Mackn. Ed.

(18.) 'Paul had this great variety of languages given him by inspiration, that he might be able immediately to preach the Gospel to all nations, without spending the time in learning their languages. But it was a knowledge for common use, enabling him to deliver the doctrines of the Gospel clearly and properly; and not such a knowledge of these languages as prevented him, in speaking and writing, from mixing foreign idioms with them, especially the idioms of his mother tongue. An attention to such trifles was below the grandeur and importance of the work in which he was engaged, and tended to no solid use; these foreign idioms being often more expressive and emphatical than the correspondent classical phrases.'

V. 20-25. These repeated intimations of the ignorance and childish conduct of the Corinthians, who were evidently in no small degree disposed to self-wisdom, are well worthy of notice. 4:8.—(21) With men, &c. Not taken from the Sept., from which it varies as much as any words can differ from others, where the general meaning is similar. It far more accords to the Heb.; and may be considered as taken from it;

23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad?

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so, falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying.

27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret.

28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church; and let him speak to himself, and to God.

29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace.

31 For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted.

32 And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

33 For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints.

34 Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law.

of tongues was necessary to spread Christianity, and gather churches; it was proper and intended to convince unbelievers of that doctrine which Christians had already embraced; but prophesying, and interpreting Scripture in their own language, were most for the edification of such as did already believe: so that speaking with tongues in Christian assemblies was altogether out of time and place; neither one nor the other was proper for it.

3. The credit and reputation of their assemblies among unbelievers, required them to prefer prophesying before speaking with tongues. For, (1.) If, when assembled for Christian worship, all employed should talk unintelligible language, and infidels should drop in, they would conclude them to be no better than a parcel of wild fanatics. Who in their right senses could carry on religious worship in such a manner? Or what sort of religion is that which leaves out sense and understanding? Note, Christian religion is a sober and reasonable thing in itself, and should not, by the ministers of it, be made to look wild or senseless. But, on the other hand, (2.) If instead of speaking with tongues, those who minister plainly interpret Scripture, or preach, in language intelligible and proper, the great truths and rules of the Gospel, a heathen or unlearned person, coming in, would probably be convinced, and become a convert to Christianity, v. 24, 25. Scripture-truth, plainly and duly taught, has a marvellous aptness to awaken the conscience, and touch the heart. Religious exercises in Christian assemblies should be such as are fit to edify the faithful, and convince, affect, and convert unbelievers. The ministry was not instituted to make ostentation of gifts and parts, but to save souls.

V. 26—33.1. He blames them for the confusion they introduced into the assembly, by ostentation of their gifts, v. 26. i. e. either, 'You are apt to confound the several parts of worship; and while one has a psalm to utter by inspiration, another has a doctrine, or revelation;' or else, 'You are apt to be confused in the same branch of worship, many of you having psalms or doctrines to propose at the same time, without staying for one another. Is not this perfect uproar? Can this be edifying? And yet, all religious exercises in public assemblies should be done to edifying.'

2. He corrects their faults, and lays down some regulations for their future conduct. As, (1.) To speaking in an unknown tongue, he orders, that no more than two or three should do it at one meeting, and this not altogether, nor come at all, unless there were some one to interpret, v. 27, 28. some other beside himself, who spake; for to speak in an unknown tongue, what himself was afterward to interpret, could only be for ostentation. If therefore there were none to interpret, he was to be silent, and only exercise his gift between God and himself, v. 28. i. e. (as I think,) in private, at home; for all who are present at public worship, should join in it, and not be at their private devotions in public assemblies. (2.) As to prophesying, he orders, [1.] That two or three only should speak at one meeting, v. 20. and this successively, not all at once; and the other should examine and judge what he delivered, i. e. discern and determine concerning it, whether it were of divine inspiration or not. There might be false prophets, mere pretenders; and the true prophets were to judge of these, and discern and discover who was divinely inspired, and by such inspiration interpreted Scripture, and taught the church, and who was not; what was of divine inspiration, and what was not. This seems to be the meaning of this rule. [2.] He orders, that, if any assistant prophet had a revelation, while another was prophesying, the other should hold his peace, v. 30. before the inspired assistant uttered his revelation. Indeed, it is by many understood, that the former speaker should immediately hold his peace. But this seems unnatural, and not so well to agree with the context. Nor is it more agreeable to the context, and the reason annexed, v. 31. That all might prophesy, one by one, or one after another; which could not be, where any one was interrupted and silenced before he had done prophesying; but might easily be, if he, who was afterward inspired, forbore to deliver his new revelation, till the former prophet had finished what he had to say. And to confirm this sense, the apostle quickly adds, The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets, v. 33. i. e. the spiritual gifts they have, leave them still possessed of their reason, and capable of using their own judgment in the exercise of them. The man inspired by the Spirit of God, may still act the man, and observe the rules of natural order and decency in delivering his revelations. His spiritual gift is thus far subject to his pleasure, and to be managed by his discretion.

3. The apostle gives the reasons of these regulations. As, (1.) That they would be for the church's benefit, their instruction and consolation, v. 31. The instruction, edification, and comfort, of the church, is that for which God instituted the ministry. And surely ministers should, as much as possible, fit their ministrations to these purposes. (2.) He tells them, God is not the God of confusion, but of peace and good order, v. 33. therefore divine inspirations should by no means break through all rules of common decency; which yet would be unavoidable, if several inspired men should all at once utter what was suggested to them by the Spirit of God, and not wait to take their turns. The honor of God requires, that things should be so managed in Christian assemblies, as not to transgress the rules of natural decency, and no unlovely or dishonorable notion of God be formed in the minds of observers. (3.) He adds, that things were thus orderly managed in all the other churches, v. 33. which was a manifest proof that the church of Corinth might observe the same regulations. And it would be perfectly scandalous for them, who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, to be more disorderly than any in their exercise.

V. 34, 35. Here the apostle, 1. Enjoins silence on their women in public assemblies, and to such a degree, that they must not ask questions for their own information in the church, but ask their husbands at home, v. 34. 1 Tim. 2:11, 12. See on ch. 11:5. They are not permitted to speak in the church, neither in praying nor

V. 34, 35. To reconcile these vs. with 11:2—16. it seems most natural to suppose, that some of the Corinthian women were used to speak publicly, when not under any immediate or extraordinary impulse of the Holy Spirit; and perhaps they interrupted the other speakers, by inquiries or objections, according to the disputations spirit which prevailed. The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a general rule, (to which the foregoing case was the only exception,) that women must not be allowed to speak in the public congregation, or to assume the office of teachers, or disputants; for this by no means consisted with that subjection to their husbands, which the law of God inculcated. SCOTT.

(34, 35.) 'The Gr. here for women (gunaikes) properly signifies wives, matrons; as appears from v. 35. That virgins should speak, the apostle did not (I conceive) contemplate the possibility; and, indeed, conprophesying. The connexion seems plainly to include the last, in the limited sense in which it is taken in this ch., i. e. for preaching, or interpreting Scripture by inspiration. And indeed, for a woman to prophesy in this sense, were to teach, which does not so well befit her state of subjection. But praying, and uttering hymns inspired, were not teaching. And seeing there were women who had spiritual gifts of this sort in that age of the church, see Acts, 12:9. and might be under this impulse in the assembly, must they altogether suppress it? Or why should they have this gift, if it must never be publicly exercised? For these reasons, some think, that these general prohibitions are only to be understood in common cases; but that on extraordinary occasions, when women were under a divine afflatus, and known to be so, they might have liberty of speech. Note, As it is the woman's duty to learn in subjection, it is the man's duty to keep up his superiority, by being able to instruct her: if it be her duty to ask her husband at home, it is his concern and duty to endeavor at least to be able to answer her inquiries; if it be a shame for her to speak in the church, where she should be silent, it is a shame for him to be silent when he should speak, and not be able to give an answer, when she asks him at home.

2. We have here the reason of this injunction,—God's law and commandment, v. 34. Woman is placed in subordination to the man; and it is a shame for her to do anything that looks like an affectation of changing ranks: so the apostle concludes, she should not speak in the church, in the assembly. Shame is the mind's uneasy reflection on having done an indecent thing. And what more indecent, than for a woman to quit her rank, renounce the subordination of her sex, or do what, in common account, had such aspect and appearance? Note, Our spirit and conduct should be suitable to our rank. The natural distinctions God has made, we should observe. The woman was made subject to the man, and she should keep her station, and be content with it. For this reason, they must be silent in the churches, not set up for teachers; for this is setting up for superiority over the man.

V. 36—40. He closes his argument, 1. With a just rebuke of the Corinthians, for their extravagant pride and self-conceit. Now, says he, to beat down this arrogant humor, 'Did Christianity come out of Corinth; was its original among you? Or, if not, is it now limited and confined to you; are you the only church favored with divine revelations, that you will depart from the decent usages of all other churches; and, to make ostentation of your spiritual gifts, bring confusion into Christian assemblies? How intolerably assuming is this behavior! Pray bethink yourselves.' Note, They must PRACT. OBS. All our pursuits should spring from 'love,' as the grand motive; and all public ordinances should be conducted in that manner, which most conduces to the edification, exhortation, animation to duty, and consolation under afflictions, of believers; and to the conversion of sinners. Even fervent, spiritual affections must be governed by the sober exercise of the understanding; or else, with the best intentions, men will run into great extravagances, and disgrace the truth which they mean to promote.—While we most reasonably exclaim against prayers and worship in an unknown tongue, and thank God for emancipating us from so absurd an imposition, we should inquire, whether some, who speak in the language of their native country, do not so affect elegant phrases, sonorous words, or words adopted from other languages, and learned discussions, as to render themselves unintelligible to the common people; and, whether this be not quite as irrational, as preaching to Britons in Greek or Latin would be.—But if we speak in plain, simple, and perspicuous language, which even children may understand, (and this does not imply coarseness and vulgarity;) we may be sure, that the more intelligent part of our audience will be edified, if disposed to receive instruction.—Whether we pour out our prayers, sing the praises of God, or thank Him for his mercies, we should be careful to unite spiritual affections with sober judgment; and they, who lead in social worship, should use such language, as may affect and instruct the meanest fellow-worshipper, and enable him to add his cordial 'Amen' to what is spoken.—Though the conducting of public worship ought to be peculiarly directed to the edification of believers, and of the congregation, yet provision should also be made for those unbelievers, or curious strangers, who may come among us, even as spies, to make remarks; nor should anything be admitted which may reasonably excite their disgust, or needlessly confirm their prejudices. This has not been in any measure sufficiently attended to; and many things have been said and done, without warrant from Scripture, nay, contrary to its plain import, and the gravity and discretion which it inculcates; and this even by good men, who have sent away occasional hearers riveted in their prejudices against the truth, and disposed to ridicule it in every company; so that the mischief, thus done, is incalculable. But when the Word of God is soberly spoken, with an address both to the understanding and the affections, and with an authoritative application to the conscience, occasional hearers are often unexpectedly impressed; being judged, convinced, and arraigned by what they hear.—When professors of evangelical doctrine, who imagine themselves qualified and called to be teachers, are so full of their subject, that they cannot refrain from speaking, however unadvised or irregular their conduct may be, it is evident that they are more influenced by self-sufficiency and ambition, or by enthusiastic impressions, than by humble zeal and love. For the Spirit of God moves the will and affections, in a manner consistent with the exercise of sober reason and discretion. But if men will remain ignorant of such things, after proper instruction and warning, it is not advisable to be always debating with them.—However valuable miraculous gifts were in the primitive church, we cannot well read this epistle without cheerfully acquiescing in the will of God, as to his withholding them from us. Man's heart is so prone to pride, ostentation, and folly, that even endowments, of this kind, were made occasions of grievous sins and offences! Our vainglory is sufficiently excited by inferior and ordinary gifts or abilities; and this often militates greatly against our usefulness and peace; and requires many painful and distressing remedies, to prevent its more fatal effects. 2 Cor. 12:1—10. considering Grecian customs, and how studiously unmarried females were secluded, (Eurip. Phœn. 8, 8. Synes. 105. D. Thucyd. 2, 44. Plut. 2, 220.) they seldom attended.—The Gr. means, keep silence altogether, not only refraining from teaching, but interrogating; the former of which is expressly forbidden in this v. and the latter indirectly in the next. Schoett. shows, that among the Jews it was strictly forbidden for a woman even to ask questions; says R. Eliezer, "let the words of the law be burnt up, rather than delivered to women;" "women ought to know nothing except the distaff;" see Bammidbar rabba. Schoett. also shows, (on Lu. 2:46.) that they were admitted to the schools of the Rabbins, but only to hear, not to propound questions. The Rabbins, too, forbade them to lead in the synagogue-singing. All which was quite agreeable to the customs of the Greeks also: see Grot. and Wets., the most important of whose citations are Plaut. "a silent, is better than a talking woman." Val. Max. "what have women to do with the assembly? if our country's custom is kept up, nothing?" Eurip.—Is not permitted.] The pret. pass. is here put (by a common idiom, especially in commanding) for the pres. in its indefinite sense. The reading which has this pres. (adopted by Pearce, &c.) is a mere gloss.

The words, it is not permitted to them (women) to speak, are, I think, meant to further explain Paul's meaning in the preceding words, let them keep silence in the churches [or assemblies]. Many moderns (as Grot., Locke, Doddr., and Benson) think it wholly forbids women to speak at all in the congregation; and to reconcile this with the seeming permission at 11:5, &c. they suppose them forbidden only when they had no supernatural impulse and divine revelation: [and indeed would it not have been arrogant impiety to forbid their speaking when under a real impulse of this kind? A ghostly domineering over the female conscience, should be avoided. Ed.] But (as Mackn. justly) "P. had been all along speaking of inspired teaching and preaching, and, after directions for the orderly exercise of these gifts, subjoins this order respecting the women: the prohibition, therefore, standing in this connexion, implies, that the Corinthian women were not to pray and prophesy in the church, as teachers, on pretence of being inspired, and unable to restrain the motions of the Spirit. Besides, the reasons mentioned by P., show the prohibition was absolute and general. Christ had not permitted women to speak in the church as teachers of the men; neither had the law of Moses; for it commanded them to be in subjection to the men. He plainly tells them, that whatever inspirations of the Spirit they might be favored with, no inspiration was given them to enable them to teach publicly, or lead the devotion of the church." Mackn. further argues, that P. did not prohibit the women from speaking in the church, in ch. 11. because his sole object there was to correct the abuse of their officiating with the head uncovered, reserving his correction of the other abuse to this place: and so Whit. And others think in ch. 11. P. only intended to say how they should speak, if they spoke at all, but here absolutely to forbid. But (as Doddr.) we can hardly suppose P. would debate and adjust the circumstances of doing an unlawful action, and (as Slade) "so far expose himself to the danger of being misunderstood, as to condemn the manner of doing what was wrong, without giving, at the same time, the slightest intimation of its impropriety." Upon the whole (as far as I can presume to pronounce on so nice and intricate a question), the salvo, or exception, propounded by Grot., Locke, &c. seems too refined and limited; and, besides, leaves an opening to other objections and difficulties. And that P. would, at one time, indirectly permit what at another he absolutely forbids, nothing but necessity will induce me to admit. [But comp. 7:9, &c. Ed.] Yet here there is none. Our learned countrymen have not enough attended to the sense of lalein [tr. speak], which in the N. T. almost invariably signifies, not to speak, but to talk, discourse, and teach. See numerous examples in Schl. Lex. To reconcile, therefore, the two passages, we have only to suppose, that in the former, he means that sort of prayer and propheteia that should not jeal the devotions of the congregation. Surely the proseuchesthai may there very well denote, only joining in prayer; not taking the lead in it; much less are we compelled, with Slade, to suppose inspired prayer: and prophētēnesthai may be understood of the recitation of certain spiritual songs, (whether in reading or extemporaneously,) or the reading of devotional and edifying compositions in prose; on all which I have treated in the note on 11:5. Now this would not be any violation of Paul's order, for the woman to be in subordination.

Slade would suppose 11:5, &c. to refer to smaller and more private assemblies, but that by sunerchesthe [tr. come together], public worship is meant, is plain from what P. proceeds to say of the Agape and the Eucharist. Indeed, there is no instance of the Gr. ever being used in the N. T. of private prayer meetings.—The Gr. counts, do not touch on the above difficulties; but they evidently suppose Paul intends absolute silence.—According to the law, refers to Gen. 3:16.

V. 36—40. To adduce this text, as a direct argument about any particular external ceremonies, used in divine worship, (which always appear decent and orderly to those who invent, impose, or are attached to them, and the contrary to those who dissent from them,) is doubtless wresting it from its proper meaning. If he will not own what I deliver on this head to be the will of Christ, he himself never had the Spirit of Christ. The Spirit of Christ can never contradict itself ; if it speak in me, and in them, it must speak the same things in both. If their revelations contradict mine, they do not come from the same spirit ; either I or they must be false prophets. By this, therefore, you may know them. But if any continue, after all, through prejudice or obstinacy, uncertain or ignorant whether they or I speak by the Spirit of God, they must be left under the power of this ignorance. If their pretences to inspiration can stand in competition with the apostolical character and powers which I have, I have NOTES. CHAP. XV. V. 1, 2. The Corinthians were tinctured with the Sadducean spirit of Jewish skeptics ; or rather with the philosophizing temper of the Grecians, who derided the doctrine, and denied the possibility, of a resurrection ; some of them also maintaining that virtue was its own reward, and that the expectation of a future recompense was a mean, unworthy motive. So that, certain persons at Corinth began to teach, that there would be no resurrection ; allegorizing, or explaining away, what had been revealed, or declared, to them on that subject. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. It does not however appear, that they denied the immortality of the soul.

SCOTT. (1.) 'In this treatise, 3 questions are solved. I. Whether there is any resurrection of the dead ? v. 1—35. II. With what body will the dead rise again ? v. 35—51. III. What will become of those whom the day of the Lord will find yet alive ? v. 51—end.—That there is a resurrection, P. both proves and illustrates. Now he proves it in two ways. I. by adducing reasons, derived 1st, from Scripture, v. 1—4. 2d, from eyewitnesses, v. 5—12. II. By showing the absurdities which a denial of this resurrection involves ; since thus, 1. Christ Himself would not have risen again, v. 13. 2. He is preached in vain, and in vain is faith reposed in Him, v. 14. 3. The apostles would be false witnesses, v. 15. 4. The faith of the Corinthians would be vain, v. 16, 17. 5. All the faithful who have died in Christ, would be under condemnation, v. 18. 6. Believers in Christ would be the most miserable of all men, v. 19. 7. Baptism for the resurrection of the dead would be vain, v. 29. 8. The apostle and other Christians would suffer so many persecutions to no purpose, v. 30—32.—He illustrates it by parity of reasoning, v. 21, 22.

There is, moreover, inserted, by Prolepsis, an answer to an objection, from some one of the adversaries to the following purport : "If the resurrection of the faithful depends on Christ, it follows that they have already risen." But P. replies, that this conclusion, that the resurrection must have already taken place, is false ; that it only follows, that the faithful shall certainly rise again : for that the divine order, described v. 23—25, requires that Christ should precede, and the rest in their time follow.' Schoett. Bl.

'It is plain, that P. means this as a refutation of the opinions of some at Corinth, who denied the resurrection ; though against whom this refutation is meant, contrs. are not agreed. Some think, they were heathens ; and from Ac. 13:32. we may infer, that the doctrine was by the philosophers accounted as not merely unfounded, but even ridiculous, as involving various absurdities. Others contend, that they were Christians, either Jewish Christians, who had formerly been Essenes, or Sadducees. Nor are there wanting those who think they were Gentile Christians ; which indeed seems more probable. There can, I think, be no doubt, but that P. wrote principally and immediately for Christians, though (as in the case of the Ep. to Rom.) indirectly for heathens, such as might be induced to read and weigh its contents. By Christians, lost all my authority and influence ; and the persons who allow of this competition against me, are out of the reach of conviction, and must be left to themselves.' It is just with God, to leave them to the blindness of their own minds, who wilfully shut out the light.

3. He sums up all in two general advices. (1.) That, though they should not despise the gift of tongues, nor altogether disuse it, under the mentioned regulations, yet they should prefer prophesying, (this is, indeed, the scope of the whole argument,) as the more useful gift. (2.) He charges them to let all things be done decently and in order, v. 40. i. e. that they should avoid everything manifestly indecent and disorderly. Such indecencies and disorders, as he had remarked upon, were especially to be shunned. They must do nothing that was manifestly childish, v. 20. or that would give occasion to say they were mad, v. 22. nor must they act so as to breed confusion, v. 33. But they were to do things in order ; and, to do otherwise, was to destroy the end of a Christian ministry, and all assemblies for Christian worship. Every part of divine worship should be carried on in a manly, grave, rational, composed, and orderly manner. God is not to be dishonored, nor his worship disgraced.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—11. In this ch. the apostle treats of that great article of Christianity,—the resurrection of the dead, which some of the Corinthians flatly denied, v. 10. Whether they turned this doctrine into allegory, as did Hymeneus and Philetus, by saying it was already past, 2 Tim. 2:17, 18. and several of the ancient heretics, by making it mean no more than a changing of their course of life ; or whether they rejected it as absurd, on principles of reason and science ; it seems they denied it in the proper sense, and disowned a future state of recompense. Now that heathens and infidels should deny this truth, does not seem so strange ; but that Christians should deny it, is surprising, especially when it is a truth of such importance, and so plainly revealed. It was time for the apostle to confirm them in this truth, when the staggering of their faith in it was likely to shake their Christianity.

He begins with a summary of the Gospel, what he had preached among them, namely, the death and resurrection of Christ. On this foundation the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is built. Divine truths appear with greatest evidence, when looked upon in their mutual connexion. The foundation may be strengthened, that the superstructure may be secured. Observe,

I. What a stress he lays on the Gospel, v. 1, 2. 1. It was what he constantly preached. He always preached the same Gospel, and taught the same truth. He could appeal to his hearers for this. Truth is, in its own nature, invariable ; and the infallible teachers of divine truth could never be at variance with themselves, or one another. 2. It was what they had received, been convinced of, and believed in their hearts, or at least made profession of doing so with their mouths. It was no strange doctrine, but that very Gospel in which, or by which, they had hitherto stood, and must continue to stand. Note, The doctrine of Christ's death and resurrection is at the foundation of Christianity. 3. It was that alone by which they could hope for salvation, v. 2. These are saving truths ; the crucifixion of our Redeemer, and his conquest over death, are the very source of our spiritual life and hopes.

II. Observe, what this Gospel is, on which the apostle lays such stress ; that doctrine which he had received, and delivered to them ; among the first, the principal ; a doctrine of the first rank, a most necessary truth, That Christ died for our sins, and was buried, and rose again ; or, in other words, that He was delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification, Rom. 4:25. was offered in sacrifice for our sins, and rose again, to show that He had procured forgiveness for them, and was accepted of God in this offering. Note, Christ's death and resurrection are the very sum and substance of evangelical truth. Hence we derive our spiritual life now, and here we must found our hopes of everlasting life hereafter.

III. Observe, how this truth is confirmed,

I mean both Jewish and Gentile ones ; and P. (I conceive) wrote, 1st, for the instruction and comfort of sincere believers in the doctrine of the resurrection ; 2dly, to refute those who denied, and confirm those who were wavering in opinion. The second class would (we may suppose) be chiefly composed of those Jewish Christians, who had formerly been Sadducees, or Essenes, and of such Gentile Christians as had been imbued with the opinions of certain philosophical sects, whose tenets were especially adverse to the doctrine in question, particularly the Stoics and others. It is not surprising, that such converts should have proved in this respect backsliders, and have again openly professed, or secretly fostered, their former opinions on the subject in question. This heresy was probably maintained, or favored, by some false teachers at Corinth. For we find by 2 Tim. 2:17, that a very few years afterwards it was supported by Hymeneus, and Philetus, whose error, P. says, "eateth away as doth a gangrene." And we learn from Tertul., and other ecclesiastical historians, that some of the earliest of the heretics, as Marcion, Valentinus, Apelles, and the Gnostics, followed, in this respect, the errors of the Sadducees. These persons, as we may collect from the above passage of Tim., and as we may collect from the ecclesiastical historians, and Chrys. in loc., maintained, that the resurrection promised by Christ, was only to be understood metaphorically, of a resurrection of the soul from the death of sin ; and by thus refining on the doctrine, they explained it entirely away in its natural and most important sense. They made it (says Grot.) to consist, in not attending to the concerns of this life, and, among the rest, matrimony, but in an exclusive devotion to meditation, like the Essenes, who practised celibacy : they accounted this as a new life, compared with which, the former life was death ; they therefore called the one death, and the other resurrection, as appears from 2 Tim. 2:17, 18. Clem. Al., Iren., Tertul. We may observe, however, that the arguments here adduced, only apply to sincere believers in Jesus Christ, and are meant only of the resurrection of the just, and not a resurrection in general : and indeed the error prevalent with Christians, justifies the course of Paul here. In this, he seems to have followed the custom of the Jews, by whom (Jaspis observes) that alone was called the resurrection. And he refers (besides the writings of the Rabbins), to 2 Mac. 12:43. Lu. 2:55. Jn. 6:39, 44, 54. Phil. 3:11.

(3.) First of all.] Especially, imprimis.
(5.) *Since the resurrection of Christ is a thing founded in fact, and as facts can be proved by nothing more satisfactorily than by the authority of those who are eyewitnesses of them, therefore P. appeals to several, highly worthy of credit, to whom our Lord showed Himself, and who all, at the peril, nay, even sacrifice of life, bore testimony to the actual resurrection of Christ. And since he is not now taking in hand for the first time to show this, but merely means to recall to their memory what had been before delivered to them, he does not adduce all the witnesses (not, for instance, the women, who were the first witnesses of the resurrection), but only the more important ones. Since, too, the authority both of Peter and James was great among the Corinthians, he does not content himself with appealing to the general testimony of all the apostles, (much less mentions himself,) but urges by name the authority of Peter and James; (Krause;) especially as Peter had, after the women's report, been the first to go to the sepulchre. See John 20:3, &c.*

(6.) 500 at once.] Whit. and Mackn. think, on the occasion which He appointed with the women, after his resurrection, Mat. 28:10. in consequence of which the 11 went to a mountain; and that probably many other disciples would hear of the appointment, and assemble at this epistle; after that, of James, singly, and then by all the apostles, when He was taken up into heaven, from mount Olivet, Lu. 24: 50. Comp. Ac. 1: 2, 5—7. Note, How incontrovertably evident was Christ's resurrection from the dead, when so many eyes saw Him at so many several times alive, and when He indulged the weakness of one disciple so far, to put his resurrection-out of doubt! And what reason have we to believe them who were so steady in maintaining this truth, though they hazarded all that was dear to them in this world, by endeavoring to assert and propagate it! Even Paul himself was last of all favored with the sight of Him. It was one of the peculiar offices of an apostle, to be a witness of our Savior's resurrection, Lu. 24: 48. and when Paul was called to the apostolical office, he was made an evidence of this sort: the Lord Jesus appeared to him by the way to Damascus, Acts 9: 17.

Having mentioned this favor, he takes occasion from it to make a humble digression concerning himself. He was highly favored of God, but he always endeavored to keep up a mean opinion of himself, and to express it. So here, by observing, (1.) That he was one born out of due time, v. 8. an abortive, a child dead born, and out of time. Paul resembled such a birth, in the suddenness of his new birth, in that he was not matured for the apostolical function, as the others were, who had personal converse with our Lord. He was called to the office when such conversation was not to be had; he was out of time for it. He had not known or followed the Lord, nor been formed in his family, as the others were, for this high and honorable function. This was, in Paul's account, a very humbling circumstance. (2.) By owning himself inferior to the other apostles; not meet to be called an apostle. The least, because the last of them; called latest to the office, and not worthy to be called an apostle, to have either the office or the title, because he had been a persecutor of the church of God, v. 9. Indeed, he tells us, elsewhere, that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles, 2 Cor. 11: 5. for gifts, graces, service, and sufferings, inferior to none of them. Yet some circumstances in his case made him think more meanly of himself than any of them. A humble spirit, in the midst of high attainments, is a great ornament; it sets good qualities off to much greater advantage. What kept Paul low, in an especial manner, was the remembrance of his former wickedness, his raging and destructive zeal against Christ and his members. How easily God can bring a good out of the greatest evil! When sinners are, by divine grace, turned into saints, He makes the remembrance of their former sins

the same time and place. See also Mat. 26:32. Mk. 16:7. This is not recorded in the gospels. Bl., who shows the probability of this number. Prid. and Doddr. urge this as a glorious proof of Christ's resurrection. "Had it been otherwise (say they) so many false hearts and tongues could never have acted in concert; nor would they all have kept a secret, which remorse, interest, and perhaps often torture, might urge them to divulge; especially as there had been one traitor among the 12; on account of which, had they been conscious of a fraud, a general suspicion of each others' secrecy must have arisen." Bl.

(8.) The comparison is not between an imperfect and dead born embryo, and a mature and live horn child; since P. was, at length, spiritually born; but between a child born before its time, always imperfect, and one that has come to maturity before its birth. Now, such as the former are observed to be usually smaller than others, and inferior in bodily and mental endowments. P. then, calls himself so, as being not an apostle formed and perfected in the way the other apostles were, but, (as Ec.) "not moulded from the first in the faith of Christ," and being made an apostle (so Mackn.) without the having gone through that previous and regular course of instruction, experience, and preparation, which the other apostles enjoyed, who had attended Jesus, during his ministry on earth. There may be an allusion also to the extraordinary manner in which P. was converted, and brought into the spiritual life and a state of salvation; since in children immaturally born, life is preserved by art and extraordinary care. Bl., whom see.

(10.) Notice Paul's modesty and delicacy. He does not say, "I attained more success than them all," but merely, "I labored more abundantly," &c. And even that he lowers by the next words. Bl.

V. 12—18. Probably they argued against the possibility or credibility of such an event; [the resurrection of the dead;] and then endeavored to put a figurative construction on the testimony of apostles or prophets very serviceable, to keep them humble, and diligent, and faithful. (3.) By ascribing all that was valuable in him to divine grace, v. 10. It is God's prerogative to say, I am that I am; our privilege to be able to say, 'By God's grace we are what we are.' All that is good in us, is a stream from this fountain. Paul, though conscious of his own diligence, and zeal, and service, so that he could say of himself, the grace of God was not given him in vain, but he labored more abundantly than they all, yet thought himself so much more the debtor to divine grace; not I, but the grace of God which was with me. Those who have the grace of God, should take care that it be not in vain. They should cherish, exercise, and exert, this heavenly principle. So did Paul, and therefore labored with so much heart, and so much success. And yet the more he labored, and the more good he did, the more humble was he in his opinion of himself, and the more disposed to own and magnify the favor of God toward him, his free and unmerited favor. A humble spirit will be very apt to own and magnify the grace of God: it is commonly a gracious one. Where pride is subdued, there it is reasonable to believe grace reigns.

After this digression, the apostle returns to his argument, and tells them, v. 11. that he not only preached the same Gospel himself, at all times, and in all places, but that all the apostles preached the same. Whether Peter, or Paul, or any other apostle, had converted them to Christianity, all preached the same doctrine, and confirmed it by the same evidence. All agreed in this, that Jesus Christ, and He crucified, and slain, and then rising from the dead, was the very sum and substance of Christianity; and this all true Christians believe. All the apostles agreed in this testimony; all Christians agree in the belief of it; by this faith they live, in this faith they die.

V. 12—19. It seems, some among the Corinthians, as the heathens commonly, thought the resurrection an impossibility. But against this the apostle produces an incontestable fact, i. e. the resurrection of Christ; and goes on to argue against them from the absurdities that must follow from their principle. As,

1. If there be, can be, no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen, v. 13. and again, If the dead rise not, cannot be raised, or recovered to life, then is not Christ raised, v. 16. And yet it was foretold, in ancient prophecies, that He should rise; and it has been proved, by multitudes of eyewitnesses, that He is risen. And will you say, will any among you dare to say, that is not, cannot be, which God long ago said shall be, and is now undoubted matter of fact?

14 And if <sup>a</sup> Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished.

19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

q Ac.17:31. r Ro.4:25. s Jn.16:2. c.4:13. 2 Ti.3:12.

II. This would destroy the principal evidence of Christianity; and so, (1.) Make preaching vain. 'We apostles are all the while deceivers, liars for God, if, in his name, and by power received from Him, we go forth, and publish and assert a thing false in fact, and impossible to be true. And does not this make us the vainest men in the world, and our office and ministry the vainest and most useless thing in the world? What end could we propose to ourselves, in undertaking this hard and hazardous service, if we knew our religion stood on no better foundation, nay, if we were not well assured of the contrary?' (2.) This supposition would make the faith of Christians vain, as well as the labors of ministers, v. 16. because it is through his death and sacrifice for sin alone, that forgiveness is to be had. Eph. 1:7. No remission of sins is to be had, but through the shedding of his blood. And, had He remained under the power of death, how should He have delivered us from its power? Or, what evidence could we have had, that through Him we should have justification and eternal life? He must rise for our justification, who was delivered for our sins, or in vain we look for any such benefit by Him. And must not faith in Christ be vain, and of no significance, if He be still among the dead?

III. Another absurdity following from this supposition, is, that those who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If there be no resurrection, they cannot rise, and therefore are lost, even those who have died in the Christian faith, and for it. It is plain from this, that those among the Corinthians, who denied the resurrection, meant thereby a state of future retribution, and not merely the revival of the flesh: they took death to be the destruction and extinction of the man, and not merely of the bodily life; for, otherwise, the apostle could not infer the utter loss of those who slept in Jesus, from the supposition they would never rise more, or that they had no hopes in Christ after life; for, they might have hope of happiness for their minds, if these survived their bodies; and this would prevent the limiting of their hopes in Christ to this life only. On supposition there is no resurrection, in your sense, no after-state and life, then dead Christians are quite lost. How vain a thing were our faith and religion, on this supposition! And this,

IV. Would infer, that Christ's ministers and servants were of all men most miserable, as having hope in Him in this life only, v. 19. which is another absurdity that would follow from asserting no resurrection. All who believe in Christ, have hope in Him; all who believe in Him as a Redeemer, hope for redemption and salvation by Him; but if there be no resurrection, or state of future recompense, their hope in Him must be limited to this life; and if all their hopes in Christ lie within the compass of this life, they are in a much worse condition than the rest of mankind, especially at that time, and under those circumstances, in which the apostles wrote; for then they had no countenance or protection from the rulers of the world, but were hated and persecuted by all men. Better be anything than a Christian

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—19. When the faithful minister sees his beloved people drawn aside to embrace dangerous errors, his chief comfort, under the trial, must arise from being able to appeal to them, that the doctrine which he preached was scriptural, and from a full satisfaction, that they who received it, and stand fast in it, will be certainly saved; and that none of them can perish, if they keep in remembrance the instructions he gave them, unless they deceived themselves with a vain, a dead, and inefficient faith. In order that we may possess this comfort, we must be careful to deliver the truths of revelation pure, as we have received them, and in that order, proportion, and connexion in which they stand in the Scriptures; and he who duly attends to these sacred oracles will know assuredly, that the 'death of Christ for our sins,' and his 'resurrection for our justification,' are essential and fundamental doctrines, which must, in all places, and on all occasions, be explicitly and strenuously insisted on.—The most eminent Christians are always the most humble; they continually reflect on the aggravated sins of their unconverted state; especially if they were long or greatly set in opposition to the Gospel. The more evident it is, that God has pardoned them, the less disposed will they be to excuse themselves. In reality, it is a great thing for a man, with propriety, humility, and truth, to say, 'By the grace of God, I am what I am;' the declaration becomes those alone, who are walking under the influence of holy principles, and live a holy life; and is utterly unsuitable to the character of the negligent or formal professor of evangelical truth.—With what varied, subtle devices doth Satan bring in false doctrines, by men of abilities, learning, or eloquence, in a covert and plausible manner, that the simple may suspect no danger! Heretical teachers, often with apparent modesty, question whether we have rightly understood the sacred writers, and whether the doctrine which they oppose be contained in them.

concerning it. This, however, amounted to a denial of Christ's resurrection; for that authenticated fact demonstrated the possibility of the dead being raised; it confirmed all that he had taught about that doctrine; and it was an earnest of the resurrection of all believers; so that, to invalidate the resurrection of Jesus would subvert Christianity itself.

Others (partly from Beng. and Schoett.) take the phrase as equivalent to hamartōlon einai, i. e. to be a pagan; q. d. "ye are no better off than pagans (as ye were)." And this Kr. labors to establish, but to little purpose; it is a gratuitous assumption [see Bl.]: nay, there is no instance of hamartia in the sense of heathenism. They indeed endeavor to prove their point from what they call the contrary expression, to be in the truth, i. e. to be a Christian, at Jn. 3:3, 4. But there we have not to be, but to walk, which quite alters the case. Besides, not a few of the Corinthian converts were Jewish Christians. This interpretation, therefore, must be abandoned, and the common one retained, which is supported by all the ancient comtrs., and the modern ones up to the last half century.—The expression is plainly idiotical, and perhaps Hebraic. They inquire, whether a more rational interpretation may not be given to this and the other text! whether the more obvious meaning do not involve absurdity, or even impossibility; whether any, but the weak and illiterate, can credit such mysteries, or absurdities, and whether we had not better adopt a figurative sense, or admit some other reading, or even suppose the sacred writer to be mistaken, than assent to so incomprehensible, and therefore irrational, a doctrine. If, indeed, they could prove the mysteries, which they oppose, to be contrary to fact, to intuition, or to demonstration, their principles might be admitted; but when they apply them to doctrines, which are merely above reason, and contrary to their supposed probabilities, and vain reasonings, they are perfectly inadmissible and irrational; unless man be wiser than his Maker. The dupes, however, of such specious pretences are seldom aware, whither these rational improvements of the creed, and of the Scriptures tend; they do not perceive, that, according to them, man's presumptuous reason sits in judgment on the infinite wisdom of God; man's weakness is made the standard of omnipotence; and man's conjecture, the measure of divine revelation. Indeed, this is perfectly consistent with those economical and political sentiments, contended for by some of these oracles of an enlightened age; by which children are set to judge, whether their parents are fit to be honored and obeyed, or not; servants are called on to determine the same concerning their masters, and subjects concerning their rulers; and, in short, not only is all subordination virtually destroyed, but, in every relation, the inferior is constituted the judge of his superior, without any appeal from his arrogant tribunal. . . . V. 19. It does not follow, that Christians would, in fact, be more unhappy than other men, if there should, in the event, be no future reward; for even then, their hopes of heaven, and that consolation which is thence derived, would far more than counterbalance their peculiar trials, self-denials, and hardships; [note, Job 34:1. 36:8—14.] but if this hope and consolation were taken from them, they would indeed be more miserable than other men; having lost their relish for those vain pleasures, which alone could be hoped for, and in which other men, with a measure of success, strive to forget their misery, experiencing earnest desires, which must certainly be disappointed, and enduring many peculiar evils, without any peculiar support and consolation.—The fact however is, that Christians have not only the hope of a future felicity, but also the earnestness, the beginnings, and first-fruits of it, in those holy affections towards God, and that 'joy' in Him, 'which a stranger intermeddled not with;' and therefore they are so far from being 'of all men most miserable,' that they of all men enjoy the most solid comfort, amidst their difficulties and trials, and even in the seasons of the sharpest persecutions.—Many of the Corinthians were not aware, what dangerous inferences were fairly deducible from the tenets, to which they had listened, and their false teachers would doubtless disavow them; yet it was proper thus to expose them, that they might be put on their guard, and not patronize opinions pregnant with such mischief to the souls of men, and so destructive of the animating hopes and comforts of all believers.

on these terms; for in this world they are hated, and hunted, and abused, stripped of all worldly comforts, and exposed to all manner of sufferings: they fare much harder than other men in this life, and yet have no further or better hopes. And is it not absurd, for one who believes in Christ, to admit a principle that involves so absurd an inference?

V. 20—34. The apostle establishes the resurrection of the dead, the holy dead, the dead in Christ.

I. On the resurrection of Christ. 1. Because He is indeed the First-fruits of them that slept, v. 20. As He is assuredly risen, so in his resurrection there is as much an earnest given, that the dead in Him shall rise, as there was that the Jewish harvest in general should be accepted, and blessed, by the offering and acceptance of the first-fruits. He is not risen merely for Himself, but as Head of the body of the church; and those that sleep in Him God will bring with Him, 1 Thess. 4: 14. Note, Christ's resurrection is a pledge and earnest of ours, if we are true believers in Him: because He is risen, we shall rise. This is the apostle's first argument, in confirmation of the truth; and it is, 2. Illustrated by a parallel between the first and second Adam, v. 21, 22. As through the sin of the first Adam all men became mortal, because all derived from him the same sinful nature, so, through the merit and resurrection of Christ, shall all who are made to partake of the Spirit, and the spiritual nature, revive, and become immortal. But the meaning is not, that, as all men died in Adam, so all men, without exception, shall be made alive in Christ; for the scope of the apostle's argument restrains the general meaning. Christ rose as the First-fruits; therefore they that are Christ's, v. 23. shall rise too. Thus it seemed fit to the Divine Wisdom, that, as the first Adam ruined his posterity by sin, the second Adam should raise his seed to a glorious immortality. Before he leaves the argument, he, 3. Observes, That there will be an order observed in their resurrection. What that precisely will be, we are nowhere told, but in the general only here, that there will be order observed. It is only here said, that the first-fruits are supposed to rise first, and afterward all who are Christ's, when He shall come again. Not that Christ's resurrection must in fact go before the resurrection of any of his, but it must be laid as the foundation. See Bp. Patrick on Num. 26: 2. The offering of the first-fruits was what made the lump holy; and the lump was made holy by this offering, though it was not made before the harvest was gathered in, so it were set apart for that end, and duly offered afterward. So Christ's resurrection must, in order of nature, precede that of his saints, though some of these might rise in order of time before Him. It is because He is risen, that they rise.

II. He argues from the continuance of the mediatorial kingdom till all Christ's enemies are destroyed, the last of which is death, v. 24—26. He is risen, and, on his resurrection, was invested with sovereign empire, had all power in heaven and earth put into his hands, Mat. 28: 18. had a name given Him above every name, that every knee might bow to Him, and every tongue confess Him Lord, Philip. 2: 9—11. And the administration of this kingdom must continue in his hands, till all opposing power, and rule, and authority, be put down, v. 24. till all enemies are put under his feet, v. 25. and till the last enemy is destroyed, which is death, v. 26. Now, this argument implies in it all these particulars: 1. That our Savior rose from the dead, to have all power put into his hands, and have and administer a kingdom, as Mediator, Rom. 14: 9. 2. That this mediatorial kingdom is to have an end, at least as far as it is concerned in bringing his people safe to glory, and subduing all his and their enemies, v. 24. 3. That it is not to have an end, till all opposing power be put down, and all enemies brought to his feet, v. 24, 25. 4. That, among other enemies, death must be destroyed, v. 26. or its power over his members be disannulled. Thus far the apostle is express; but he leaves us to make the inference, that therefore the saints must rise; else death and the grave would have power over them; nor would our Savior's kingly power prevail against the last enemy of his people, and annul its power. The saints therefore shall live again, and die no more.

This is the scope of the argument; but the apostle drops several hints, in the course of it, that will be properly noticed; as, (1.) That our Savior, as Man, and Mediator between God and man, has a delegated royalty, a kingdom given, v. 27. As Man, all his authority must be delegated. And though his mediation supposes his divine nature, yet, as Mediator, He does not so explicitly sustain the character of God, but a middle Person between God and man, partaking of both natures, human and divine, as He was to reconcile both parties, God and man; and receiving commission and authority from God the Father, to act in this office. The Father appears, in this whole dispensation, in the majesty, and with the authority, of God: the Son, made Man, appears as the Minister of the Father, though He is God as well as the Father. Nor is this passage to be understood of the eternal dominion over all his creatures, which belongs to Him as God, but of a kingdom committed to Him as Mediator, and God-man, and that chiefly after his resurrection, when, having overcome, He sat down with his Father on his throne, Rev. 3: 21. 'Then was the prediction verified, I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion, Ps. 2: 6. placed Him on his throne. This is meant by the phrase so frequent in the N. T. of sitting at the right hand of God, Mark 14: 19. Rom. 8: 34. Col. 3: 1, &c. on the right hand of power, Mk. 16: 62. Lu. 20: 69. on the right hand of the Majesty on high, Heb. 1: 3. on the right hand of the throne of God, Heb. 32: 2. on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty

V. 20—23. The apostle, having established the fact of Christ's resurrection, from that fact shows the certainty of our resurrection, and then, from the important questions in verse 35. he takes occasion to enlarge on the glorious change which shall take place in the bodies of the saints; and, finally, he triumphs over death, by the consideration of a resurrection and a glorious immortality. This is the plan, or method, and the coherence of the parts, in this noble ch. (21) 'For since by man, sin and death entered into the world; so, 'by man,' by One in human nature, 'came the resurrection of the dead;' and as, in consequence of their relation to Adam, all men are born mortal, and at length die; even so, in and by Christ, shall all be made alive. Jn. 11: 20—27. v. 26, 27. Rom. 5: 12—19. All men, without exception, through his undertaking, being placed under a dispensation of mercy, shall be raised from the dead, that their future state may be accordingly determined; yet none will be finally benefited, except those, who are one with Him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit, and of these the apostle particularly, and almost exclusively, treats in this ch. Jn. 5: 23, 23.—The distinction between the absolute, universal, and everlasting kingdom of God, the Governor of all, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, as instituted for the benefit of fallen man, is everywhere implied in Scripture. The Father, as the Head of the absolute kingdom, ceased not to reign, when the Son was advanced to the mediatorial throne; as that authority was intended to endure only for a season, in order to accomplish certain important ends, to the glory of God in man's salvation. Mat. 28: 19. Jn. 5: 20—30. After the day of judgment, this kingdom will be terminated; Christ, having executed his commission, will cease to reign 'over all worlds,' as Mediator, having publicly 'delivered up the kingdom to God' in the person of 'the Father;' yet He will in human nature retain a peculiar authority over his redeemed people, and, as One with the Father, He will, with Him and the Holy Spirit, reign One 'God over all, blessed for evermore;' nor will He any more cease to reign in this sense, when He has given up the mediatorial kingdom, than the Father ceased to reign, when He appointed the Son to that kingdom. For in this passage, as in some others, the person of the Father is mentioned, as filling the throne and appointing the Mediator, in order to distinguish the absolute authority of God, from the delegated authority of the Son in human nature.—He saith not, that "the Father," mentioned, v. 24. but, that "God may be all in all;" and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation of the Godhead, which comprehends Father, Son, and

Holy Ghost. That the Godhead may govern all things immediately by Himself, without the intervention of a Mediator between Him and us, to exact our obedience in his name, and to convey to us his favors and rewards. . . . So that as now Christ, Theanthropos, God-man, is "all in all;" Col. 3: 11. because the Father hath put all things into his hands, does all things, and governs all things, by Him; when this economy ceases, the Godhead will be "all in all," as governing and influencing all things by Himself immediately. "That God may be all in all," . . . by a full communication of Himself to, and an intimate union with, all his saints. . . . Though it, (the kingdom of Christ,) shall have no such end as the preceding monarchies had, Luke 1: 32: 33. by giving place to a succeeding kingdom, Dan. 7: 14. but shall be an eternal kingdom, in the same sense in which "He is a Priest for ever," . . . Heb. 7: 17, 24, 25. yet, as that priesthood must needs cease, when the subject of it ceaseth, and He hath none to intercede for, so must his kingly office cease, when all his friends have that eternal life conferred on them, for which this power was committed to Him, and all his "enemies are become his footstool." . . . Though the Godhead could alone enable Him to execute his kingly office, yet was He thus exalted, this power and judgment were conferred on Him, "because He was the Son of man." Jn. 5: 27. He intercedeth still in heaven, by virtue of his blood, all favors are granted to the church through Him, and God will judge the world "by the man Christ Jesus." . . . While He continued on earth, and acted only as a Prophet sent from God, He always owned that He could "do nothing of Himself, but as the Father gave Him commandment, so He did, and so He spake." Jn. 5: 30. 8: 38. 12: 49.—But being exalted to be Lord of all things, He acted as Lord in all things, which relate to his kingly office over his church. . . . The exercise of this authority He shall then lay down, when "all things are subdued to Him;" no other kingdom or dominion being to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is essential to the whole Godhead. And though He shall ever so far reign, as to be still at the right hand of God, in honor, dignity, and beatitude; . . . and though the effects of his kingly power shall continue for ever, his enemies being destroyed, and his saints reigning in bliss for ever; yet the exercise of that kingly power shall then cease, and He, as Man, shall be subject to the Father. . . . As Christ before was "all in all," in reference to his church, and "from his fulness they did all receive;" so now the Godhead may be all in all, and fill all things immediately by Himself. Whitby.—No doubt, Christ, as Man, and in his mediatorial kingdom, always was most perfectly subject in the heavens, Heb. 8:1. Sitting down in this seat, is taking upon Him the exercise of his mediatorial power and royalty, which was done on his ascension into heaven, Mark 16:19. A recompense, Philip. 2:6—12. On his ascension, He was made Head over all things to the church, and power given Him to govern and protect it against all enemies, and in the end destroy them, and complete the salvation of all who believe in Him. (2.) That this delegated royalty must some time be delivered up to the Father, from whom it was received, v. 24. for it is a power received for particular ends and purposes, v. 25, 26. And when these ends shall be obtained, namely, the salvation of his church, and the destruction of his enemies, then will He deliver up the power which He had only for this purpose, though He may continue to reign over his glorified church and body in heaven; and in this sense it may notwithstanding be said, that He shall reign for ever and ever, Rev. 11:15. that He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end, Lu. 1:33. that his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, Dan. 7:14. See, also, Mic. 4:7. (3.) The Redeemer shall certainly reign till the very last enemy of his people be destroyed, till death itself be abolished, till his saints revive, and recover perfect life, never to be in fear or danger of dying any more. What support should this be to his saints in every hour of distress and temptation! He is alive, who was dead, and liveth for ever, and doth reign, and will continue to reign, till the redemption of his people be completed, and the utter ruin of their enemies effected. (4.) When this is done, and all things are put under his feet, then shall the Son become subject to Him, that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all, v. 28. The meaning of which I take to be, That then the Man Christ Jesus, who has appeared in so much majesty during the whole administration of this kingdom, shall appear, on the giving it up, to be a subject of the Father. Things are, in Scripture, many times said to be, when they are manifested and made to appear; and this delivering up of the kingdom will make it manifest, that He who appeared in the majesty of the sovereign King, was, during this administration, a subject of God; so it will appear to the divine glory, that God may be all in all, that the accomplishment of our salvation may appear all divine, and God alone have the honor of it. Though the human nature must be employed in the work of our redemption, yet God was all in all in it.

III. He argues for the resurrection, from the case of those who were baptized for the dead, v. 29. What shall they do, if the dead rise not? What have they done? How vain a thing hath their baptism been! Must they stand by it, or renounce it? why are they baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not? But what is this baptism for the dead? It is necessary to be known, that the apostle's argument may be understood; whether it conclude for the thing in dispute universally, or only against the particular persons who were baptized for the dead. But who shall interpret this very obscure passage, it being not agreed, what is meant by baptism; whether it be to be taken in a proper or figurative sense; and if in a proper sense, whether it be to be understood of Christian baptism, properly so called, or some other ablution. And as little is it agreed, who are the dead, or in what sense the preposition for is to be taken. Some, as Whitby, understand the dead, of our Savior Himself. Why are persons baptized in the name of a dead Savior, a Savior who remains among the dead, if the dead rise not? But it is, I believe, an instance perfectly singular, for 'the dead' (the Gr. is plural) to mean no more than one dead person; it is a signification which the words have nowhere else. And the baptized, seem plainly to mean some particular persons, not Christians in general; which yet must be the signification, if the dead be understood of our Savior. Some understand the passage of the martyrs: Why do they suffer martyrdom for their religion? This is sometimes called the baptism of blood by the ancients, and, by our Savior Himself, baptism indefinitely, Mat. 20:22. Lu. 12:50. But in what sense can they that die martyrs for their religion, be said to be baptized, i. e. die martyrs for the dead? Some understand it, of a custom observed, as some of the ancients tell us, among many who professed the Christian name in the first ages, of baptizing some in the name and stead of catechumens dying without baptism. But this savored of such superstition, that, if the custom had prevailed in the church so soon, the apostle would hardly have mentioned it, without signifying a dislike of it. Some understand it, of baptizing over the dead, which was a custom, they tell us, that early obtained; and this, to testify their hope of the resurrection. This sense is pertinent to the apostle's argument, but it appears not that any such practice was in use in the apostle's time. Others understand it, of those who have been baptized for the sake or on occasion, of the martyrs, i. e. the constancy with which they died for their religion. Some were doubtless converted to Christianity, by observing this; and it would have been a vain thing for persons to have become Christians on this motive, if the martyrs, by losing their lives for religion, became utterly extinct, and were to live no more. But the church at Corinth had not, in all probability, suffered much persecution at this time, or seen many instances of martyrdom among them, nor had many converts been made by the constancy and firmness which the martyrs discovered. Not to observe, that 'the dead' seems to be too general an expression, to mean only the martyred dead. It is as easy an explication of the phrase as any I have met with, and as pertinent to the argument, to suppose 'the dead' to mean some among the Corinthians, who had been taken off by the hand of God. We read, that many were sickly among them, and many slept, ch. 11:38. because of their disorderly behavior at the Lord's table. These executions might terrify some into Christianity; as the miraculous earthquake did the jailer, Ac. 16:29, 30, &c. Persons baptized on such an occasion, might be properly said to be baptized for the dead, i. e. on their account. And the baptized and the dead answer to one another; and, on this supposition, the Corinthians could not to the Godhead, referring all to his honor, and exercising all his authority, 'to the glory of God the Father;' but when the grand designs of that kingdom shall be illustriously completed, in the view of all holy creatures in the universe, and the kingdom delivered up, this shall appear in the most conspicuous manner, and so far to exceed all our conceptions; and the glory of the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, will be displayed and adored, in the highest possible degree. 'The resurrection of all that "are Christ's," is to be at this very advent; but how can He "deliver up his kingdom" and yet reign on earth a thousand years? In a word, if all that are his must be raised, at his coming to the final judgment, then none before that coming, and then they must be all raised together, not some a thousand years before the rest.' Whitby. Rev. 20:4—6. (27) He hath put, &c. Both in the LXX. and the Heb. the verb is in the second person, 'Thou hast put, &c.' Ps. 8:6, 4—9. Heb. 2:5—13.

'As the death of all mankind came by Adam, so the resurrection of all men came by Christ; the wicked shall be raised by Him officio Judicis, by the power of Christ, as their Lord and Judge: the righteous shall be raised beneficio Mediatoris, by virtue of their union with Him as their Head.' Valpy, Iren., Morus, Mackn. Id.

(23.) Order. 'Tagma: properly, regiment: comtrs. are not agreed whether time (as Theoph., Vorst., Menoch., Tirinus) or merit, or dignity (as Zon, Pisc., Tert., Est., Grot., &c.) be intended. Mackn. tr. "band, or class;" Stade, "assembly." The first seems best, and to include the others; since priority of resurrection would cause separation of class, and imply difference of rank.' Id.

(24.) Kingdom. 'Two kingdoms (says Theoph.) are mentioned in the SS., that of creation, and that of adoption. Christ is the King of all nations, Greeks and Jews, by creation, whether they will or no. He reigns over the faithful and holy, who are in willing subjection, by adoption and appropriation. See Ps. 2:8. Mat. 28:18. This kingdom (continues Th.) He delivers to his Father, by achieving and accomplishing the purpose of it. Thus, for instance, if a king commits to his son the management of a war, against nations that have rebelled, when the war is finished, and the nations are again reduced to subjection, then the son is said to deliver up the war to his father, i. e. show that he has accomplished the work committed to him. The kingdom here (as Sclater) is economicum, the mediatorial kingdom and government of Christ, and the dispensation of God with men by Christ. See Mackn. Grot. illustrates the delivering up the kingdom to God, by comparing it with that of the presidents, sent out by the Roman emperors to govern provinces, and, on the expiration of the period of their government, restoring their power into the hands of the sovereign.' Bloomf.

(25.) 'By Oriental custom, the heir apparent, or the next in rank to the monarch, sits at his right hand, and by that, likewise, vanquished enemies were, as it were, triumphed over, in being trampled under foot by their conquerors' Bl. Comp. cuts 7, at end of Jer. and at Ps. 110:1. Ed.

V. 29, 30. The apostle, having shown the order and event of the general resurrection, proceeds to evince still further the importance of a firm belief respecting it.—The expression 'baptized for the dead,' has given occasion to a variety of ingenious conjectures and learned discussions. The following interpretation, however, suggested by Dr. Doddridge, who received it from Sir R. Ellis, appears the true one. The apostle refers to the case of those, who presented themselves for baptism, immediately after the martyrdom of their brethren, or at their funerals; as if fresh soldiers should enlist and press forward to the assault, to supply the places of those who had fallen in battle. This might show the Corinthian speculators, how greatly their notions tended to discourage men from professing the Gospel in times of persecution, and to make them afraid and ashamed to own the cause of Christ. Scott.

(29, 30.) Baptized for the dead. 'The phrase seems idiotical, and there is (popularem more) an ellipsis of the word "resurrection." Thus the sense will be: "baptized in the confidence and expectation of a resurrection from the dead." Of course are meant, by dead, those who die in the Lord, and a resurrection to happiness. Phil. 3:11. Chrys. establishes this interpretation beyond all doubt; and so Theoph., Cec., Phot., Theod., Hm., Wets. All the Gr. comtrs. agree, that there is an allusion to the form of baptism, "I believe in the resurrection of the dead," to which is added: "Wilt thou be baptized in this faith?—It is my desire." After which, and other confessions, according to Chrys., the rite is performed.' Bloomf., whom see in full. Ed.

34 Awake <sup>m</sup> to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I <sup>n</sup> speak this to your shame.

mistake the apostle's meaning. 'Now,' says he, 'what shall they do, and why were they baptized, if the dead rise not? You have a general persuasion that these men have done right, and acted wisely, and as they ought, on this occasion; but why, if the dead rise not, seeing they may perhaps hasten their death, by provoking a jealous God, and have no hopes beyond it?' But whether this be the meaning, or whatever else be, doubtless the apostle's argument was good, and intelligible to the Corinthians. And his next is as plain to us.

IV. He argues from the absurdity of his own and other Christians' conduct, on this supposition:

1. It would be a foolish thing for them to run so many hazards, v. 30. 'Why do we expose ourselves to continual peril; we Christians, especially we apostles?' Every one knows that it was dangerous being a Christian, and much more a preacher and apostle, at that time. Christianity were a foolish profession, if it proposed no hopes beyond this life, at least in such hazardous times as attended the first profession of it. And is this a character of his religion, fit for a Christian to endure? And must he not fix this character on it, if he gives up his future hopes, and denies the resurrection of the dead? This argument the apostle brings home to himself, v. 31. He was in continual danger of death, and carried his life, as we say, in his hand. And why should he thus expose himself, if he had no hopes after life? He had encountered very great difficulties, and fierce enemies; he had fought with beasts at Ephesus, v. 32. and was in danger of being pulled to pieces by a caraged multitude, stirred up by Demetrius, and the other craftsmen, Acts 19: 28. though some understand this literally, of Paul's being exposed to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatre, at a Roman show in that city. And Nicephorus tells a formal story to this purport, and of the miraculous complaisance of the lions to him when they came near him. But so remarkable a trial and circumstance of his life, methinks, would not have been passed over by Luke, and much less by himself, when he gives us so large and particular detail of his sufferings, 2 Cor. 11: 24—33. I take it, therefore, that this fighting with beasts is a figurative expression; the beasts intended were men, of a fierce and ferine disposition, and this refers to the passage above cited. 'Now,' says he, 'what advantage have I from such contests, if the dead rise not? And, if I am to perish by death, and expect nothing after it, could anything be more weak?' Was Paul so senseless? Could anything, but the sure hopes of a better life after death, have extinguished the love of life in him to this degree? 'What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? What can I propose to myself?' It is very lawful and fit for a Christian to propose advantage to himself, by his fidelity to God. Thus did Paul. Thus did our blessed Lord Himself, Heb. 13: 2. And thus we are bid to do after his example, and have our fruit to holiness, that our end may be everlasting life. This is the very end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. 1: 9. not only what it will issue in, but what we should aim at.

2. It would be a much wiser thing to take the comforts of this life, v. 32. let us turn epicures. Thus this sentence means in the prophet, Is. 22: 13. Let us even live like beasts, if we must die like them. This passage also plainly implies, as I have hinted above, that those who denied the resurrection among the Corinthians, were perfect Sadducees, who say, There is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit, Ac. 23: 8. (i. e. 'Man is all body; there is nothing in him to survive the body, nor will that, when once he is dead, ever revive again;') otherwise, his arguments had no force in them, as I have before said. Nothing but the hopes of better things hereafter can enable a man to forego all the comforts and pleasures here, and embrace poverty, contempt, misery, and death. Thus did the apostles and primitive Christians; but how wretched was their case, and how foolish their conduct, if they deceived themselves, and abused the world with vain and false hopes!

V. He closes with a caution, exhortation, and reproof.

1. A caution against the dangerous conversation of bad men, men of loose lives and principles, v. 33. Possibly, some of those who said that there was no resurrection of the dead, were men of loose lives, and endeavored to countenance their vicious practices by so corrupt a principle; and had that speech often in their mouths, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Now, the apostle grants, that the talk was to the purpose, if there were no future state. But having confuted their principle, he now warns the Corinthians how dangerous such men's conversation must prove. Bad company and conversation are likely to make bad men. Error and vice are infectious; and if we would avoid the contagion, we must keep clear of those who have taken it, Prov. 13: 20.

2. An exhortation to break off their sins, and rouse themselves, and lead a more holy and righteous life, v. 34. The disbelief of a future state destroys all virtue and piety. But the improvement to be made of the truth is, to cease from sin, and set ourselves to the business of religion, and that in good earnest.

3. Here is a reproof, and a sharp one, to some, at least, among them; Some of you have not the knowledge of God; I speak this to your shame. It is, indeed, a shame in Christians, not to have the knowledge of God; for it must be owing to their own sloth, and slight of God, that they are ignorant of Him. Note, also, It must be ignorance of God, that leads men into the disbelief of a resurrection and future life. Those who know God, know that He will not abandon his faithful servants, leave them exposed to such hardships and sufferings, without any recompense or reward. They know He is not unfaithful or unkind, to forget their labor and patience, their faithful services and cheerful sufferings, or let their labor be in vain. But I am apt to think, that the expression has a much stronger meaning; that there were atheistical people among them, who hardly owned a God, or one who had any concern with, or took cognizance of human affairs. These were, indeed, a scandal and shame to any Christian church. Note, Real atheism lies at the bottom of men's disbelief of a future state.

V. 35—50. The apostle comes now to answer a plausible and principal objection against the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead; concerning which, observe the proposal of the objection, v. 35. The objection is plainly twofold; How are they raised up? implying a supposed impossibility in the thing; an opinion that prevailed much among the heathens, and the Sadducees; and it seems, also, among the Corinthians. The other part of the objection is about the quality of their bodies, who shall rise; With what body will they come? Will it be with the same body; with like shape,

V. 31—34. The apostle protested, in the most solemn manner, 'by their rejoicing,' or his rejoicing with them, and on their account, as converted by his ministry, (several copies read it, our rejoicing,) that he 'died daily;' he was every day exposed to the peril of martyrdom; he expected that violent death continually, and his manifold hardships and sufferings rendered his life a kind of lingering execution. To all this he had nothing to oppose, except the joyful hope and blessed earnestness of future felicity, through his crucified and risen Lord, and the pleasure of bringing others to share the same 'salvation with eternal glory;' yet this, on the principles which he was confuting, must prove a mere delusion. 'Fought with beasts.' Many suppose he referred to the tumult at Ephesus, excited by Demetrius and his workmen, Acts 19: 23—41. but he afterwards, in this epistle, expresses his purpose of continuing at Ephesus till Pentecost; (16: 8) whereas in the history it is said, that 'after the uproar ceased, he . . . departed to go into Macedonia.' Acts 20: 1. Indeed, his whole plan seems to have been deranged in good measure by that tumult. 16: 5—9. 2 Cor. 1: 15—20. Had he, in this short and figurative expression, alluded to that event, in writing to the Corinthians, it must have been as supposing them previously acquainted with it. It is evident, that he wrote from Ephesus, and that he intended to remain there for some time longer. The epistle must therefore have been written before that tumult, and some other of his many hardships at Ephesus must be meant. He had great success, and many adversaries in that city; and it is plain, that only a small part of his sufferings has been particularly recorded. 2 Cor. 11: 21—31.—'If this sense' (the lit. interpretation) 'be not liked, you may interpret, "after the manner of men," according to the intention of men, it being the intention of the men of Asia to deal so with him. Note, also, that cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts. So Ignatius, when he was carried from Syria to Rome, under a band of soldiers, who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I show them, "From Syria to Rome I fight with beasts." And Herablitus . . . says, "The Ephesians were turned into beasts, because they slew one another." Whitty.—It is evident, that the apostle constantly aimed to bring the Corinthians to a more humble opinion of themselves, and gradually to draw them off from their false teachers. (32) Let us eat, &c. From the Sept., which well expresses the Heb. Is. 22: 13, 8—14. Scott.

(31.) Your rejoicing. 'My boasting concerning you.' Bl. Est., Mackn., Grot., Kyp., Pearee, Ros., Kr., Jasp. Daily. So Livy. 'Daily our city is taken, daily destroyed,' i. e. exposed to be so. See Bl. Ed.

(32.) Beasts. Literally, see Bl., who truly remarks, that 'this interpretation is best founded, and liable to fewest difficulties, and immovable as yet.' Id.

(34.) See Bl. 'How is it possible for the different parts of bodies which have been resolved to dust, and the elements apparently annihilated by fire, devoured by beasts, and even men, or become so mingled and converted into the nature of other animals, nay, of trees, plants, &c., how can they, after having been so often shared by different individuals, so many yrs. thus dissipated, be at length, and under an entirely different mode of existence, reunited and coalesce as before into one body? It is plainly impossible (v. 50). To which P. answers, (popularly,) it will be in some measure the same, and in some measure not the same body.' This reclothing of the soul, he, for want of better words, calls a spiritual, a glorified body: a certain something, experience only will enable us to know. Some suppose the spirit leaves the body the third day. 'The Scripture nowhere affirms, that the same numerical body shall be raised. (See Mackn., and Stale;) it teaches, that the dead shall be raised.' Bl. Id.

V. 35—38. (36) Except it die. Some modern infidels have maintained, against the apostle, that the seed does not die in vegetation; be-

36 Thou fool! that <sup>p</sup> which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die :

37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain :

38 But God <sup>q</sup> giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh : but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 There <sup>r</sup> are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial : but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars : for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption ; it is raised in incorruption.

43 It <sup>t</sup> is sown in dishonor ; it is raised in glory : it is sown in weakness ; it is raised in power :

44 It is sown a natural body ; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual <sup>u</sup> body.

45 And so it is written, <sup>v</sup> The first man Adam was made a living soul ; the <sup>w</sup> last Adam was made a quickening spirit.

46 Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural ; and afterward that which is spiritual.

47 The <sup>x</sup> first man is of the earth, earthy : the second man is the Lord from heaven.

form, stature, members, and qualities, or various ?' The former objection is that of those who opposed the doctrine, the latter the inquiry of curious doubters.

1. To the first, the apostle answers, by telling them, this was to be brought about by divine power, that very power which they had all observed to do somewhat very like it, year after year, in the death and revival of the corn ; and therefore it was an argument of great weakness and stupidity, to doubt whether the resurrection of the dead might not be effected by the same power, v. 36.

2. He is longer on the second inquiry : (1.) There is a change made in the grain sown. God gives it such a body as He will, and in such way as He will, only so as to distinguish all kinds from each other. Every seed sown has its proper body, is constituted of such materials, and figured in such a manner, as are proper to that kind. This is plainly in the divine power, though we no more know how it is done, than we know how a dead man is raised to life again.

(2.) There is a great variety among other bodies, as there is among plants. The true glory of every being consists in its fitness for its rank and state. Earthly bodies are not adapted to the heavenly regions, nor heavenly bodies fitted to the condition of earthly beings. Nay, there is a variety of glory among heavenly bodies themselves, v. 41. All this is to intimate, that the bodies of the dead, when they rise, will be so far changed, that they will be fitted for the heavenly regions ; and that there will be a variety of glories among the bodies of the dead, when they shall be raised, as there is among the sun, and moon, and stars, nay, among the stars themselves. It must be as easy to divine power to raise the dead, and recover their mouldered bodies, as out of the same materials to form so many kinds of flesh and plants, and, for aught we know, celestial bodies as well as terrestrial ones. The sun and stars may, for aught we know, be composed of the same materials as the earth we tread on, though so much refined and changed by the divine skill and power. And can He, out of the same materials, form such various beings, and yet not be able to raise the dead ! Having thus prepared the way, he comes,

[1.] Burying the dead is like sowing them, like committing the seed to the earth, that it may spring out of it again : our bodies, which are sown, are corruptible, will putrefy and moulder to dust ; but when we rise, they will be out of the power of the grave, and never more be liable to corruption. [2.] Ours is at present a vile body, Philip. 3:21. Nothing is more loathsome than a dead body. But, at the resurrection, a glory will be put upon it ; it will be made like the glorious body of our Savior ; it will be purged from all the dregs of earth, and refined into an ethereal substance, and shine out with a splendor resembling his. [3.] It is laid in the earth, a poor, helpless thing, wholly in the power of death, deprived of all vital capacities and powers, of life and strength ; it is utterly unable to move or stir. But when we rise, our bodies will have heavenly life and vigor infused into them ; they shall be hale, firm, durable, lively, and liable no more to any infirmity, weakness, or decay. [4.] It is sown a natural, or animal body, a body fitted to the low condition, and sensitive pleasures and enjoyments of this life, which are all gross, in comparison of the heavenly state and enjoyments. But when we rise, it will be quite otherwise ; our body will rise spiritual, purified and refined ; and, though not changed literally into spirit, yet made fit to be perpetual associates of spirits made perfect. And why should it not be as much in the power of God to raise incorruptible, glorious, lively, spiritual bodies, out of the ruins of those vile, corruptible, lifeless, and animal ones, as first to make matter out of nothing, and then, out of the same mass of matter, produce such variety of beings, both in earth and heaven ? To God all things are possible ; and this cannot be impossible.

(4.) He illustrates this by a comparison of the first and second Adam : There is an animal body, says he, and there is a spiritual body ; and then goes into the comparison, in several instances. [1.] As we have our natural, animal body in this world, from the first Adam, we expect our spiritual body from the second. This is implied in the whole comparison. [2.] This is but consonant to the different characters these two persons bear : The first Adam was made a living soul, such a being as ourselves, and with a power of propagating such beings as himself, and conveying to them a nature and cause the germen lives, and expands itself, and only the extraneous matter corrupts. But, in fact, the seed, as such, does die : it ceases to be a grain of corn ; though a part of it springs, as it were, into new life, by a process which we can no more fully comprehend, than we can the manner of the resurrection. Even 'a prophet of their own,' Lucretius, the Epicurean atheist, says,—'Whatever change transfers a body into a new class of beings, may be justly called the death of the original substance . . . For what is changed from what it was, . . . that dies.' Creech. The body sown is not the same which will exist, when it has sprung up. The identity of the particles of matter, as necessary to the resurrection of the same body, is nowhere mentioned in Scripture ; and this ch. strongly militates against that opinion. God has many other ways of preserving personal identity. Exactly the same particles do not constitute our bodies, for two hours together, in any part of our lives ; yet we are the same persons, both in body and soul, from childhood to old age. There is, then, no necessity to clog the doctrine with this difficulty, which furnishes infidels with their most specious objections against it. Many of the philosophers, and afterwards of the heretics, considered the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul, from which it would, at death, be delivered. Such men, indeed, could not but dislike the doctrine of the resurrection, and be disposed to argue against it ; yet the passage does not refer to objectors of this kind ; at least, there is no proof that it does.

'The Gr. conveys, here again urge the difference, meant to be denoted, in the condition of the righteous and the wicked, and the comparative difference of individuals in both. Theoph. says, "glory," as to sinners, must mean situation. And Theod. appeals to the words of our Lord, "in my Father's house are many mansions" (Bl.) ; each individual will go where he belongs, 'to his own place.' Glory. Applied to celestial bodies (so Kr.), both the lucidus fulgor, and the external beauty of appearance, and consequent dignity and magnificence ; all which is included in the Heb. phar and kebod, both tr. in the Sept. by the Gr. word here. As applied to the terrestrial, doxa [glory] will denote, in general, all such dignity as results from grandeur and beauty of appearance.' Bl.

Upon the whole, however, no clear ideas can we have, [incapable as we are of comprehending either matter or spirit,] on the exact difference between our earthly and our glorified bodies. Indeed, no language could have made us comprehend that difference. Let it be sufficient for us, that we are enabled to say, in the words of the divine Psalmist, "When I awake up after thy likeness, I shall be satisfied with it." Animal body. A body, to the animation of which the presence of an animal soul is necessary : and a spiritual body is one of so fine a contexture, that it will be supported merely by the presence of our rational spirit ; yet, notwithstanding this great difference, the body to be raised will, in a sound sense, be the same with the body that was buried. See Mackn.'

V. 44. Natural body. 'Rather an animal body, which is more suitable to the propriety of the Gr., and to the apostle's meaning, who is here showing, that, as we have animal bodies now (which we derived from Adam) endowed with an animal life, which, unless supported with a constant supply of food, air, &c. will fail and perish, and, at last, do what we can, will dissolve, and come to an end ; so, at the resurrection, we shall have from Christ, the second Adam, "spiritual bodies," which shall have an essential and natural, inseparable life in them, which shall continue and subsist perpetually of itself, without the help of meat and drink, or air, or any such foreign support ; without decay, or any tendency to a dissolution ; of which our Savior speaking, Lu. 20:35. says, "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead," cannot die any more ; for they are equal to the angels, i. e. of an angelical nature and constitution.'

LOCKE.
V. 45—49. In the history of the creation it was written, that 'the first man, Adam, was made a living soul ;' and his 'natural' or animal life had been communicated to all his posterity, but without the spiritual life originally connected with it ; so that, ever since the fall of Adam, all his descendants, by natural generation, are 'dead in sin ;' and the very mind of man had been carnal, as well as his body mortal. But 'the last Adam,' the last Surety, or Covenant-head, of any of the human race, 48 As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy : and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

50 Now this I say, brethren, that <sup>a</sup> flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God ; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, I shew you a mystery : We <sup>a</sup> shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, 52 In a <sup>b</sup> moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump : for the <sup>c</sup> trumpet shall sound, and the dead <sup>d</sup> shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal <sup>e</sup> must put on immortality.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death <sup>f</sup> is swallowed up in victory.

animal body like his own, but none other, nor better. The second Adam is a quickening Spirit; He is the Resurrection and the Life, Jn. 11:25. He hath life in Himself, and quickeneth whom He will, Jn. 5:20, 21. The first man was of the earth, made out of the earth, and was earthy; his body was fitted to the region of his abode; but the second Adam is the Lord from heaven; He who came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world, Jn. 6:33. V. 50-54. Speaking of the whole multitude of believers, to the end of time, as constituting one family, to which he and the Corinthian Christians belonged, he might say, 'We shall not all sleep,' or die, 'but we shall all be changed.' Yet he elsewhere speaks of himself, as one of those who should be 'raised up by Jesus.' 2 Cor. 4:14. So that there can be no ground for the supposition, which many have formed from his language, that he expected to live till the coming of Christ, which he judged to be very near. The notion also of others, that he alluded to the first resurrection, previous to the millennium, is inconsistent with the language of the passage; for those who have died, or shall die before the millennium, as truly 'sleep in Jesus,' though they should arise immediately, as they do, who shall remain in the state of the dead till the general resurrection. Rev. 20:4-6. The apostle therefore only meant to speak of himself as belonging to that one family, of whom the far greater part would die and be raised again, and all the rest must 'be changed.' The apostle showed the Corinthians a mystery, by informing them of the event that would take place; yet, in respect to the manner in which it would be effected, it still remained mysterious and incomprehensible. Thus the mysteries of the Trinity, and of the incarnation of the Lord from heaven, are revealed to us as certainly true; but the manner of them still remains inexplicable. Mat. 13:10, 11. 1 Tim. 3:16. (54) Death, &c.] Much nearer to the Heb. than to the LXX. Is. 25:8. SCOTT.

V. 51-57. To confirm this change, he here,

I. Tells them a mystery, what had been concealed or unknown till then,—that all the saints should not die, but all would be changed. They that are alive at our Lord's coming, will be caught up into the clouds, without dying, 1 Thess. 4:11. But it is plain, from this passage, that it will not be without changing from corruption to incorruption, and this in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, v. 52. What cannot Almighty power effect? This is the mystery, the thing before unknown, which the apostle here shows the Corinthians; and this he tells them will be at the sound of the last trump; for, as he tells us elsewhere, 1 Thes. 4:16. so here, the trumpet must sound. It is the loud summons of all the living, and all the dead, to come and appear at the tribunal of Christ. At this summons the graves shall open; the dead saints shall rise in an incorruptible state, v. 52.

II. He assigns the reason of this change, v. 53. How, otherwise, could the man be a fit inhabitant of the incorruptible regions, or be fitted to possess the eternal inheritance? This corruptible body must be made incorruptible, this mortal body must be changed into immortal, that the man may be capable of enjoying the happiness designed for him.

III. He lets us know what will follow on this change of the living and dead in Christ, v. 54. Is. 25:8. mortality shall be then swallowed up in life, 2 Cor. 5:4. death perfectly subdued and conquered, and saints for ever delivered from its power; therefore will the saints hereupon sing their song of triumph. Then, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, will death be swallowed up, for ever swallowed up, in victory. Christ hinders it from swallowing his saints when they die; but when they are risen again, death shall, as to them, be swallowed up for ever. And, on this destruction of death, will they break out in a song of triumph.

1. They will glory over this great and terrible destroyer, as a vanquished enemy: 'O death, where is thy sting? Where is now thy sting, thy power to hurt? What mischief hast thou done us? We are dead; but, behold, we live again, and shall die no more. We fear no further mischiefs from thee, nor heed thy weapons, but defy thy power, and despise thy wrath. And, O grave, where is thy victory? What is become of it? Where are the spoils and trophies of it? Once we were thy prisoners, but the prison doors are burst open, our shackles are knocked off, and we are for ever released; thy triumphs, grave, are at an end.' In a moment, the power of death, and the conquests and spoils of the grave, are gone; and, as to the saints, the very signs of them will not remain. Where are they?

2. The foundation for this triumph is here intimated, (1.) In the account given whence death had its power to hurt; i. e. from sin, which only puts it into the power of death to hurt and kill. Sin unpardoned, and nothing else, can keep any under his power. And the strength of sin is the law; it is the prehensible. Thus the mysteries of the Trinity, and of the incarnation of the Lord from heaven, are revealed to us as certainly true; but the manner of them still remains inexplicable. Mat. 13:10, 11. 1 Tim. 3:16. (54) Death, &c.] Much nearer to the Heb. than to the LXX. Is. 25:8. SCOTT.

Bp. Marsh completely proves, that cis telos may very well be translated, with triumph, victoriously: a sense I would give it at Mat. 12:23. [20?] Both senses come to the same thing, as Crell. shows, whose note is a model for annotation on such passages of the N. T. as quote the O. T.' Bloomf. Death can be absorbed, lost, done away with for ever (as the prophet has it) only by changing our mortality to immortality, which is a victory over death, an eternal triumph. See Crell. and Bloomf. The Heb. means for ever, but comes from a word signifying to conquer. Ed.

divine threatening against the transgressors of the law, the curse there denounced, that gives power to sin. Note, Sin is the parent of death, and gives it all its hurtful power, Rom. 5:12. (2.) In the account given of the victory saints obtain over it through Jesus Christ, v. 57. the curse of the law is removed by our Redeemer's becoming a Curse for us; so that sin is deprived of its strength and sting, through Christ, i. e. by his incarnation, suffering, and death. By dying, He conquered death, and spoiled the grave; and, through faith in Him, believers become sharers in his conquests. They often rejoice beforehand, in the hope of his victory; and, when they rise glorious from the grave, will boldly triumph over death. Note, It is altogether owing to the grace of God in Christ, that sin is pardoned, and death disarmed. It is by the grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, that we are freely justified, Rom. 3:24. It is no wonder, therefore, (3.) If this triumph of the saints over death should issue in thanksgiving to God, v. 57. The way to sanctify all our joy is, to make it tributary to the PRACT. OBS. V. 20—53. Blessed be God, we have the most complete and satisfactory proof, that Christ both 'died for our sins,' and rose again for our justification, and as 'the First-fruits' of our resurrection; that, as death entered by man, so might life eternal be introduced by One in our nature.—Should we lose sight of the animating prospect in the preceding vs. set before us; should any one prevail in attempting to argue us out of these our expectations; how must our zeal, diligence, and boldness be enervated, and our rejoicing damped! Let us then fear associating with skeptical, profligate, or ungodly men; let us warn our children, our juniors, our hearers, to shun them; let us 'awake to righteousness, and sin not;' let us not hearken to those, who know not God, in whatever science else they may excel; being assured that this innocence will be found shameful, in proportion to the abilities, opportunities, confidence, or profession, of those in whom it is found. If any are still disposed to start objections, or make presumptuous inquiries, when truths are scripturally proposed, let them remember the appellation the apostle, or rather the Holy Spirit, gives to such 'wise men of this world.' For they may thence learn, that man's wisdom consists in becoming 'a little child,' and simply believing his Maker. The works of creation and providence read us daily lectures of humility, as well as teach us to admire the variety of the great Creator's wisdom and goodness.—They, who 'shall be accounted worthy' to obtain felicity in the heavenly state,

V. 55—58. With the glorious prospect before the eyes of his faith and hope, the apostle, in the most beautiful and animated apostrophe, addressed 'death and the grave,' or the unseen state, as real persons, the universal and most terrible conquerors and oppressors of the human race.

(55.) Sting.] Some think, the allusion is derived from hunting. Others refer it to the Jews' representing the angel of death with an up-lifted dart, or spear. But the sacred writers arm him with a sword; 1 Chr. 21:15, 16. Gen. 3:24, and kenyon [tr. sting] is never used of a sword, but of a goad; as Prov. 2:3. Sir. 33:26. Ac. 9:5. It was properly used, however, of the spear or dart, as many poets, ancient and modern, represent death. But the Gr. comtrs. better derive it from the sting of serpents, scorpions, or other venomous monsters, Rev. 9:10. Hos. 13:14. The sting of such constitutes their strength; taken away, their power to hurt is gone: so it is with death and the grave. Grave.] Hades.

(56.) Law.] Nomos: not the Mosaic, particularly, but all law, law in general; and sin means, not only original, (derived from our first parents,) but actual sin. On the acquittal of the righteous at the judgment, [316] praise of God: this really improves and exalts our satisfaction. And what can be more joyous in itself, than the saints' triumph over death, when they shall rise again? Those who remain under the power of death, can have no heart to praise; but such conquests and triumphs will certainly tune the tongues of the saints to thankfulness and praise; praise for the victory, (it is great and glorious in itself,) and for the means whereby it is obtained; it is given of God through Christ Jesus; not given because we are worthy, but because Christ is so, and has, by dying, obtained this conquest for us. Must not this circumstance endear the victory to us, and heighten our praise to God? How many springs of joy to the saints, and thanksgiving to God, are opened by the death and resurrection, the sufferings and conquests, of our Redeemer! With what acclamations will saints, rising from the dead, applaud Him! How will the heavens of heavens resound his praises for ever! Thanks be to God, will be the burden of their song; and angels will join the chorus, and declare their consent with a loud Amen, Hallelujah.

V. 58. In this v. we have the improvement of the whole argument, in an exhortation, enforced by a motive resulting plainly from it.

I. An exhortation, and this threefold. 1. That they should be steadfast,—firm, fixed in the faith of the Gospel, that Gospel which he had preached, and they had received, v. 3,4. and fixed in the faith of the glorious resurrection of the sanctified dead, which, as he had shown, had so near and necessary a connexion with the former. Note, Christians should be steadfast believers of this great article of the resurrection of the dead. It is evidently founded on the death of Christ. Because He lives, his servants shall live also, Jn. 14:19. And it is of the last importance; a disbelief of a future life will open a way to all manner of licentiousness, and corrupt men's morals to the last degree. It will be easy and natural from hence to infer, that we may live like beasts, and eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. 2. He exhorts them to be unmovable, in their hope and expectation of this great privilege, of being raised incorruptible and immortal. Christians should not be moved away from will excel in glory all present splendors, far more than the celestial bodies transcend the terrestrial; and yet they shall exceed one another in glory, as 'one star differeth from another;' while Christ, 'the Sun of righteousness,' shall infinitely outshine them all. Here our very souls are carнал; there our very bodies will be spiritual. And our 'second Adam, the Lord from heaven,' will give new and immortal life, as 'a quickening Spirit,' both to our souls and bodies, that in both, according to our measure, we may bear his image and glorify his name.—Let us seek the full assurance of faith and hope, that we may triumph in the midst of pain, and in the prospect of dissolution.—But 'sin is the sting of death,' and who can disarm that 'king of terrors?' For 'the law is the strength of sin,' and who can answer its demands, endure its curse, or expiate his own transgressions? Hence the terror and the anguish; hence the wretched cleave to life, save when infidelity, despair, and rebellion, induce madness [or] suicide. Hence, death is justly terrible to the unbelieving and impenitent; hence, the needless alarms of the weak and trembling believer. 'Thanks be to God,' that there is deliverance, and victory, for us in Christ Jesus! Rom. 7:22—25. May He give us faith and hope, and increase our faith and hope; that we may not only be safe, but joyful and triumphant! And, having these assurances, let us be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; as knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord? 1 Jn. 3:1—3. Sc.

from that time forth, there shall be neither sin nor law, (says Mackn.) with the penalty of death annexed.

(58.) Abounding.] Endeavoring continually to make progress. Theoph.—Work of the Lord.] Doing all the Lord would have us to do, as Christians, including virtue of every kind. So the Gr. comtrs., and Vorst. These good works, it seems, many (out of disbelief or distrust of the resurrection) had neglected. Not in vain.] I incline to think P. made use of this expression, purposely to hint at that modesty with which all human works should ever be spoken of with reference to any reward. In, &c.] I. e. in the sight of God.

NOTES. CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. It is evident, that the Corinthians had been previously made acquainted with the apostle's intention, of raising a contribution from the Gentile churches, for the poor Christians in Judea; and, as they were more wealthy than most of their brethren, he did not intimate even a doubt of their liberality in that good work. Some are of opinion, that the sums, thus set apart, were brought to the treasury of the church at the time; but the words do not seem to admit of that interpretation; and if each separately laid by the sum which he purposed to give, the whole would be brought together at once, when this hope of the Gospel, Col. 1:23. this glorious and blessed hope: they should not renounce or resign their comfortable expectations. Should they part with their hope? Should they suffer it to be shaken? 3. He exhorts them to abound in the work of the Lord, and that always: they should be diligent and persevering herein, going ever on toward perfection. The most cheerful duty, the greatest diligence, the most constant perseverance, become those who have such glorious hopes. What vigor and resolution what constancy and patience, should those hopes inspire!

11. The motive resulting from the former discourse is, that their labor shall not be in vain in the Lord; nay, they know it shall not. They have the best grounds in the world to build upon; they have all the assurance that can rationally be expected: as sure as Christ is risen, they shall rise; and Christ is as surely risen as the Scriptures are true, and the Word of God. Is there any room to doubt a fact so well attested? Note, True Christians have undoubted evidence, that their labor will not be in vain in the Lord; nay, more is implied than is expressed in this phrase. It means that they shall be abundantly rewarded. He will never be found unjust, to forget their labor of love, Heb. 6:10. Nay, He will do exceeding abundantly above what they now ask or think.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—4. In this ch. Paul closes this long epistle with some particular matters of less moment. He begins with directing them about a charitable collection for the Christians in Judea, whose distresses and poverty, at this time, were extraordinary, partly through the general calamities of that nation, and partly through particular sufferings. In this he desired them only to conform to the same rules he had given other churches on the like occasion, v. 1. 2 Cor. 8:13. He mentions his orders to the churches of Galatia, to excite emulation, and stir them up to liberality. The good examples of other Christians and churches should stir in us a holy emulation. The church of Corinth should not be outdone in this service of love by the churches of Galatia, who do not appear to have been enriched with equal spiritual gifts, or worldly wealth.

2 Upon the first <sup>b</sup> day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your <sup>d</sup> liberality unto Jerusalem.

4 And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

5 Now I will come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass through Macedonia.

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

b Ac. 20:7. c 2 Co. 8:19. e 2 Co. 1:15,16.
Re. 1:10. d gift.

1. The manner of the collection, v. 2. Every one should lay by as he could spare, from time to time, and by that method make up a sum for it. It is good to lay up in store for good uses. They who are rich in this world, should be rich in good works, 2 Tim. 6:17, 18. The best way to be so, is, to appropriate of their income, and have a treasury for this purpose; by this mean they will be ready to every good work as the opportunity offers; and many who labor with their own hands for a livelihood, should so work, that they may have to give to him that needeth, Eph. 4:28: Their treasury for good works can never be very large; but the best way in the world for them to get a treasury for this purpose, is, to lay by, from time to time, as they can afford. Some of the Greek fathers rightly observe here, that this advice was given for the sake of the poorer among them. They were to lay by, from week to week, and not bring in to the common treasury, that, by this mean, their contributions might be easy to themselves, and yet grow into a fund for the relief of their brethren. Indeed, all our charity and benevolence should be free and cheerful, and, for that reason, should be made as easy to ourselves as may be. And what more likely way to make us easy in this matter, than thus to lay by? We may cheerfully give, when we know we can and have been laying by in store, that we may spare.

2. The measure in which they are to lay by, as God hath prospered them. All our business and labor are that to us, which God is pleased to make them. The diligent hand will not make rich by itself, without the divine blessing, Prov. 10:4, 22. It is God's bounty and blessing to which we owe all we have; and whatever we have, is to be used, and employed, and improved, for Him. And what argument more proper to excite us to charity to the people and children of God? When God blesses and prospers us, we should be ready to relieve and comfort his needy servants; good from Him should stir us up to do good to others, to resemble Him in our beneficence; and therefore the more good we receive from God, the more we should do good to others. God expects our beneficence to others should hold some proportion to his bounty to us.

3. The time when this is to be done, Lu. 24:1. the Lord's day, when public assemblies were held, and public worship was celebrated, and the Christian institutions and mysteries, (as the ancients called them,) were attended upon; then let every one lay by him. Works of mercy are the genuine fruits of true love to God, and therefore are a proper service on his own day. God's day is a proper season, on which to lay up for charitable uses, or lay out in them, according as He has prospered us: it is paying tribute for the blessings of the past week, and it is a proper way to procure his blessing on the work of our hands for the next.

4. The disposal of the collections; though the apostle would have everything ready against he came, v. 2. he would leave it much to themselves, as was fit. Paul pretended not to lord it over the purses of his hearers; he would not meddle with their contributions without their consent. He tells them, (1.) They should give letters of credence, and send messengers of their own with their liberality, v. 2. a proper testimony of their respect and brotherly love to their distressed brethren; and it would argue, too, that they were very hearty in this service. We should not only charitably relieve our poor fellow-Christians, but do it in such a way as will best signify our compassion, and care of them, [and respectful consideration of their feelings.] (2.) He offers to go with their messengers, if they thought proper, v. 4. He would go, rather than the charity of the Corinthians should fail of a due effect. It was no hindrance to his preaching work, but a great furtherance to its success, to show such a tender and benign disposition of mind. Ministers are doing their proper business, when promoting or helping in works of charity.

V. 5—9. In this passage, the apostle notifies and explains his purpose of coming to visit them; concerning which, observe,

1. His purpose; he intended to pass out of Asia, where he now was, see v. 8—19. and to go through Macedonia into Achaia, where Corinth was, and to stay some time with them, and perhaps the winter, v. 5, 6. No wonder Paul was willing to see Corinth, and stay with them as long as the other duties of his office would permit. Though some despised him, and made a faction against him, doubtless many loved him tenderly, and paid him all the respect due to an apostle, and their spiritual father. And is it any wonder he should be willing to visit them, and stay with them! And as to the rest, who now showed disrespect, he might hope to bring them to a better temper, and thereby rectify what was out of order in the church, by staying among them for some time. It is plain he hoped for some good effect, because he says he intended to stay, that they might bring him on his journey, whithersoever he went, v. 6. i. e. furnish him for it, help and encourage him to it. He is to be understood, of being brought forward in his journey after a godly sort, as expressed 3 John v. 6. so that nothing might be wanting to him, as himself speaks, Tit. 3:13.

2. His excuse for not seeing them now; because it would be only by the way, v. 7. a transient visit; but another time he could tarry longer.

3. The limitation of this purpose, v. 7. It is to be understood, not of a purpose proceeding from any extraordinary motion or impulse of the Spirit of God, but of a com-necessary, without any trouble in soliciting [petty] contributions. If this [what each contributed] was kept apart by each person, till wanted, so that none knew what others gave, ostentation and corrupt emulation would be far more effectually excluded, than if each brought his contribution to the common stock every week, and so a public account was taken of it. It was especially needful, that this precaution should be taken at Corinth, where ostentation and emulation greatly prevailed; and it is evident, that the apostle intended, as much as possible, to leave every one, in this respect, to determine for himself, before God, what he ought to do; that none might give more than he could properly spare, or than he was from proper motives inclined to, either to acquire applause, or to escape censure and contempt.—The argument from this passage for the observance of the first day of the week, as 'the Lord's day,' the Christian Sabbath, is very conclusive; for, unless that were the custom in apostolical churches, why should 'the first day of the week' be mentioned in this connexion? 'On Sunday,' says Justin Martyr, 'all Christians, in the city or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection; and then we read the writings of the prophets and apostles. This being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, exhorting them to imitate and do the things which they have heard. then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament.' *Whitby. Pearce thinks the Christians' layings up were weekly, and the contributions to the common treasury monthly.' Bl. Ed.

V. 3, 4. Everything having been previously arranged, the apostle, when he arrived at Corinth, would send with the bounty of the Corinthians such persons as they approved, and would recommend by their letters. Or, joining the words, 'by letters,' with the latter cl., whomsoever they approved, the apostle would send, with letters from himself, to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem; but if it was thought more satisfactory to all concerned, he himself would accompany the messengers 2 Cor. 8:16—24.

V. 5—9. Perhaps he intended to sail from Ephesus to Corinth first; then, after a short stay, to go into Macedonia, and afterwards return to winter there. It is evident, from the concluding salutation, that the apostle wrote this epistle from Ephesus, though the spurious addition at the close dates it from Philippi. It is probable, that the tumult made at Ephesus by Demetrius, hastened the apostle's departure; (Notes, Acts 19:21—41.) and his plan seems, in other respects, to have been circumstantially deranged. The whole sentence is idiotical or popular.—Of this journey Luke makes no mention in Acts, for what is mentioned 20:3. can have no reference thereto. On this question see Est., Lightf., Beza, Grot., &c., who, however, bring nothing to any certainty. Probably there was nothing material to record, it being one merely of ordinary visitation and spiritual confirmation.' BLOOMER.

We should say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this and that, Ja. 4:15. Heathens have concurred in acknowledging this concern of Providence in all our actions and concerns: surely we should readily own it, and seriously attend to it.

4. His purpose expressed, of staying at Ephesus for the present, till Pentecost, v. 8. It is very probable he was, at the time of writing this epistle, in Ephesus, from this passage, compared with v. 19. where he says, The churches of Asia salute you. A proper salutation from Ephesus, but hardly had he been at Philippi, in Macedonia, as the subscription to this epistle, in our common copies, has it. 'The churches of Macedonia' had then been much more proper.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-11. It is incumbent on ministers to exhort their people to liberal charity, especially towards their brethren in Christ, and to direct them in the best way of collecting and applying their contributions—Those weekly collections, therefore, which are made by several excellent societies, and, blessed be God, are becoming more and more general; in which even poor mechanics and laborers, nay children, by the constant payment of trivial contributions, raise annually large sums for the relief of the sick and destitute, and for aiding the distribution of the Scriptures, and the cause of missions into all regions, cannot be too warmly recommended. Thus habits of the best and most useful kind are formed, which conduce eventually likewise to their own temporal comfort and benefit, while an excellent example is exhibited, and the rich are excited to a proportionable liberality. May such societies be established in all the churches of Christ!—Ministers ought not readily to leave those places, in which 'great and effectual

V. 10, 11. Probably Timothy returned to Ephesus, before Paul was driven thence.—'We infer that Timothy was not sent with the epistle, for had he been the bearer of the letter, would St. Paul in that letter have said, "If Timothy come?"... If he was with the apostle, when he wrote the letter, could he say... "I look for him with the brethren?"... door, and an effectual, was opened; but great success in the work of the Gospel commonly creates many enemies. The devil opposes those most, and makes them most trouble, who most heartily and successfully set themselves to destroy his kingdom. Some think he alludes, in this passage, to the custom of the Roman circus, and the doors of it, at which the charioteers were to enter, as their antagonists did at the opposite doors. True courage is whetted by opposition; and it is no wonder the Christian courage of the apostle should be animated by the zeal of his adversaries. Success will give life and vigor to a minister, though enemies rage, and blaspheme, and persecute. It is not the opposition of enemies, but the hardness and obstinacy of his hearers, and the backslidings and revolt of professors, that damp a faithful minister, and break his heart.

V. 10-12. In this passage,

1. He recommends Timothy to them, in several particulars. As, (1.) He bids them take care that he should be among them without fear, v. 10. Timothy was sent by the apostle to correct abuses among them; they were all in factions, and, no doubt, mutual strife and hatred ran very high among them; some were very rich, probably, and many very proud, on account both of their wealth and spiritual gifts. It was reasonable, therefore, to think young Timothy might be roughly used; hence the apostle warns them against using him ill. Christians should bear faithful reproof from their ministers, and not terrify and discourage them from doing their duty. (2.) He warns them against despising him, v. 11. He was but a young man, and alone, as Œcumenius observes. Not that he distrusted Timothy, but a caution was but too necessary for the Corinthians. Note, Christians should be very careful not to condemn any, but especially the faithful ministers of Christ. These, whether young or old, are to be had in high esteem for their work's sake. (3.) He tells them they should give him all due encouragement; and, as an evidence of this, they should send him away in friendship, and well prepared for his journey back again to Paul. This, as I have above observed, is the meaning of bringing him on his journey in peace, v. 11. [Comp. on Ac. 10:23.] Faithful ministers are not only to be well received by a people among whom they may for a season minister, but are to be sent away with due respect.

2. He assigns the reasons why they should behave thus towards Timothy. (1.) He was employed in the same work as Paul, and acted in it by the same authority, v. 10. therefore to vex his spirit, would be to grieve the Holy Spirit; to despise him, would be to despise Him that sent him; not Paul, but Paul's Lord and theirs. (2.) Another reason is implied; as they were to esteem him for his work's sake, so also for Paul's sake, who had sent him to Corinth; not of his own errand, indeed, but to work the work of the Lord, v. 11. Paul might expect from the Corinthians, that a messenger from him, on such an errand, should be regarded, and well treated. 'I and the brethren expect his return, wait for the report he is to make; and therefore do not use him ill, but respect him, regard his message, and let him return in peace.'

3. He informs them of Apollos' purpose to see them. (1.) Though one party among them had declared for Apollos, against Paul, if that passage is to be understood literally, ch. 4:6. yet Paul did not hinder Apollos from going to Corinth in his own absence, nay, he pressed him to go thither. He had no suspicions of Apollos, as if he would lessen Paul's interest and respect among them, to the advancement of his own. Note, Faithful ministers are not apt to entertain jealousies of each other, or suspect self-designs. True charity and brotherly love think no evil. (2.) Apollos could not be prevailed on, for the present, to come, but would at a more convenient season. When Paul's epistle to them, and Timothy's ministry among them, had reduced them to a right temper, he might conclude a visit would be more proper. But as it is, Paul signifies his great regard to the church of Corinth, when they had used him ill, by entreating Apollos to go to them; and Apollos shows his respect to Paul, and his concern to keep up his character and authority, by declining the journey till the Corinthians were in better temper. It is very becoming the ministers of the Gospel, to have and manifest a concern for each other's reputation and usefulness.

V. 13-18. I. The apostle gives some doors are opened to them,' even though there be many adversaries; nay, this circumstance may often render it more incumbent on them to continue in their post, though dangerous and difficult; that they may establish and encourage the weak or wavering. Neh. 6:10-14. Acts 6:1-6.—It is wonderful, that those who attend on the work of the Lord, in the most faithful manner, should have cause for fear, even among professors of the Gospel, or be in danger of being despised and disquieted by them. Yet the prevalence of party, the influence of corrupt teachers, or the infection of antinomian principles, frequently produce this effect; especially when those who are required to 'reprove, rebuke, and exhort with all authority,' are young, diffident, or deficient in external accomplishments. But senior ministers should use their influence to repress this spirit; that their faithful young brethren may be secured from contempt, enabled to do their work in peace, and receive due kindness from those among whom they labor. (11.) Brethren.] 'Grot. understands, others who had gone on the journey to Corinth (through Macedonia), with Timothy, namely, (as Mackn.) Erastus, who had been sent with Timothy to Corinth, Ac. 19:22, and Titus, who carried this letter, and another brother, whose name is not mentioned; (see 2 Cor. 12:17, 18.) perhaps, also, some of the Corinthian brethren, whom P. had desired Titus to bring with him to Ephesus, having need of their assistance there.' Ib.

V. 12. Brethren.] 'The Latin comrs. are of opinion, that Apollos, displeased with the behavior of the faction, had left them, as incorrigible, and had returned to Ephesus, from whence he had been recommended to the brethren of Achaia, Ac. 18:24, 27. 19:1. But the messengers from Corinth, arriving with a letter to P., full of respect, he answered it by Titus, and requested Apollos to accompany him, in the hope that he might be useful in assisting Titus to settle the disturbances in that church. But Apollos refused to go, knowing the violent temper of the faction.' Mackn. 'Kr. and Ros., regard the opinion as highly probable, but yet not certain. It is, I think, little less than certain. His will, &c.] Lit. there was not, upon the whole, to him an inclination to go now. The Latin fathers, as Hilary, and Jerome, have preserved a tradition, that Apollos did afterwards visit the Corinthian church, when the religious differences had been settled.' Ib.

general advices; as, 1. That they should watch, v. 13. be wakeful and on their guard. This a Christian should always do, and sometimes especially. The Corinthians were in manifest danger on many accounts: their feuds ran high; the irregularities among them were very great; there were deceivers got among them, who endeavored to corrupt their faith in the most important articles,—those, without which the practice of virtue and piety could never subsist. And, surely, in such dangerous circumstances, it was their concern to watch. Note, If a Christian would be secure, he must be on his guard; and the more his danger, the greater vigilance is needful for his security. 2. He advises them to stand fast in the faith, to adhere to the revelation of God, and not give it up for the wisdom of the world, nor suffer it to be corrupted by it; maintaining the faith, even to death; and so abide in it, and feel and yield to its influence. A Christian should be fixed in the faith of the Gospel, and never desert or renounce it. By faith alone, he will be able to keep his ground in an hour of temptation: by faith we stand, 2 Cor. 1:24. and by that we must overcome the world, 1 Jn. 5:4. both when it fawns and when it frowns; when it tempts, and when it terrifies. We must stand, therefore, in the faith of the Gospel, if we would maintain our integrity. 3. He advises them to act like men, and be strong; 'Be manly, firm, resolved, in opposition to the bad men who would divide and corrupt you; be not terrified or inveigled by them; but show yourselves men in Christ, by your steadiness, sound judgment, and firm resolution.' Christians should be manly and firm in all their contests with their enemies, in defending their faith, and maintaining their integrity, especially in those points of faith that lie at the foundation of sound and practical religion, such as were attacked among the Corinthians: these must be maintained with solid judgment, and strong resolution. 4. He advises them to do everything in charity, v. 14. When the apostle would have us play the man for our faith and religion, he puts in a caution against playing the devil for it: the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God, Ja. 1:21. Note, Christians should be careful that charity not only reign in their hearts, but shine out in their lives, nay, in their most manly defences of the Gospel. There is a great difference between constancy and cruelty, between Christian firmness and feverish wrath and transport. Christianity never appears to so much advantage, as when the charity of Christians is most conspicuous; when they can bear with their mistaken brethren, and oppose the open enemies of their holy faith, in love; when everything is done in charity; when they behave towards one another, and towards all men, with a spirit of meekness and good-will.

II. He gives some particular directions how they should behave toward some that had been eminently servicable to the cause of Christ among them.

1. He gives us their character. (1.) The household of Stephanas; and their character is, that they were the first-fruits of Achaia; the first converts to Christianity in that region of Greece in which Corinth was. Note, It is an honorable character to any man, to be early a Christian. They had, moreover, addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints; not to the ministry of the Word, properly, but to serving them in other respects, both in their temporal and spiritual concerns. The family of Stephanas seems to have been a family of rank and importance; and it is an honor to such to devote themselves to the service of the saints. (2.) He mentions Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, as coming to him from the church of Corinth, and supplying the deficiencies of the church toward him, and, by so doing, refreshing his spirits and theirs, v. 17, 18. They gave him a more perfect account of the state of the church than he had had by letter, and he had been made more easy by converse with them. It is a great refreshment to the spirit of a faithful minister, to bear better of a people by wise and good men of their own body, than by common report; and the greater value he has for those who give him this information, and the more he can depend on their truth, the greater is his joy.

2. On this account of the men, he directs how they should behave toward them; and, (1.) He would have them acknowledged, v. 18. i. e. owned and respected. They deserve it for their good offices. They who discover so good a spirit, cannot easily be overvalued. (2.) He advises, that they should submit themselves to such, and to all who helped with the apostles, and labored, v. 16. This is not to be understood of subjection to proper superiors, but of a voluntary acknowledgment of their worth. They were persons to whom they owed peculiar respect, and whom they should have in veneration. Note, It is a venerable character they bear, who serve the saints, and labor hard to help the success of the Gospel; who countenance and encourage the faithful ministers of Christ, and endeavor to promote their usefulness. Such should be had in honorable esteem.

V. 19—24. The apostle closes his epistle,

I. With salutations to the church of Corinth: first, from those of Asia, from Priscilla and Aquila, (who seem to have been, at this time, inhabitants of Ephesus, Acts 17:26.) with the church in their house, v. 19. and from all the brethren, v. 20. at Ephesus, where, it is highly probable, at least, he then was. Christianity does by no means destroy civility and good manners. Paul could find room, in an epistle treating of very important matters, to send the salutations of friends. Some of these salute them much in the Lord; for Christian salutations are not empty compliments. We read, also, of a church in a private family, v. 19. It is very probable the family itself is called the church in their house. Every Christian family should, in some respects, be a Christian church. To these salutations he subjoins, 1. An advice, that they should greet one another with a holy kiss, v. 20. or with sincere good-will,—a tacit reproof of their feuds and factions. Note, The love of the brethren should be a powerful incentive to mutual love. When the other churches of Christ love us all, we are very culpable, if we do not love one another. 2. He subjoins his own salutation, v. 21. His amanuensis, it is reasonable to think, wrote the rest of his epistle from his mouth; but, at the close, it was fit that himself should sign it, that they might know it to be genuine; therefore it is added, 2 Thess. 3:17. Which is my token in every epistle; the mark of its being genuine; so he wrote in every epistle which he did not wholly pen, as he did that to the Galatians, Gal. 6:11. Note, Those churches to whom apostolical letters were sent, were duly certified of their being authentic and divine.

family, consisting wholly of Christian converts," as the jailer's house, Ac. 16:31, 32. and that of Crispus, 18:8. "When it was otherwise, (says Whit.) and the family were not entirely converted, P. alters his style, speaking of 'them of his household,' Rom. 16:10, 11. Phil. 4:22. or 'those that are with them,' Rom. 16:14, 15." But this mode of interpretation is manifestly harsh and improbable. And it is quite gratuitous to add, (as does Dodd.) "for you know their family is happy, in a large number of Christian converts." Far more natural is the sense assigned by Chrys., and all the Gr. comtrs., and, of the moderns, Mede, Wells, Pearce, Slade, and Jaspis, namely, "the congregation that was accustomed to meet for divine worship, at their house:" [for it is not probable the Christians were yet allowed to build churches.] And this sense has the advantage of including the other. PRACT. OBS. V. 12—24. The zealous servants of Christ are commonly haraonious among themselves, even when their injudicious hearers place them in competition with each other.—Exhortations to vigilance, constancy in duty, steadfastness in the faith, and mutual love, can never be unseasonable. We should also willingly submit to those, who are experienced and mature in the faith of Christ, or who labor to promote that cause, for which the apostles spent and laid down their lives.—Christians, though divided by seas and mountains, and though they disapprove of some things in each other's creed or practice, will yet cordially love and pray for one another. But they, who 'love not the Lord Jesus Christ,' can be Christians only in name, and they must certainly ma; . . . and to express their faith, that God would in one way or other interpose to add that efficacy to his own sentence, which they could not give it, it is very probable that they might use the word Maran-atha, i. e. in Syriac, "The Lord cometh;" and He will put the sentence in execution." Doddr.

the words as they lie, in their plain and obvious meaning, for such as are without holy and sincere affection for the Lord Jesus Christ. There are many Christians in name, who do not love Christ Jesus the Lord in sincerity. But can anything be more criminal or provoking? Not love the most glorious Lover in the world! 2. 'Let such a person lie under the heaviest and most dreadful curse. Let him be separated from the people of God, from the favor of God, and delivered up to his final, irrevocable, and inexorable vengeance.' Maran-atha is a Syriac phrase, and signifies The Lord cometh. That very Lord whom they do not love, to whom they are inwardly and really disaffected, whatever outward profession they make, He is coming to execute judgment. And to be exposed to his wrath, to be divided to his left hand, to be condemned by Him,—how dreadful! If He will destroy, who can save? Those who fall under his condemning sentence, must perish, and that for ever, Jn. 3:26.

III. The apostle closes all with his good wishes, and expressions of good-will. I. With his good wishes, v. 23. As much as if he had said, 'Though I warn you against falling under his displeasure, I heartily wish you an interest in his dearest love, and his eternal favor.' The most solemn warnings are the result of the tenderest affection and the greatest good-will. We may tell our brethren and friends, with great plainness and pathos, that, if they love not the Lord Jesus Christ, they must perish, while we heartily wish the grace of Christ may be with them. Note, also, How much true Christianity enlarges our hearts; it makes us wish those whom we love, the blessings of both worlds; for this is implied in wishing the grace of Christ to be with them. And therefore it is no wonder that he adds, 2. The declaration of his love to them, in Christ Jesus, v. 24. He had dealt very plainly with them, told them of their faults with just severity; but to show that he was not transported with passion, he makes solemn profession of his love to them, nay, to them all in Christ Jesus, i. e. for Christ's sake. We should love all men, and wish them well, and do them what good is in our power; but they must have our dearest affection, who are dear to Christ, and lovers of Him. May our love be with all them who are in Christ Jesus! Amen.

abide under an awful curse, which the Lord when He cometh will execute. P. O. Mat. 25:41—46. Our obligations to the divine Savior, and our reasons for loving Him, are infinite; yet many, who are called by his name, who profess his truth, nay, who preach his Gospel, are strangers to this holy love, and only seek their own advantage, credit, ease, or pleasure, in their religious performances. Let us then call ourselves to account in this matter, and not be satisfied with any religion, which does not include and express the supreme love of Christ, earnest desires of his salvation, gratitude for his mercies, zeal for his glory, and obedience to his commandments. SCOTT.

(22) 'The Jews began with the words Anathema Maran-atha, their greater excommunication, whereby they not only excluded sinners from their society, [and the charities of life,] but delivered them up to the divine Cherem, or Anathema, i. e. eternal perdition.' MACKN.

ADDITIONAL NOTE.—CHRISTIAN UNION.

The sectarianism Paul noticed with great grief and displeasure among the primitive Christians, needs now also to be noticed in the churches, who are invited prayerfully to consider the following extract from a 'Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches, together with a Plan for Catholic Union on Apostolical Principles.'

'When the sincere and unsophisticated Christian contemplates the image of the church as delineated both in its theory and practice by the Savior and his apostles, he is charmed by the delightful spirit of unity and brotherly love by which it is characterized,—[growing up into Him in all things which is the Head, even Christ; from whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love.] When he hears the beloved disciple declare "God is love, and they that dwell in love dwell in God;" and again, "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love;" and again, "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.—If any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from His, that he who loveth God, love his brother also."—When the Christian listens to such declarations as these, and numerous others of similar import; when, forgetting things as they exist around him, he brings his whole soul under the influence of this love to God and the brethren; he perceives the moral beauty of these sentiments, and finds his heart vibrate in delightful unison with them. But when he awakes from this fascinating dream, and beholds the body of Christ rent into different divisions, separately organized, professing different creeds, denouncing each other as in error, and oftentimes, hating and being hated; his spirit is grieved within him, and he asks, how can these things be among brethren? In the sacred record he looks in vain for the sectarian parties which now constitute all that is seen of the church of the Redeemer; he finds nothing there of Lutherans, of Presbyterians, of Methodists, of Episcopians, of Baptists. But he sees, that when the formation of such parties was attempted at Corinth, Paul deemed it necessary to write them a long letter, and besought them, by the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to have no divisions among them. The Christian is, therefore, constrained to mourn over the desolations of Zion, and to meet the solemn inquiry, cannot a balm be found for the ulcerous divisions which deface the body of Christ?

'Let us premise, as admitted, that,

a) There must necessarily be different forms of worship; and

b) Different congregations, as in the apostle's days.

c) That all the several denominations termed orthodox, which are but clusters of such different congregations, are parts of the true, visible church of Christ; because, in the conscientious judgment of all enlightened Christians, they hold the essentials of the gospel-scheme of faith and practice; and secondly, because the Savior Himself has acknowledged them as such by the seal of his grace and Spirit. "When James, Cephas, and John perceived the grace that was given to me," says Paul, (Gal. 2:9) "they gave to me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship." And where is the bigot, who, at the present day, would claim his to be the only true church, and thus repudiate all others as synagogues of Satan?

d) These denominations hold dissentient views on some non-essential points; but the pretension, that any one is right in all things, and all others in error so far as they diverge from this one, is highly improbable in itself, is forbidden by Christian humility, by a knowledge of human nature, and by the amount of talent, learning, and piety, in all the several churches: hence some error, in all probability, is an attribute of each sect.

e) Finally, we premise, that ministers and laymen, though pious, are fallible, are sanctified but in part, and liable to temptation from secular motives and feelings, even in things pertaining to the Redeemer's kingdom. Hence, they are all under obligation (and let the reader and writer feel deeply impressed with this), to review their course of thought and action, and ought to be willing, for the glory of their God and Savior, to retrace and amend whatever may be found amiss.

Being, then, all more or less in error, is it right that these diversities should sever the bond of fraternal love, that unity, reading Christ's body into parts? Should not Christians then endeavor to heal these divisions, and promote unity among all whom they profess to regard as disciples of Christ? The will of our Master will become apparent to us while we successively consider,

I. The Scriptural injunctions.

II. The example of the apostles and primitive Christians.

III. The consequences which these divisions produce.

1. 'The church of Corinth had been planted by Paul, watered by Apollos, and blessed by Him, from whom alone can come any genuine increase. In it however there appeared symptoms of the spirit of sectarianism, an attempt to introduce different sects or religious denominations into the church of Christ, ranged under different leaders, such as Paul, Apollos, Peter, Luther, Calvin, Zuingli, or Wesley; and what are the feelings of the noble-minded Paul? "I beseech you," such is his powerful and decided testimony against the spirit of sectarianism, "I beseech you by (the hope you cherish through) the Lord Jesus Christ (by his suffering, his blood), that there be no schisms (schismata) or sects among you . . . Is Christ (i. e. the body of Christ) divided? Was Paul (or either of those whose names ye assume, and whom ye wish to place at the side of Christ, as leaders or heads of the church) crucified for you? Or were ye baptized into the name of Paul?" (or of Apollos, or of Peter, so that ye were received into their church, and not into the church of Christ.) . . .

'The apostle does not even introduce into his argument their points of diversity. . . . The simple facts, that they were baptized into Christ, and into Christ alone, i. e. were members of the church in good standing, and that Christ must not be divided, are the only arguments he deems requisite to prove the impropriety of their divisions, and of their assumption of different names. He would have them Christians and nothing but Christians; not Paulian Christians, nor Apolline, nor Cephaic, nor Lutheran, nor Calvinistic, nor Wesleyan Christians, not because he had any antipathy to Apollos or Peter; but because any such divisions, based on difference of opinions or personal attachments, naturally tended to rend asunder the body of Christ. . . . He therefore distinctly forbids the cutting up of those whom he would acknowledge as Christians at all, into different parties or sects. And this he does even by anticipation, for, in all probability, these parties had not yet fully separated from one another, nor renounced ecclesiastical inter-communication. . . .

OF THE
SECOND EPISTLE OF
PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. D. Mayo.)

IN his former epistle, the apostle had signified his intentions of coming to Corinth, as he passed through Macedonia, ch. 16: 6. but being providentially hindered for some time, he writes his second epistle to them about a year after the former; and there seem to be these two great urgent occasions: 1. The ease of the incestuous person, who lay under censure, required that with all speed he should be restored and received again into communion. This, therefore, he gives directions about, ch. 2. and afterward, ch. 7. he declares the satisfaction he had on the intelligence he received of their good behavior in that affair. 2. There was a contribution now making for the poor saints at Jerusalem, which he exhorts the Corinthians to join in, *ch. 8, 9.**

There are divers other things very observable in this epistle: I. The account the apostle gives of his labors and success in preaching the Gospel in several places, ch. 2. II. The comparison he makes between the Old and New Test. dispensation, ch. 3. III. The manifold sufferings he and his fellow-laborers met with, and the motives and encouragements for their diligence and patience, ch. 4, 5. IV. The caution he gives the Corinthians against mingling themselves with unbelievers, ch. 6. V. The way and manner in which he justifies himself and his apostleship from the opprobrious insinuations and accusations of false teachers, who endeavored to ruin his reputation at Corinth, ch. 10—12. and throughout the whole epistle. †

Having heard by Titus, that his first epistle had produced very good effects on many of the Corinthians, ‡ Paul wrote this also, in order to prepare the way more completely for his visit to them; and probably sent it immediately by Titus and some others who accompanied him. 2:12, 13. 7:5—7. — These epistles may appear, to some readers, less interesting than several others, because they mainly refer to the peculiar circumstances of the Corinthian church; but, in fact, they are the more instructive on that very account; || as directions and admonitions, suited to many of the more ordinary incidents of life, are communicated by them; which could not have been so advantageously adduced, in a more general discourse on the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.

HENRY.

SCOTT.

* In it he justified himself from the charge of levity, or worldly policy, in delaying his journey to Corinth; and assigned those reasons for this part of his conduct, which could not have been disclosed with propriety, till the effect of his former epistle had appeared. Note, 1:15—24. He also gave directions respecting the restoration of the incestuous person, who had been excommunicated. 2. He then expatiated on his own conduct in the Christian ministry; intermixing many exhortations with the avowal of his motives and fervent affections, in his sacred work. 3:—7. With great address and earnestness, he recommended to them the collections for the poor Christians at Jerusalem, and showed the manifold advantages of such services. 8:9. At length, he more directly, yet evidently with great reluctance, contrasted his own gifts, labors, sufferings, and conduct, with the pretences of their false teachers; and showed himself 'not a whit' inferior to any of the apostles. He then concluded with various admonitions and affectionate good wishes or prayers. 10:—13.

SCOTT.

† The most remarkable circumstance in this epistle, is the confidence of the apostle in the goodness of his cause, and in the power of God to bear him out in it. Opposed, as he then was, by a powerful and sagacious party, whose authority, reputation, and interest were deeply concerned, and who were ready to seize on everything which could discredit him, it is wonderful to hear him so firmly insist on his apostolical authority, and so unreservedly appeal to the miraculous powers, which he had exercised and conferred at Corinth. So far from shrinking from the contest, as afraid of some discovery being made, unfavorable to himself, or to the common cause, he, with great modesty and meekness, indeed, but with equal boldness and decision, expressly declares, that his opposers and despisers were 'the ministers of Satan;' and menaces to inflict on them miraculous judgments, when as many of their deluded hearers had been brought to repentance, and re-established in the faith, as should in a reasonable time be influenced by the use of proper means. It is inconceivable that a stronger internal testimony, not only of integrity, but of divine inspiration, can exist. Had there been anything of imposture among the Christians, it was next to impossible, but such a conduct must have occasioned the disclosure of it.

ID.

‡ To understand this epistle rightly, the reader must recollect, that as Titus spent some time in Corinth, after delivering the apostle's first letter, he had opportunity to make himself acquainted, not only with the state of the sincere part of the church, but with the temper and behavior of the faction. Wherefore, when he gave the apostle an account of the good disposition of the church, he, no doubt, at the same time informed him concerning the faction, that some of them still continued in their opposition to him, and in their attachment to the false teacher; and that that impostor was going on in his evil practices. Farther, Titus, by conversing with the faction, having learned the arguments and objections by which their leaders endeavored to lessen the apostle's authority, together with the scoffing speeches which they used, to bring him into contempt, we may believe that he rehearsed all these matters to him. Being thus made acquainted with the state of the Corinthian church, Paul judged it fit to write to them this second letter. And that it might have the greater weight, he sent it to them by Titus, the bearer of his former epistle. 2 Cor. 8:17, 18.

|| In this second letter, the apostle [with great skill] introduced the arguments, objections, and scoffing speeches, by which the faction were endeavoring to bring him into contempt; and not only confuted them by the most solid reasoning, but even turned them against the false teacher himself, and against the faction, in such a manner as to render them ridiculous. In short, by the many delicate but pointed ironies with which this epistle abounds, the apostle covered his adversaries with shame, and showed the Corinthians that he excelled in a talent which the Greeks greatly admired.

§ But while Paul thus pointedly derided the faction and its leaders, he bestowed just commendations on the sincere part of the church. . . . And by keeping in mind this fact, that the apostle suits his discourse, now to one, and now to the other, of those opposite characters which composed the Corinthian church, every appearance of inconsistency and contradiction in this epistle will be removed.

MACKNIGHT.

¶ When the apostle sent his first letter to the church at Corinth, he resolved to remain in Ephesus till the following Pentecost, (1 Cor. 16:8.) that Titus, who carried his letter, might have time to return, and bring him an account of the manner in which it was received by the Corinthians. But the riot of Demetrius happening soon after it was sent away, the apostle found it necessary to avoid the fury of the rioters, and of the idolatrous rabble, who were all greatly enraged against him, for having turned so many of the inhabitants of Asia from the established idolatry. Wherefore, leaving Ephesus, he went to Troas, a noted seaport, N. of Ephesus, where travellers, from Europe into Asia, commonly landed. Here he proposed to employ himself in preaching (2 Cor. 2:12.) till Titus should arrive from Corinth. But Titus not coming at the time appointed, Paul began to fear that the Corinthians had used him ill, and had disregarded his letter. These fears so distressed him, that, notwithstanding his preaching at Troas was attended with uncommon success, he left that city, and went forward to Macedonia, expecting to find Titus. But in this he was disappointed. Titus was not in Macedonia when the apostle arrived. He therefore resolved to wait in that country till Titus should come, and inform him how the Corinthians stood affected towards their spiritual father. It seems, he judged it imprudent to visit them till he knew their state. — In Macedonia, Paul had many conflicts with the idolaters, (2 Cor. 7:5) who were greatly enraged against him, as all other idolaters were, for opposing both the objects and rites of their worship. These fightings, joined with his fears for Titus, and his uncertainty concerning the disposition of the Corinthians, exceedingly distressed the apostle at this time. But his meanness was at length happily removed by the arrival of Titus, and the agreeable accounts he brought.

ID.

|| For example, in answering the calumnies by which the faction endeavored to discredit him as an apostle, he was led to mention facts which demonstrate him to have been an apostle, commissioned by Christ, to direct the faith and practice of all the members of the church. Such as his having wrought miracles for converting the Corinthians, and his having imparted to them spiritual gifts after they believed: his having preached the Gospel to them without receiving any reward from them, not even the small reward of maintenance while he preached to them; his having endured innumerable hardships in the long journeys which he undertook, to spread the Gospel, and heavy persecutions in every country, from enemies and opposers, 1 Cor. 4:11, 12. 2 Cor. 4:8. 11:23. His rapture into the third heaven, with a variety of other facts and circumstances respecting himself, which we should not have known, but for the calumnies of the Corinthian faction, and of the Judaizing teachers, who infested the church at Corinth, and other churches, (see Preface to Galatians,) but which, now that they are known, give us the fullest assurance of his apostleship, and add the greatest weight to his writings.

CHAP. I.

<sup>9</sup> The apostle encourageth them against troubles, by the comforts and deliverances which God had given him, as in all his afflictions, <sup>8</sup> so particularly in his late danger in Asia. <sup>12</sup> And calling both his own conscience and theirs to witness of his sincere manner of preaching the immutable truth of the Gospel, <sup>15</sup> he excuseth his not coming to them, as proceeding not of lightness, but of his lenity towards them.

PAUL, an apostle <sup>a</sup> of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints <sup>b</sup> which are in all Achaia :

2 Grace <sup>c</sup> be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed <sup>d</sup> be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort ;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For as the sufferings <sup>e</sup> of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for <sup>f</sup> your consolation and salvation, which is <sup>g</sup> effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer : or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

7 And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that as <sup>h</sup> ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble <sup>i</sup> which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life :

9 But we had the <sup>j</sup> sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust <sup>k</sup> in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead :

10 Who <sup>l</sup> delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver : in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us ;

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In this introduction, we have,

1. The inscription. Paul, the writer of it, joins Timotheus with himself, dignifying him with the title of brother, wherein he shows his humility, and his desire to recommend Timothy, though young, to the esteem of the Corinthians, and give him a reputation among the churches. This epistle was sent to the church of God at Corinth; and not only to them, but also to all the saints in all Achaia, i. e. to all the Christians who lived in the region round about. In Christ Jesus, no distinction is made between the inhabitants of city or country.

2. The salutation, or apostolical benediction, the same as in his former epistle; and therein the apostle desires the two great and comprehensive blessings, grace and peace, for those Corinthians; and both of them from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Procurer and Dispenser of these benefits to fallen man, and is prayed to as God.

V. 3—6. After the foregoing preface, the apostle begins with the narrative of God's goodness to him and his fellow-laborers, in their manifold tribulations; which he speaks of by way of thanksgiving to God, and to advance the divine glory, v. 3—6. and it is fit that, in all things, and in the first place, God be glorified. Observe,

1. The object of the apostle's thanksgiving. (1.) The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. God is the Father of Christ's divine nature by eternal generation; of his human nature by miraculous conception in the womb of the virgin; and of Christ, as God-man, and our Redeemer, by covenant-relation; and in and through Him as Mediator, our God and our Father, Jn. 20: 17. (2.) The Father of mercies. There are a multitude of tender mercies in God essentially, and all mercies are from God originally, Mic. 7: 18. (3.) The God of all comfort; from Him proceedeth the COMFORTER, Jn. 15: 26. He giveth the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts, v. 20. All our comforts come from God, and our sweetest comforts are in Him.

2. The reasons of the apostle's thanksgivings :

(1.) The benefits he and his companions had received from God, v. 4. In the world they had trouble, but in Christ, peace. The apostles met with many tribulations, but they found comfort in them all, v. 5. because therein Christ sympathized with them. (2.) The advantage others might receive; for God intended that they should be able to comfort others in trouble, v. 4. by communicating to them their experiences of the divine goodness and mercy; and the sufferings of good men have a tendency to this good end, v. 6. when they are endued with faith and patience.

V. 7—11. In these vs. the apostle speaks for the encouragement and edification of the Corinthians, and tells them, v. 7. of his persuasion, or steadfast hope, that they should receive benefit by the troubles he and his companions in labor and travel had met with; that their faith should not be weakened, but their consolations increased. In order to this, he tells them,

1. Their sufferings, v. 8. It was convenient for the churches to know, what were the sufferings of their ministers. It is not certain what particular troubles in Asia are here referred to; this, however, is evident, — they were great tribulations; and they thought they should have been killed, or have fainted and expired.

2. In their distress, They trusted in God, v. 9. God often brings his people into great straits, that they may apprehend their own insufficiency to help themselves, and may be induced to place their trust and hope in his all-sufficiency. God's raising the dead is a proof of his almighty power. If we should be brought so low as to despair even of life, yet we may then trust in God, who can bring back not only from the gates, but from the jaws of death.

3. Their deliverance; and this was seasonable and continued. Their hope and trust were not in vain, nor shall any who trust in Him be ashamed. God had delivered them, and did still deliver them, v. 10. Ac. 26: 22.

4. What use they made of this deliverance, v. 10. They trusted that God would

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Saints. All professed Christians, who were to be considered as saints, in the judgment of charity; yet formalists and hypocrites could not be included, or conjoined in those descriptions of character, and appropriation of privileges and promises, which cannot possibly belong to any except true Christians. Rom. 1: 1—7. 1 Cor. 1: 1—3. [The term, hagioi, (holy, saints,) was employed to designate Christians, ns hinting to them what their solemn engagements oblige them to be; and if some individuals were otherwise, it must be remembered that the apostle is addressing them in a general way. BL.] —(3) Even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. This style seems to be adopted under the N. T., to distinguish 'the one living and true God,' from all other objects of worship, without excepting the Supreme Being of deists and infidels; as that of 'the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,' had been under the O. T., to distinguish JEHOVAH from Baal, or Jupiter, or other imagined deities. 1 K. 18: 18—21, 36—39. 22: 6. None was the true God, under the O. T., but 'the God of Abraham, &c.' none under the New is the true God, but 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

(3.) Blessed be God, &c. 'A usual formula of thanksgiving.' Grot. 'It is very observable, that eleven of Paul's thirteen epistles, begin with exclamations of joy, praise, and thanksgiving. As soon as he thought of a Christian church planted in one place or another, there seems to have been a flow of most lively affection accompanying the idea, in which all sensibility of his temporal affliction, or theirs, was swallowed up, and the fulness of his heart must vent itself in such cheerful, exalted, and devout language.' DODDR.

V. 4. Comforteth. 'Parakalōn: this sense, which has occurred (at least conjointly) at Acts 16: 40. 20: 12. and several times in the gospels, and which, indeed, is frequent in the N. T. (as 2 Cor. 2: 6. 7: 6. Eph. 6: 22. Col. 4: 8. 2 Thes. 2: 17. 2 Cor. 13: 11.) is supposed to be Hellenistical, as it is never found in the classical writers. It signifies lit. "to bid any one take comfort, by suggesting such motives and reasons for it as are calculated to raise the spirits of the sinking sufferer;" and, from the adjunct, it denotes every sort of comfort, support, and assistance, by which he is revived in spirit, and restored to happiness. Grot observes, that P., not without reason, said this in opposition to those who supposed the afflicted to be objects of God's hatred. Rom. 5: 3. 8: 35. Theoph. too, remarks; "he does not say, 'who doth not suffer us to be afflicted,' but 'who comforteth us in affliction.'" For He suffers us to be afflicted, that we, by patience, may obtain the reward.' BL. Comp. on Job 34: 1.

36: 8—14. ED.—'The parakaloumetha ['we are comforted'] must not, I think, be understood (with some) of the comfort which the repentance of the incestuous person gave the apostle, after the affliction he had endured on his account; nor, with others, (as Grot.) merely of the gifts of the H. S. vouchsafed to him, (though the possession of such would be a source of great consolation,) but also of that spiritual support breathed into his soul by the Great Comforter, the Paraclete, sent from God, and who is God; or, as DODDR. says, the general consolation arising from the pardon of sin, an interest in God, an assurance that nothing should separate him from Christ, that afflictions should co-operate for his advantage, and that a crown of glory, heightened by these trials, should close the scene.'

V. 5. 'The consolation of which P. speaks, was derived from the presence of Christ with him in his affliction; from a sense of the love of Christ shed abroad in his heart; from the joy which the success of the Gospel gave him; from the assured hope of the reward which was prepared for him; from his knowledge of the influence of his sufferings to encourage others; and from the enlarged views which he had of the government of God, whereby all things are made to work for good to them who love God; so that he was entirely reconciled to his sufferings.'

MACKNIGHT. V. 8—11. Some think that the apostle here referred to his sufferings at Lystra, in Asia Minor, Acts 14: 8—12. but these occurred so many years before, that he would scarcely have thus mentioned them on this occasion. He seems to have written this epistle from Philippi, or at least when he was in Macedonia; Ephesus was the chief city of Asia, according to the sense in which the apostle always uses that word; Acts 19: 8—12. and, as he had just before been driven away from Ephesus, by Demetrius, and the tumult excited by him, it is most probable, that he referred to the furious persecutions during that scene of riot and outrage. Acts 19: 23—41.—'It may be said, perhaps, that it does not appear from the history, that any danger threatened Paul's life, in the uproar at Ephesus, so imminent as that, from which in the epistle he represents himself to have been delivered. This matter, it is true, is not stated by the historian in form; but the personal danger of the apostle, we cannot doubt, must have been extreme, when the whole city was filled with confusion; when the populace had seized his companions; when, in the distraction of his mind, he insisted on coming forth amongst them; when the Christians who were about him would not suffer him; when his friends, certain of the chief of Asia, sent to him, desiring that he would not adven-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-11. The church of God is his peculiar residence, in which He displays his glory and communicates his grace; He is 'the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort;' nor can we expect too much from his infinite compassion and love, or too highly celebrate the praises of what He has already done for us.—We must, indeed, expect tribulations; they are needful [to moral progress], profitable, and unavoidable, and the afflictions and consolations of ministers, especially, are often intended for the sake of the people, as well as themselves, that, by their own example, experience, counsels, and exhortations, they may promote 'the consolation and salvation of others also.' This should reconcile us to our sorrows and trials, and teach us to seek benefit from them; and it should animate us to more earnest prayer, for proportionable grace and consolation, that we may exhibit an edifying example under afflictions: for assuredly we shall rejoice in heaven on account of the sharpest sufferings, which have been rendered subservient to our salvation, and that of any of those, whom our gracious Lord owns as his friends, brethren, and near relations.—The Lord, sometimes, permits his children to be driven almost to despair, that they may learn, more simply, to trust in his almighty power and all-sufficient grace. This often occurs in the concerns of their own souls, and they are made to feel, that infinite mercy and omnipotent grace, alone, can preserve them from the most terrible downfalls, nay, even from final ruin. * P. O. Job 9. In such scenes of conflict and terror, especially, we feel that we need the prayers of our brethren; and we ought thence to learn to pray for all who are tried and tempted, as well as to unite in thanksgivings with such, as have received gracious deliverances. Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances, in which the history describes him to have been, at the time when the epistle purports to have been written, (than the vs. under consideration.) . . . It is the calm recollection of a mind, emerged from the confusion, of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought, which follows a recent deliverance. There is just enough of particularity in the passage, to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus. deliver to the end, and preserve to his heavenly kingdom. Past experiences are great encouragements to faith and hope, and they lay great obligations to trust in God for time to come. We reproach our experiences, if we distrust God in future straits, who hath delivered us in former troubles. David, even when young, and with but a small stock of experiences, argued after the manner of the apostle here, 1 Sa. 17:37.

5. What was desired of the Corinthians on this account, v. 11. Their help, by social prayer, agreeing and joining together in prayer on their behalf. Note, Our trusting in God must not supersede the use of any proper and appointed means; and prayer is one of those means. If we thus help one another, by our prayers, we may hope for an occasion of giving thanks by many for answer of prayer. And it is our duty, not only to help one another with prayer, but in praise and thanksgiving, and thereby to make suitable returns for benefits.

V. 12-14. The apostle, in these vs., attests their integrity by the sincerity of their conversation. This he does, not in a way of boasting and vainglory, but—as one good reason, the more comfortably to trust in God, Heb. 13:18. and for the necessary vindication of himself from the aspersions of some persons at Corinth, who reproached his person, and questioned his apostleship.

1. He appeals to conscience, with rejoicing, v. 12. The testimony of conscience for us, if that be right, and on good grounds, will be matter of rejoicing, at all times, and in all conditions. It testified concerning their conversation, their constant course and tenor of life, the nature or manner of their conversation, as being in simplicity and godly sincerity, and the principle they acted from in all their conversation, both in the world, and towards these Corinthians; not fleshly wisdom, or carnal politics and worldly views, but the grace of God, a vital, gracious principle in their hearts, that cometh from God, and tendeth to God. Then will our conversation be well ordered, when we live and act under the influence and command of such a gracious principle in the heart.

2. He appeals to the knowledge of the Corinthians with hope and confidence, v. 13, 14. It is happy, when ministers and people rejoice in each other here; and this joy will be complete in that day, when the great Shepherd of the sheep shall appear.

V. 15-24. The apostle vindicates himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy, in that he did not hold his purpose of coming to them at Corinth.

1. He avers the sincerity of his intention, v. 15-17. he was so minded, or did really intend, to come to them; not that he, but that they, might receive a second benefit, some further advantage by his ministry. He tells them he had not herein used lightness, v. 17. that, as he aimed not at any secular advantage to himself, so it was, not a rash and inconsiderate resolution that he had taken up, for he had laid his measures thus of passing by them to Macedonia, and coming again to them from Macedonia, in his way to Judea, v. 16. and therefore they might conclude, it was for weighty reasons he had altered his purpose; and that with him there was not yea, yea, and nay, nay, v. 17. Good men should be careful to preserve the reputation of sincerity and constancy; they should not resolve but on mature deliberation, and will not change their resolves but for weighty reasons.

2. He would not have the Corinthians infer, that his Gospel was false or uncertain, or contradictory in itself, or to truth, v. 18, 19. For if it had been so, that he had been fickle in his purposes, or even false in his promises of coming to them, (which he was not justly to be accused of, and so some understand this expression, v. 18. V. 12-14. Though, as a sinner, he could only 'rejoice and glory in Christ Jesus,' 1 Cor. 1:26-31. yet, as a believer, he might rejoice and 'glory' in his inward consciousness of being truly what he professed and appeared to be; and especially in that he had been enabled to exercise his sacred ministry, with 'simplicity' and singleness of heart, aiming at nothing but to glorify God by doing good to men; and in that 'godly sincerity,' that unadulterated integrity, which sprang from the fear and love of God, and approved itself to Him. This had been his habitual conduct, in every part of the world, ever since he had been called to profess and preach the Gospel; but more abundantly in his whole behavior towards the church at Corinth; though they had been the first to suspect him, and accuse him of the contrary, 12:11-21. They had indeed acknowledged him 'in part,' or 'part of them,' to have been the instrument of their conversion, and avowed that they rejoiced and gloried in their relation to him, and in his attention to them; and this was no more than corresponded to his rejoicing, or glorying in them, and on their account; which he trusted would be continued even unto 'the day of the Lord Jesus,' who should come to judge the world. 1 Cor. 15:31-34. SCORR.

V. 15, 16. This shows, he [the apostle] had been only once at Corinth, at this time. 12:14, 15. He had intended to pass by Corinth in his way to Macedonia, and to call as he went, and then afterwards to return, and make a longer abode with them. This must have been his plan, for Corinth was out of his way into Macedonia; nor could it be supposed that he would come near that city, except in order to visit the Christians there. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:5-9.) Probably he had given some other intimation of his purpose to the Corinthians, than that which is contained in the former epistle. He, however, saw reason to alter his plan, and to go into Macedonia by Troas. Acts 20:1-6. ID.

V. 17-20. The apostle's opponents, at Corinth, seem to have urged his deviation from his first purpose, as a proof that he was an inconstant and unstable man; who altered his conduct and doctrine, as circumstances required, and as suited his present conveniency. But . . . he and his fellow-laborers had not said first 'yea,' and then 'nay,' in these grand concerns; but had constantly declared, that all salvation was to be found in Him alone; and that the covenant of grace, and all its engagements, were fully confirmed in Him, to all who were found one with Him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit. In these doctrines, they had been most explicit and decided; though in various matters of less importance, they had used a prudent, self-denying accommodation; and had been careful not to instruct the people in the deeper mysteries of Christianity, before they were able to bear them. 1 Cor. 3:1-9. (18.) Theoph. and Ec., after Chrys., rightly observe, that an objection is here anticipated and answered, as: "If what you say be not firm and stable, and you often say yes, and is it found no, may we not fear lest your word, doctrine, and preaching, be found such?" viz. yes, yes, and no, no, i. e. unstable and wavering. After the council of Jerusalem, he accompanied Paul in journeys through the Lesser Asia and Greece. He was so much esteemed by the apostle's converts, that Paul inserted his name in the inscriptions of several of his epistles. By him, likewise, the apostle Peter sent his first epistle to the brethren of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, 1 Pet. 5:12.

(20.) Nothing can really render the promises of God more certain than they are; but God's giving them to us through Christ, assures us that they are indeed his promises, as in Christ there is such a real evidence of his conversing with men, and as the wonders which God had actually wrought in the incarnation, life, resurrection, and ascension of his Son (facts in themselves much stronger than any of the glorious consequences to follow), tend greatly to confirm our faith, and make it easier for us to believe such illustrious promises as those which are given us, the very greatness of which might otherwise have been an impediment to our faith, and have created a suspicion, not whether God would have performed what He has promised, but whether such promises were really given us. DODD. 'Bp. Middleton tr. For how many soever be the promises of God, in Him (in Christ) is the yea, and in Him the Amen, i. e. whatever God hath promised, He will, through Christ, assuredly fulfil.'

V. 21, 22. Some interpret 'the anointing,' of miraculous powers, and 'the seal,' of the sacraments; but without any satisfactory proof; and it is far more consistent with the tenor of Scripture, to explain 'the anointing,' of such divine communications as belong to Christians in general, and of which none else partake.—Sacraments are but outward seals of the covenant, and neither distinguish believers from others, nor secure salvation to all who partake of them; Rom. 4:9-12, and miraculous powers have been exercised by very wicked men, and have long since ceased in the church; but the renewal of the divine image on the soul, in sanctification, and 'the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit,' form through every age a seal, and earnest, of a far more distinguishing and permanent nature. Rom. 5:3-5. Eph. 1:13, 14. 4:30-32, v. 30. 2 Tim. 2:19. SCOTT.

(21.) Having before said, that God fulfils his promises, Paul now proves it. Theoph. in Bl.

(21, 22.) 'The strong expressions anoint, seal, earnest of the Spirit, merit special attention. The ancient comtrs., dwell much on their import, especially chrisis [anointing], anointing being customary in the inauguration of kings, prophets, and priests. Theoph. thinks it applicable to every baptized person: and, indeed, metaphors of this kind, as applicable to Christians in general, are to be found in the N. T.: yet when we consider that the hēmas [us] can only be meant for himself, and perhaps the other apostles, and the Corinthian Christians, it seems unwarrantable and injudicious to extend it any further. Still less, (in order to make it of universal application,) can it be justifiable to pare down and explain away the solid sense comprehended in these strong terms; as is done by the recent foreign comtrs., particularly Ros., who remarks, and by others in full agreement with him, was either false or doubtful. For God is true, and the Son of God, Jesus Christ, is true, whom the apostle preached, not yea and nay, but yea, v. 19. nothing but infallible truth. And the promises of God in Christ are not yea and nay, but yea and Amen, v. 20. There is an inviolable constancy, and unquestionable sincerity, and certainty, in all the parts of the Gospel of Christ. If in the promises ministers make, as common men, and about their own affairs, they see cause sometimes to vary from them, yet the promises of the gospel-covenant, which they preach, stand firm and inviolable. Bad men are false; good men are fickle; but God is true, neither fickle nor false.

Having mentioned the stability of the divine promises, he makes a digression, to illustrate this great and sweet truth; for they are the promises of the God of truth, made in Christ Jesus, v. 20. the Amen, the true and faithful Witness: He hath purchased and ratified the covenant of promises, and is the Surety of the covenant, Heb. 7:22. They are confirmed by the Holy Spirit, who establishes, anoints, and seals Christians, and is given as an earnest in their hearts,

v. 21, 22. An earnest secures the promise, and is part of the payment. The illumination of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting light; the quickening of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting life; and the comforts of the Spirit are an earnest of everlasting joy. The veracity of God, the mediation of Christ, and the operation of the Spirit, are all engaged, that the promises shall be sure to all the seed, and the accomplishment of them shall be to the glory of God, v. 20. for the glory of his rich and sovereign grace, and never-failing truth and faithfulness.

3. The apostle gives a good reason why he did not come to Corinth, as was expected, v. 23. It was that he might spare them. He assures them this was the true reason, after this very solemn manner; I call God for a record upon my soul; a way of speaking not justifiable where used in trivial matters; but very justifiable here in the apostle, for his necessary vindication, and for the credit and usefulness of his ministry, which was struck at by his opposers. He adds, to prevent mistakes, that he did not pretend to any dominion over their faith, v. 24. Christ only is the Lord of our faith, Heb. 12:2. He reveals to us what we must believe. Paul and

"this inauguration is nothing other than a first instruction in religion." (1 Ju. 2:27.) We are to remember, that to the persons here especially meant, had been vouchsafed many of the extraordinary effusions of the H. S., in various charismata [gifts], recorded and illustrated in 3 chs. of 1 Cor. To them, therefore, the expressions are highly applicable in their full extent, but to no other, unless with qualification, or by accommodation. For, although in Eph. 1:14. we have something like the present use of the Gr., for seal and earnest, as applied to the Ephesians, no instance, I think, can be found of chrisis [to anoint] used of Christians in general, nor, perhaps, of any of its derivatives. For though Ros., &c., appeal to 1 Ju. 2:20, and 27. yet here surely we cannot but recognise another instance of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit imparted in the apostolic age; and, therefore, this will not prove the point in question. I incline to think, then, that by an accommodation of these strong terms, (the first and chief of which, chrisis, is nowhere else used of Christians in general,) the apostle had reference to the supernatural charismata of the Corinthian congregation. V. 23, 24. Having thus vindicated his conduct, and doctrine, from the charge of inconsistency, the apostle, in the most solemn manner, called God to witness the truth of what he was about to assert; he desired that He would testify for him, or against him, as He saw the case to be; and he could expect nothing but awful judgments 'on his soul,' if he spake falsely after such an appeal. With this most awful introduction, which is a peculiarly solemn oath, on a highly important occasion, Ex. 20:7. he declared, that he had postponed his visit to Corinth, in order to spare them those censures and miraculous judgments, which he feared would have been unavoidable, if he had gone thither immediately on leaving Ephesus. He had not then received any information what effect his former epistle had produced; he was aware, that time would be required to bring their affairs into a better state, and he thought it more advisable to wait a little longer, that he might at length come, not 'with a rod, but in love and in the spirit of meekness.' 2:1-4. 10:7-11. 12:17-21. 13:1-4. 1 Cor. 4:18-21, v. 21. He did not mean by this to claim any despotic authority in dictating to them, as of himself, what they should believe; or even to insist, in a dogmatical manner, on their receiving every particular which he taught them by the command of Christ. He had not thus usurped dominion, or 'lorded it over them, in respect of the faith,' as the clause may be rendered, but had acted hitherto, and was still disposed to act, with gentleness and forbearance, as a 'helper of their joy' and consolation in Christ, by his instructions, admonitions, and counsels. Mat. 20:24-23. Lu. 22:24-27. Phil. 1:21-26. 1 Pet. 5:1-4. Yet he deemed it necessary, as the servant and representative of Christ, to act with authoritative decision, and even sharpness, against such as perverted the Gospel, and corrupted its doctrines; for 'by faith' believers stood accepted with God, and were enabled to stand steadfast amidst trials and temptations. 5:5-8. Rom. 5:1, 2. 1 Cor. 15:1, 2. Eph. 6:14-17. 1 Pet. 5:8, 9. Those persons, therefore, who perverted the faith, by false doctrines and corrupt practices, were about to take from true Christians that support, by which they stood; to cause them to fall into various evils; to mar their joy, and to do them immense mischief, if not opposed. As 'helpers of their joy,' therefore, the apostle and his friends must take a decided part against these enemies to their holiness and comfort.—The tenet, that we are at first indeed justified by faith, but are preserved in a justified state by works, is diametrically opposite to this apostolical decision. (24.) Have dominion.] Lord it. 'As the term spare, v. 23. might have seemed over-authoritative, or to savor of domineering spirit, this the apostle disclaims. The ancient, and most modern comtrs. understand, "in the faith, ye, upon the whole stand; though, in matters of practice, ye have erred, and do err." Others take it of the religion, and interpret, "ye are still firm in your profession of the religion; only let your faith be consistent." Others, again, and some recent editors, place the words in a parenthesis: which I cannot approve. It seems not enough attended to, that the words relate strictly to what immediately

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. 1. He proceeds in an account of the reason he did not come to Corinth, as was expected ; namely, he was unwilling to grieve, or be grieved by them, v. 1, 2. His desire was, to have a cheerful meeting, and not to have it embittered by any unhappy occasion of disagreeing.

2. He tells them it was to the same intent that he wrote his former epistle, v. 3, 4. and that he had written to them in confidence of their doing what was requisite, in order to their benefit and his comfort. The particular thing referred to, as appears by the following vs., was the case of the incestuous person, about whom he had written in the first epistle, ch. 5. Nor was the apostle disappointed in his expectation. He assures them he did not design to grieve them, but to testify his love to them, and that he wrote to them with much anguish and affliction in his own heart, and with great affection to them. Even in reproofs, admonitions, and acts of discipline, faithful ministers show their love. Needful censures, and the exercise of church-discipline towards offenders, are a grief to tender-spirited ministers.

V. 5—11. The apostle treats concerning the incestuous person, one principal cause of his writing this epistle.

1. He tells them the crime of that person had grieved him in part ; and that he was grieved also with a part of them, who, notwithstanding this scandal had been found among them, were puffed up, and had not mourned, 1 Cor. 5:2. However, he was unwilling to lay too heavy a charge on the whole church, especially seeing they had cleared themselves in that matter, by observing the directions he had formerly given them.

2. He tells them, that the punishment which had been inflicted on this offender was sufficient, v. 6. The desired effect was obtained, for the man was humbled, and they had shown the proof of their obedience to his directions.

3. He therefore directs them, with all speed, to restore the excommunicated person, or to receive him again to their communion, v. 7, 8. This is expressed several ways ; he beseeches them to forgive him, also to comfort him, and to confirm their love to him ; they should show that their reproofs and censures proceeded from love to his person, as well as hatred to his sin ; and that their design was to reform, not to ruin him. Or thus : If his fall had weakened their love to him, that they could not take that satisfaction in him as formerly ; yet, now that he was recovered by repentance, they must renew and confirm their love to him.

4. He used several weighty arguments to persuade them to do thus ; (1.) The case of the penitent called for this, v. 7. He was so sensible of his fault, and so much afflicted under his punishment, that he was in danger of falling into despair. (2.) They had showed obedience to his directions in passing a censure on him, and now he would have them comply with his desire to restore him, v. 9. (3.) He mentions his readiness to concur in the forgiveness, v. 10. And this he would do for their sakes, for love to them, and for Christ's sake, or in his name, as his apostle ; and in conformity to his doctrine and example, which are so full of kindness and tender mercy toward all them who truly repent. (4.) He gives another weighty reason, v. 11. Not only was there danger lest Satan should get an advantage against the penitent, by driving him to despair ; but PRACT. OBS. V. 12—24. If we would have comfort amidst troubles, reproaches, suspicions, and slanders, we must seek for 'the rejoicing in the testimony of our conscience.' Yet we should not wonder, if we are suspected by those persons to whom, and for those actions in which, we have behaved most conscientiously. Sometimes 'simplicity and godly sincerity' may require that line of conduct, which, to superficial or prejudiced observers, will have a contrary appearance ; and a man may be deemed inconstant, because he will not go the whole length of a party, and coincide with them in their follies, mistakes, and sins. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.—Ministers, and the people who have profited by their labors, ought now to rejoice in each other, as they may expect to do at the last day. Whatever interferes with this reciprocal joy and affection, should be guarded against ; and believers should be very careful, not to grieve, by neglect and unkindness, those faithful friends, to whom, under God, they owe their eternal salvation, and who are concerned for their best welfare, with all the tenderness of affectionate parents.—It is very unjust and uncautious, to ascribe every alteration in a man's purpose or conduct, to lightness, instability, duplicity, or carnal policy ; especially when his general character bears another stamp, and when there may be good reasons for the change which has taken place. If we are thus unjustly censured or suspected, we must make our appeal to God ; yet it behooves us to be steady and constant in our conduct and profession, as far as we can, that we may avoid 'the appearance of evil,' [particularly if ministers.]—If the apostle did not exercise 'dominion over the faith' of Christians, we should by no means 'call men master,' or 'father,' or implicitly submit to their decisions and assertions ; nor should we ever attempt 'to lord it,' in this manner, 'over' any part of 'God's heritage,' [male or female.] Sometimes genuine love, and a wise desire of helping the joy of believers, will dictate sharp rebukes and decided censures of those who would deceive and corrupt them. It is, however, best to use more lenient measures, as far as there is a prospect of success ; and to avoid even the appearance of severity, if it can be done consistently with prudence and faithfulness. SCOTT.

precedes ; q. d. "And this joy you are (I trust) qualified to taste ; for (upon the whole) ye have stood, and do stand firm in the faith, in the profession, in the practice of the religion, and are therefore in a state of salvation." Bp. Mid. paraphrases thus : "we have your welfare at heart ; for by your faith alone, that faith which we seek to strengthen in you, can ye attain to salvation." This (he thinks) is a natural and reasonable vindication, not only of the threat already employed, but of any severities to which Paul might afterwards be driven in the discharge of his duty." Bl. NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle expected he should prevail with them, by his epistles, to exclude such as remained refractory, and also recover many who had been drawn aside ; and then he would be able to go among them, without that 'heaviness' and distress of mind which he must have felt, if constrained to re-establish his authority by censures and punishments. And he was confident they would approve of this plan ; as he would not allow himself to doubt, but that 'his joy was the joy of them all.' The apostle certainly knew that this, admitted of exceptions ; but it was kind and prudent in him, to express his favorable opinion of the church in general ; and to represent the disaffected party to be so small, as not to bear any proportion to his friends and adherents. SCOTT.

(1.) "I determined with myself not again to come to you, so as to give myself and you the pain of censuring irregularities." For all this seems to be included in the words en lupē [in heaviness]. BLOOMF.

(2.) 'The simplest, most natural, and least exceptionable interpretation, is that of Grot., Ros., and Jaspis (and, as it seems, Doddr. and Mackn.); though they do not thoroughly establish the sense, and clearly show how it arises. Ros. expl. thus : "who could make me glad, cause that my stay among you should be pleasant, as is usual among friends ? Both you and I would have been sad. Unless you were made sorrowful by me. And none else. You alone were those who at Corinth could make me glad ; but if you yourselves were sad, this could not be done. For how can a sorrowful person gladden another ?" The sound part of the church would sympathize with the unsound, and so could afford Paul little cordial consolation ; the unsound could not be expected to console him, till their reformation, which he could not stay long enough to prove, and thus his comfort with them could be but small." BLOOMF.

V. 5. 'Now if any of you hath occasioned grief to the rest he hath not so much grieved me, as, in some measure (that I may not bear too hard upon him) all of you. Theoph., from Chrys., acutely remarks, Thus the apostle skilfully brings them all in as partakers in the injury, that he might have them all partakers in the absolution, and thus he be absolved from any charge of inconsistency and mutability.' Id.

V. 6. Such a man. Toioutō : indefinite, but alluding to the incestuous person. 'Undoubtedly, by a peculiar delicacy, this expression is adopted to supply a rule by which to act in similar cases, when the punishment of offenders has been already severe, and their penitence undoubted. Many.] Here the Gr. must mean all, i. e. all the rest besides the person.' Bl. Ed.

V. 8. Confirm. 'The Gr. properly means, to corroborate, to make firm ; and so here the context and the circumstances require the sense, "make him sure of your love," "assure him of it," namely, by some public testimony of it, i. e. the annulment of the act of excommunication ; "make sure that reconciliation." 11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, 13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

14 Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savor of his knowledge by us in every place.

15 For we are unto God a sweet savor of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish:

16 To the one we are the savor of death unto death; and to the other the savor of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things?

17 For we are not, as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God, speak we in Christ.

against the churches, also, and the apostles or ministers of Christ, by representing them as too rigid and severe, and so frighten people from coming among them.

In this, as in other things, wisdom is profitable to direct, so to manage according as the case may be, that the ministry may not be blamed for indulging sin on the one hand, or for too great severity toward sinners on the other hand. Satan is a subtle enemy, and uses many stratagems to deceive us; and we should not be ignorant of his devices: he is also a watchful adversary, ready to take all advantages; and we should be very cautious lest we give him any occasion so to do.

V. 12-17. After these directions concerning the excommunicated person, the apostle makes a long digression, to give the Corinthians an account of his travels and labors for the furtherance of the Gospel, and what success he had had therein; declaring at the same time how much he was concerned for them in their affairs; how he had no rest in his spirit, when he found not Titus at Troas, v. 13. as he expected, from whom he hoped to have understood more perfectly how it fared with them. And we find afterward, ch. 7:5-7. that when the apostle was come into Macedonia, he was comforted by the coming of Titus, and the information he gave him concerning them. So that we may look upon all that we read from ch. 2:12. to ch. 7:5. as a kind of parenthesis.

I. Paul's unwearied labor and diligence in his work, v. 12, 13. II. His success, v. 12. He had a great deal to do, wherever he came, and had good success in it; for God made manifest the savor of his knowledge by him in every place where he came, Acts 16:14. and he speaks of this as a matter of thankfulness to God, and of rejoicing to his soul, v. 14. A believer's triumphs are all in Christ, and true believers have constant cause of triumph in Christ, for they are more than conquerors through Him who hath loved them, Rom. 8:37. III. The comfort he and his companions in labor found, even when the Gospel was not successful to the salvation of some who heard it, v. 15-17. Here observe,

1. The different success of the Gospel, and its different effects on several sorts of persons to whom it is preached; some are saved by it, others perish under it. To some it is a savor of death unto death; [because] it stirs up their corruptions, and exasperates their spirits; they reject it, to their ruin. To others it is a savor of life unto life. To humble and gracious souls the preaching of the Word is most delightful and profitable, and will end in eternal life.

2. The awful impressions this matter made on the apostle, and should also make on us, v. 16. Who is worthy to be employed in such a weighty work; a work of such vast importance, because of so great consequence? Who is able to perform such a difficult work, that requires so much skill and industry? If men did seriously consider what great things depend on the preaching of the Gospel, and how difficult the work of the ministry is, they would be very cautious how they enter upon it, and very careful to perform it well.

PRACT. OBS. We should always give pain reluctantly, even when it must be done; for, if we are of a truly Christian spirit, we shall share the grief which we occasion. That part of an affectionate minister's work which gives most offence, is often performed by him with great affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears; and by a kind of painful constraint. So far is he from intending to grieve his beloved people, that he does violence to his own feelings, and ventures their displeasure, from his abundant affection to them; and that he may, even against their will, preserve them, if possible, from the dangers, to which the artifices of deceivers, and their own inexperience, expose them. Ministers of this spirit and character will be careful 'not to overcharge their brethren,' and not to condemn them harshly or indiscriminately. No man, indeed, has a right to exercise dominion over the faith of his brethren; but, as far as ministers act according to the commandments of Christ, they are authorized to expect obedience from the people; and they may sometimes properly make trial of it; yet they should always be ready to express a forgiving disposition. When church-censures, ministerial rebukes, or the reconciliation of offenders, are regulated according to the word of Christ, and as in his presence, they are valid, even as if He were present in person to ratify them.—We should always be upon our guard, 'lest Satan get an advantage against us; [and] should therefore study, by attention to the Scriptures, by careful observation, by watching our own experiences, by conferring with our brethren, and, above all, by fervent prayer, to get acquainted with 'his devices,' that we may be competent to counteract them. It is perhaps impossible, in this present state, to separate fervent, active zeal from an over-anxious solicitude. If, however, our hearts be right with God, our disquietudes will terminate in thanksgivings, our conflicts in victories and triumphs; and the labors of the faithful minister will be accepted, and graciously rewarded by our God, whether his hearers be saved, or perish.—But how should the consideration of the consequences, which must follow on our preaching, to ourselves and our hearers, make us shrink back, as it were, under the consciousness of unworthiness and insufficiency! especially as so many still adulterate and 'corrupt the Word of God,' to their own ruin, and that of their deluded followers. If this was the case, even while the apostles were living, how is it at present? and what would holy Paul's verdict be in this day, concerning an immense proportion of professed teachers and rulers in the Christian church? May we then inquire how the case is with each of us; may we carefully watch ourselves in this matter; and seek the testimony of our consciences, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that, 'as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God, so we may speak in Christ!' May the Lord also send forth very many faithful and able ministers into his church, and stop the mouths of all false teachers; and may every Christian learn to distinguish between genuine shepherds, and all kinds of wolves and foxes in sheep's clothing! Is. 56:9-12. Mat. 7:13-20. SCOTT.

V. 11. Lest, &c.] 'His reception back to the church being put off, the Corinthians being well affected toward him, would become more lax in repelling criminalities.' See Ros. Satan.] 'Who, under pretence of duty, tempts us to pass severe censures, to drive offenders to despair, and to deter unbelievers from receiving the Gospel. Devices.] Here Paul seems to caution against the principles the Novatians afterwards espoused, who, on pretence of establishing discipline, and preserving the purity of the church, would not receive into their communion those who had apostatized in times of persecution, however penitent they might be afterwards,—a rule which anciently occasioned much confusion, and even bloodshed, in the church.' Mackn. Ed.

V. 12, 13. After Paul had been driven from Ephesus, he went to Troas, in his way to Macedonia, intending to remain for a short time in that city, to preach the Gospel, of which a very favorable opportunity presented itself. Acts 20:1-6. But, not meeting Titus there, according to his expectation, and having received no tidings from Corinth, his mind was so discomposed about the affairs of that church, that he could not comfortably continue at Troas. He therefore hastened into Macedonia to meet Titus, which he accordingly did; and his report had determined him to write this second epistle, and then to proceed leisurely, through the churches of Macedonia, before he visited Corinth. SCOTT.

(13.) No rest.] 'Regretting the absence of Titus, which prevented his making the most of the door now opened to them for spreading the Gospel.' So Bl., &c. 'But, however, (effecting what I could without the benefit of his assistance,) I bid the Trojans adieu, and went,' &c. Bl. Ed.

V. 14-17. The happy turn given to the affairs of the Corinthians; and the confidence the apostle entertained of success as to that perplexing business, in which he had been engaged respecting them; and his usefulness in other places, caused him to break forth in 'thanks to God,' amidst all his difficulties and distresses. He had, indeed, sharp conflicts to sustain; but the Lord gave him such multiplied victories, that he went from city to city as a triumphant conqueror, in the cause of Christ. And, as in triumphs, abundance of odors were used, so the name and salvation of Jesus, ('as ointment poured forth,' Cant. 1:3.) was a 'sweet odor,' diffused by him in every place; so that he, and his fellow-laborers, were pleasing and acceptable to God, by their testimony to Christ, and, through his merits, as a sweet-smelling savor, Gen. 8:20-22, v. 22. Eph. 5:1, 2 Phil. 4:14-20, v. 18. As, however, such infinitely important consequences were connected with the sacred ministry; and as faithfulness alone could render it acceptable and honorable to God, or profitable to men; who, of the human race, could of himself be 'sufficient' for such a service? Or who would dare to engage in it without trembling? 3:4-6. This obliquely hinted at the self-sufficiency of the Corinthian teachers; but they were more immediately intended when he spake of 'many' who sophisticated the Word of God, as dishonest vintners do their wine; when they preserve something of the color and taste, but dilute it, or mix it up with other liquids which weaken it, prevent its efficacy, or even render it poisonous, in order to enhance their profits. Thus, these teachers preserved some important truths in their preaching, to render it more specious; but they corrupted it by human inventions, philosophical conjectures, or antinomian opinions, till it became inefficacious, and even pernicious, to the souls of men. 11:13-15. Col. 2:8, 9. Learned men have differed greatly in opinion, about these corrupters of the Gospel; whether they were judaizing Christians, or Gentile converts, or heretics, as the Gnostics in particular were; but, [perhaps he alludes to them all, and,] beyond all doubt, there were corrupters of the Gospel at that time, of different descriptions, who perverted it in various ways. SCOTT.

<sup>3</sup>. The comfort the apostle had under this serious consideration; (1.) Because faithful ministers shall be accepted of God, whatever their success be, v. 15. in them who are saved, and in them also who perish. God will accept of sincere intentions, and honest endeavors, though with many they are not successful, Is. 49:5. (2.) Because his conscience witnessed to his faithfulness, v. 17. in dispensing the Gospel, as he received it from the Lord, and had no secular turn to serve; his aim was, to approve himself to God, remembering that his eye was always upon him; he therefore spake and acted always as in the sight of God, and therefore in sincerity. What we do in religion, is not of God, does not come from God, will not reach to God, unless done in sincerity, as in the sight of God.

CHAP. III. V. 1-5. 1. The apostle makes an apology for his seeming to commend himself. He thought it convenient to protest his sincerity, because some at Corinth endeavored to blast his reputation; yet he was not desirous of vainglory. And he tells them, that, as to himself and his fellow apostles, (1.) They neither needed nor desired any verbal commendation to them nor letters testimonial from them, as some others did, meaning the false apostles or teachers, v. 1. (2.) The Corinthians, themselves, were their real commendation, and a good testimonial, that God was with them of a truth, v. 2. This was the testimonial they most delighted in, and what was most dear to them,—they were written in their hearts; and this they could appeal to on occasion, for it was, or might be, known and read of all men. Note, Nothing is more delightful to faithful ministers, or more to their commendation, than the success of their ministry, evidenced in the hearts and lives of them among whom they labor.

<sup>2</sup>. The apostle is careful not to assume too much to himself, but to ascribe all the praise to God. (1.) They were the epistle of Christ, v. 3. Christ was the Author of all the good that was in them. His law was written in their hearts, and his love shed abroad there. This was the good hope the apostle had concerning them, v. 4. that their hearts were like the ark of the covenant, containing the tables of the law and the gospel, written with the finger, i. e. by the Spirit, of the living God. (2.) He utterly disclaims the taking any praise to themselves, and ascribes all the glory to God, v. 5. We could never have made such good impressions on your hearts, or on our own; we cannot of ourselves think a good thought, much less raise any good thoughts or affections in other men. All our sufficiency is of God. This is true concerning ministers and all Christians.

V. 6-11. Here the apostle makes a comparison between the O. T. and the New, the law of Moses and the gospel of Jesus Christ; and values himself and his fellow-laborers by this, that they were able ministers of streets were "full of incense and perfumes." The captives of greatest note followed the triumphal chariot, in chains, and some of them had their lives granted to them; others were put to death immediately after the procession ended. Wherefore, to such, the smell of the flowers, and of the incense with which the procession was accompanied, was a deadly smell, ending in their death. But to those captives who had their lives granted to them, this was a smell of life, a vivifying and refreshing smell, which ended in life to them.—In allusion to the method of a triumph, the apostle represents Christ as a victorious general, riding in a triumphal procession through the world, attended by his apostles, prophets, evangelists, and other ministers of the Gospel, and followed by all the idolatrous nations as his captives. Among these, the preachers of the Gospel diffused the smell of the knowledge of Christ, which, to those who believed on Him, was a vivifying smell, ending in life to them. But, to the unbelievers, the smell of the knowledge of Christ, was a smell of death, ending in death, if they continued in unbelief. Mackn., who, however, us Bl. remarks, carries the allusion (and it is no more) quite too far, especially on v. 14.

<sup>4</sup> Theod. and Theoph. well paraphrase: "We, indeed, bear the sweet odor of Christ's Gospel to all; but all who participate in it, do not experience its salutiferous effects. Thus, to diseased eyes, even the light of heaven is noxious; yet the sun does not bring the injury. And to those in a fever, honey is bitter; yet it is sweet, nevertheless. Vultures, too, it is said, fly from sweet odors of myrrh; yet myrrh is myrrh, though the vultures avoid it. Thus, if some be saved, and others perish, the Gospel retains its own virtue, and we, the preachers of it, remain as we are; and the Gospel retains its odoriferous and salutiferous properties, though some may disbelieve or abuse it, and perish." It is, I think, a misconception of Doddr., to suppose there is here allusion to the different effects of strong perfumes, to cheer some, and to throw others into violent disorders. Bl. Death unto death. I. e. temporal and eternal. Life unto life. The life which now is, and that which is to come. The words, unto death, and unto life, are exegetical, and added to strengthen the sense. The Rabbins say, the law is the aroma of life to those who study it properly; of death to those who do not; an odor of life to Israelites, of death to Gentiles.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-3. The Corinthians themselves were his 'epistle of commendation;' it was 'written in their hearts,' (as some read it, perhaps without sufficient authority from manuscripts or copies,) and legible in their lives, so that men, of every nation and language, might read and understand the import of it. Or, he so valued this testimonial, and so loved them, as the seals of his ministry, that he had this epistle, as it were, engraven in his heart. The language here used is remarkable. 'The epistle of Christ, ministered by us.' Christ wrote it, by the apostle, as his amanuensis;—written . . . with the Spirit of the living God.' What the Spirit does, is done by Christ. Rev. 2:6, 7, v. 7.

(1.) 'This is meant to meet an objection, such as, How is this, Paul, thou art magnifying thyself by saying these things? Which he refutes. The interrogation is equivalent to a strong negation.' Bl.; who reads, 'unless (indeed) you will say, we need, as some do;' adopting the reading ei (unless) instead of e (or). Some.] 'The false teachers at Corinth, (so all contrs.) who had originally introduced themselves to notice by commendatory letters, both there and elsewhere. Epistles of commendation.] Epistolai sustatikai: these were much in use in the primitive church, and were derived, as some think, from the tessera hospitalitatis of the Greeks and Romans. [This was a tally, or piece of wood, cut into two parts, of which each party, to the contract of mutual hospitality, kept one. For when the citizen travelled abroad, or visited the country, as there were no proper places of accommodation for travellers, he was obliged to lodge with a friend, whom, in turn, he lodged, when that friend, or foreigner, visited his own town or country. This sworn relation was esteemed by the Romans next to that of parents and clients. Adam.] But it has been proved, that the custom was in use among the Jews also; as it would be likely to be in every country where letters were known, and personal communication not very frequent. These epistles commendatory were properly letters of introduction, (which is the import of the term,) though they, no doubt, often had recommendatory matter. Some of the finest specimens are from the pens of Cicero and Pliny. Bl.

(2.) 'The epistle here meant by Paul, was plainly the reformed morals, and good conduct of the Corinthian converts, which might be said to be read and known by all men; since the extensive commerce of the Corinthians, carried the inhabitants of that city everywhere, and dispersed everywhere a knowledge of what was there done; and all this would be an epistle commendatory of the apostle; since, as Chrys. and Theoph. say, "the virtue of the pupil adorns his teacher." Now this reformation was indeed not known to all men; but it must have been especially imprinted on the mind of the apostle; and this, therefore, he would bear about with him everywhere, just as the knowledge in question was disseminated everywhere. Thus Plato speaks of knowledge, "written in the soul of the learner." Bloomf.

(3.) 'Ye bear the commands of Christ on your heart, and transcribe them into your practice. This is, as it were, a letter dictated by Christ to me, and by me written on your hearts. So also all the ancient contrs., and Grot., and Ros. The Gr. tr. "manifestly declared," means, (so Ros.) to use any one's ministry in performing anything. In some sense, too, it might be said, they were a letter commendatory of Christ and the Gospel to the heathens.' Bl. Ink.] Notes, end of Jer. 32. and end of Jer. V. 4. If the new is so superior to the old covenant, then the ministers of the new are superior to those of the old: this natural conclusion he does not draw out, but neutralizes what might seem boastful, by ascribing all this superiority to God. So Theoph. and Bl. In.

V. 5, 6. 'We are of ourselves unable even to devise, or conceive the mysteries and truths of the Gospel, much less to give them the effect by which the Holy Spirit writes and imprints them on the hearts of men; but our power and sufficiency is (alone) from God. The apostle (obs. Ros.) says, that he could not have discovered this mode of salvation, but that he had his doctrine by divine revelation. And so Grot.' Bloomf.

V. 6. This is commonly understood restrictively, of the legal and evangelical dispensations contrasted with each other, and the context seems to favor this interpretation; yet it is not satisfactory, as proposed in a general manner, for the Mosaic dispensation was not a killing letter to all who were under it; nor is the Gospel, in all cases, attended by the life-giving Spirit. But the Mosaic dispensation derived all its saving efficacy from the Gospel, to which it referred, and, after the publication of Christianity, it became altogether 'a killing letter' to those who cleaved to it. Gal. 4:21-31. 5:1-6. For the Gospel was 'the ministration of the Spirit,' and the only doctrine through which life and salvation were communicated to sinners, as the apostle shows more fully in the next vs. The moral law, indeed, is universally 'found unto death,' to all who remain under it; but the ceremonies and types, together with the prophecies, gave ancient believers a general or indistinct discovery of mercy and grace, through the promised Savior; yet these institutions, to unbelievers, were a mere lifeless form, which left them under the condemnation of the moral law, and even added to it. Rom. 5:20, 21. 7:1-12. But then it was to be remembered, that the Gospel itself, and its ministers, are 'a savor of death unto death' to unbelievers, who often make the same formal use of some evangelical truths, and an attendance on Christian ordinances, which the Jews did of the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders; and in this way and in many others, 'the letter,' even of the N. T., 'kills,' and it only gives life, when accompanied 'by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.' 2:14-17. Rom. 8:1-4.—To understand 'the letter and the spirit,' of a literal and an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, is both foreign to the apostle's argument and also palpably absurd and extremely dangerous. Some parts of the New Testament, that God had made them so, v. 6. This he does in answer to the accusations of false teachers, who magnify greatly the law of Moses.

1. He distinguishes between the letter and the spirit, even of the N. T., v. 6. As able ministers of the N. T., they were ministers not merely of the letter, to read the written Word, or to preach the letter of the Gospel only, but of the Spirit also ; the Spirit of God did accompany their ministrations. The letter killeth, this the letter of the law does, for that is the ministration of death ; and if we rest only in the letter of the Gospel, we shall be never the better for so doing, for even that will be a savor of death unto death ; but the Spirit of the Gospel, going along with the ministry of the Gospel, giveth life spiritual, and life eternal.

2. He shows the difference between the O. T. and the New, and the excellency of the gospel above the law. For, The law was the ministration of death,—of condemnation, for that condemned and cursed every one who continued not in all things written therein, to do them ; but the gospel is the ministration of life,—of righteousness ; therein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed ; this shows us that the just shall live by his faith ; this reveals the grace and mercy of God through Jesus Christ, for the obtaining of remission of sins, and eternal life. The Gospel therefore so much exceeds in glory, that in a manner it eclipses the glory of the legal dispensation, v. 10. Not only did the glory of Moses' face go away, but the glory of Moses' law is done away also ; whereas the gospel shall remain, v. 11. to the end of the world, and is always fresh and flourishing, and remains glorious.

V. 12—18. He draws two inferences from what he had said about the O. and N. T. dispensation.

1. Concerning the duty of the ministers of the Gospel, to use great plainness or clearness of speech. They ought not, like Moses, to put a veil on their faces, or obscure and darken those things that they should make plain. The gospel is a more clear dispensation than the law ; the things of God are revealed in the N. T., not in types and shadows ; and ministers are much to blame, if they do not set spiritual things, and gospel-truth and grace, in the clearest light possible.

2. Concerning the greater privilege and advantage of those who enjoy the Gospel. For, (1.) Those who lived under the legal dispensation, had their minds blinded, v. 14. and there was a veil on their hearts, v. 15. especially those who remained in judaism, after the coming of the Messiah, and the publication of his Gospel. Nevertheless, the apostle tells us, a time is coming, when this veil also shall be taken away, and when the body of that people—shall turn to the Lord, v. 16. Or, when any particular person is converted to God, then the veil of ignorance is taken away ; the blindness of the mind, Scripture are allegorical, and must be so interpreted ; but surely laws, doctrines, promises, exhortations, and historical facts, must be literally understood by all, who do not purposely seek to misunderstand them !

(6.) Letter—spirit. [1. e. not a religion LITERAL, or comprehended in writing, like the decalogue, and the law of Moses, but spiritual. This may be understood in a twofold way ; first, in the physical sense, since Christianity was at first promulgated without any Divine Scripture, (Paul speaks of his own times ; afterwards writings were highly necessary, Ros.) and solely by the H. S., which also by its miraculous charismata [gifts] extended at least up to the period when it became literal as well as spiritual ; and by its ordinary and sanctifying influences, hath ever since enabled true Christians to perform the duties which the Gospel enjoins ; and secondly, in a moral sense, as being raised above the dry forms, and empty shadows of the law ; and aiming at true and substantial excellency. "Now Moses (obs. Grot.) brought the writing in two stone tables to the people. The apostle's word was accompanied with more illustrious signs than Moses had given, even with tongues, miraculous healings, raising the dead, nay, and with the power of conferring such gifts on others ; which had been utterly without example." Thus, it is remarked by Æc., that the law promulgated the writings of Moses ; but the preaching of Christ ministered the gifts of the Spirit. And Theoph. obs., that the law was, in a certain sense, spiritual, as given by the Spirit, but did not confer the Spirit, as did the new covenant : for not only did the apostles teach spiritual and divine doctrines, but by the laying on of hands gave the Spirit. It may also (as Whit. obs.) be called the covenant of the Spirit, in allusion to Jer. 3:33. where God promises, under the new covenant, to put his laws in the inward parts ; and to write them in the hearts of his people. And to this view Jaspis confines it, observing, our religion is called Spirit, for it looks to internals, with their effects and advantages, the Mosaic pertaining mostly to externals. He then with great taste, as well as truth, observes, "Paul, indeed, uses a more elegant and figurative style, the more he is moved in mind, which is an indication how natural this elegance is to him." BL.

Killeth . . . giveth life. [There are several ways in which this will hold good. Hence comtrs. differ according to the views they take. Without noticing refinements to which the apostle would not descend, (and which may be seen in the Crit. Sacr., Poole's Syn., Wolf's Curw., &c.), some here recognise a Jewish proverb, expressing the superiority of the spiritual, i. e. mystical, interpretation of the law over the literal. But (as Doddr. obs.) this is a very arbitrary and unwarrantable exposition. By the letter, all judicious comtrs. are agreed, is meant the law of Moses, and by the Spirit, the gospel, the former of which may be said to kill, in a metaphorical sense, (and so Grot.) as being merely minacious and damatory, threatening death, and leaving to it those who disobeyed ; containing no promises of a future state, even to those who obeyed it, Jn. 6:49. Gal. 3:21. and for those who disobeyed it (as all, from the frailty of human nature must do) there could be no hope. Nay, it not only denounced punishment and death, but often indirectly occasioned it, by the multiplicity, the minuteness, and the difficulty of its ceremonial rites ; thus, as the apostle says, "taking occasion from our conenpiscence, it increased sin," and did not confer any strength to perform its injunctions, being destitute of all the assistances of grace. Such is the mode in which the most eminent modern comtrs. explain.

On the contrary, the Spirit, namely, that new and spiritual system, the Gospel, giveth life, since it not only brings life and immortality to light, but, by the manifestations of the Spirit, enables believers to perform its injunctions. See more in Poole, and Crit. Sacr. The Gr. is so used at Gal. 3:21. So that the recent foreign comtrs. err, in interpreting the word solely of offering felicity ; for there is plainly, in both passages, a reference to that expiatory sacrifice, by which the vivification is effected. Perhaps, too, Paul meant expressly to contrast the two dispensations, by considering the tendency and disposition of each. The chief end and purpose of the law was punishment, not reward. It was extreme in remarking, and severe in punishing the least faults ; whereas, the chief end of the gospel is, in every sense, life and happiness. It deals in forgiveness, and never spurns the penitent and reformed sinner, but washes away his sins. And it may be said to give life, as "quickening those who were dead in trespasses and sins," and imparting new life by the sanctifying graces of the H. S. See Eph. 2:1. BLOOMF.

V. 7—11. The Corinthians undervalued the authority of the apostle, as 'the minister of Christ ;' but he here showed them, how far the ministry of the N. T. excelled that of the Old.—From this argument of the apostle, it is generally concluded, that the false teachers at Corinth judaised ; but it has before appeared, that their leading errors were of a different nature, though some might be prone to run into that extreme. The apostle, however, seems to have principally intended 'to magnify his office,' and to show, from the example of Moses, that the ministry of the N. T. was honorable, in proportion to the superior glory of that dispensation ; and that he, as immediately entrusted with the important stewardship of the divine mysteries, as an inspired apostle, and as faithful in this service, had a right to demand respect and deference to his authority ; which his opponents, whoever they were, refused him, and instructed their followers to refuse him.

and the hardness of the heart, are cured. (2.) The condition of those who enjoy and believe the Gospel is much more happy. For, they have liberty, v. 17. freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and from the servitude of corruption; liberty of access to God, and freedom in prayer. They have light; for with open face we behold the glory of the Lord, v. 18. The Israelites saw the glory of God in a cloud, which was dark and dreadful; but Christians see it in a glass, more clearly and comfortably. It was the peculiar privilege of Moses, for God to converse with him face to face, in a friendly manner; but now all true Christians see Him more clearly with open face. He showeth them his glory. This light and liberty are transforming; we are changed into the same image, v. 18. from one degree of glorious grace unto another, till grace here be consummated in glory for ever. How much therefore should Christians prize and improve these privileges! We should not rest contented without an experimental knowledge of the transforming power of the Gospel, by the operation of the Spirit, bringing us into a conformity to the temper and tendency of the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-7. The apostle had, in the foregoing ch., been magnifying his office, on account of the excellency or glory of that Gospel about which he [and his brethren] officiated; and now in this ch. his design is, to vindicate their ministry from the accusation of false teachers, who charged them as deceitful workers, or endeavored to prejudice the minds of the people against them on account of their sufferings. 'Seeing we have this ministry, are so much distinguished and dignified, we do not take state on ourselves, nor indulge idleness, but are excited to the better performance of our duty.'

1. Their constancy and perseverance in their work are declared, v. 1. And this their steadfastness was owing to the mercy of God. From the same mercy and grace that they received the apostleship, Rom. 1:5. they received strength to persevere in the work of that office; so it is owing to the mercy and grace of God, if we continue faithful, and persevere in our work with diligence. The best men in the world would faint under their burdens, if they did not receive mercy from God. But that mercy which has helped us out, and helped us on,

PRACT. OBS. Even the appearance of self-commendation is painful to the humble and spiritual Christian. Yet, alas! the prominent appearance of much religious profession is self-confidence, boasting, loquacity, censoriousness, a disputatious temper, bitterness, and clamor, with little strictness in the general conduct! But when professed Christians act consistently, obeying the commands and [closely] copying the example of their Lord, they honor and recommend the Gospel and the preachers of it, and are instrumental in bringing others also to attend on the truth without prejudice. Mat. 5:13-16. Phil. 2:14-18. 1 Pet. 2:12. 3:1-4, 13-16.—Success in this blessed work should inspire our minds with confidence in God. The holy law of God, though excellent and glorious in itself, can be only 'the ministration of death,' and 'condemnation' to fallen man; but justifying righteousness and sanctifying grace come from Jesus Christ alone, and by the ministry of the Gospel. May Christians then learn to value the faithful ministry of the Gospel, and encourage their 'preachers to use great plainness of speech,' suited to the doctrine with which they are entrusted! and may all preachers study and endeavor after this great plainness and boldness of speech, in all their ministrations, before the rich and powerful, as well as among their poorer brethren!—[Still doth the glorious glass of the Gospel stand full in our view, from which the lustre of the Redeemer's countenance is reflected. Let us daily behold his image there, and contemplate it with an attentive eye, as those who are solicitous that we may wear some of those rays; yea that we may wear them with still increasing lustre; that we may be transformed from glory to glory, and, reflecting those rays, shine as lights in the world. BLOOMP.

V. 17, 18. The preceding argument shows, that the Lord Jesus 'is that Spirit,' or animating soul, which gives life to the letter of the Scriptures, and to believers. (6) Without Him, doctrines, promises, ordinances, and commandments, are a mere lifeless body of religion; the power and life of all and of every part must wholly be derived from their relation to his person, mediation, and grace; and, without faith in Him and grace from Him, all knowledge, ordinances, or external obedience, constitute only a 'form of godliness.' In both respects He is, as it were, the soul which animates the body, and gives activity, energy, and value to every part of it. This union with Christ is effected by the indwelling of his 'Holy Spirit;' and where this divine Agent, 'proceeding from the Father and the Son,' and One with the Father and the Son, inhabits the heart, 'there is liberty.' He gives freedom from sin and Satan, from condemnation and slavish principles, from the love of the world and the fear of men; He renders the will free from the bondage of corrupt passions; He enables the believer to find liberty in willing obedience, and in spiritually worshipping God. Ps. 51:12, 13. Rom. 8:1, 2, 14-17. 2 Tim. 1:6-8. Some expositors explain the 'open,' or 'unveiled' face, to mean the face of Christ, rendering the words, 'We all, in an unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord &c.' The glory of God in the face of Christ is certainly the object contemplated. The veil on the face of Moses implied, that this glory was but obscurely shown by his ministration; but the veil, by the 'ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit,' is removed, so that the glory of God in the face of Christ is unveiled, and all they, from whose hearts the veil of prejudice, pride, unbelief, and worldly lusts, is taken away, see it clearly and distinctly. If the 'unveiled face' be understood of the beholders this latter 'veil' is meant, and the contrast is between them and the unbelieving Jews; but if it be understood of Christ, then the contrast is between the obscure ministration of Moses, and the clear and full ministration of the apostles. As believers, they beheld this glory; and through their doctrine, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, all Christians did and still do behold it.—The holiness of God, as comprising all his moral perfections, is his 'glory,' and the renewal of our souls, from those sinful propensities which are our shame, to increasing degrees of conformity to the divine holiness, is transformation 'from glory to glory,' till perfected in heaven. Thus the sense is, undoubtedly, that of clear and dis-

"We go on (to use the words of Ps. 8:7. entirely parallel) from strength to strength" ... Or, (as it is well explained in its true, spiritual import, by Bp. Horne,) we are enabled to proceed from one degree of holiness to another, until we come to the glorified vision of God in heaven itself. BLOOMP.

'Here is one of the most beautiful contrasts that can be imagined. Moses saw the Shechinah, and it rendered his face resplendent, so that he covered it with a veil, the Jews not being able to bear the reflected light; we behold Christ as in the glass of his Word, and (as the reflection of a very luminous object from a mirror, gilds the face on which the reverberated rays fall) our faces shine too; and we veil them not, but diffuse the lustre, which, as we discover more and more of his glories in the Gospel, is continually increasing.'

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. 'What reason can be assigned why they, who ... preached the Gospel plainly, should write the same things to the same persons obscurely? ... Eph. 3:4. Rom. 16:19.—And if they wrote for our learning and instruction, to be sure they wrote plainly and clearly, as to them; since otherwise they wrote not so as to instruct and teach, but rather to confound the reader. Seeing, therefore, the great end of writing the Scripture was, to instruct the world in the will and mind of God, and the great things of the Christian faith,—their writings are an effectual mean to obtain it; which yet they cannot be, unless they are plain and clear, as to the great things of religion.' hitherto, we may rely on to help us even to the end.

2. Their sincerity in their work is avouched, v. 2. in several expressions. The things of dishonesty that will not bear the light, and of which those who practise them should be ashamed, they did not allow, but did renounce and avoid with indignation; they practised no disguise, art, or cunning, had no base and wicked designs, covered with fair and specious pretences of something that was good; but in great simplicity, and with open freedom, preached the Word, as he said before, with great plainness of speech. Some think, the apostle alludes to the deceit which treacherous gamesters use, or that of hucksters in the market, who mix bad wares with good. The apostles acted not like such persons, but manifested the truth to every man's conscience, declaring nothing but what in their own conscience they believed to be true, and might serve for the conviction of their consciences who heard them, who were to judge for themselves, and to give an account for themselves. And all this they did as in the sight of God, desiring thus to commend themselves to God, and to the consciences of men, by their undisguised sincerity.

3. An objection is obviated, which might be thus formed; 'If it be thus, how then does it come to pass, that the Gospel is hid, and proves ineffectual, as to some who hear it?' To which the apostle answers, by showing that this was not the fault of the Gospel, nor of the preachers thereof. But the true reasons of this were, (1.) They are lost souls, to whom the Gospel is hid, or is ineffectual, v. 3. Christ came to save such. Mat. 18:11. and if the Gospel do not find and save them, they are lost for ever; for there is no other method or mean of salvation. The hiding of the Gospel therefore from souls, is both an evidence and cause of their ruin. (2.) The god of this world hath blinded their minds, v. 4.

4. They are under the influence and power of the devil, here called the god of this world, and elsewhere the prince of this world, because of the great interest he has in this world, the homage paid to him by multitudes, and the great sway that, by divine permission, he bears in the world. As he is the prince of darkness, and ruler of the darkness of this world, so he darkens the understandings of men, by blinding their minds with ignorance, error, and prejudices, that they should not behold the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ, who is the image of God. Observe, Christ's design by his Gospel, is, to make a glorious discovery of God to the minds of men; but the devil's design is, to keep men in ignorance; and when he cannot keep the light of the Gospel out of the world, to keep it out of the hearts of men.

4. A proof of their integrity is given, v. 5. They made it their business to preach Christ, and not themselves. Self was not the matter or the end of the apostles' preaching; their own notions, private opinions, passions and prejudices, nor their own secular interest or glory; but Christ Jesus the Lord, as thus it became them, being Christ's servants. Their business was, to make their Master known as the Messiah, or the Christ of God, as Jesus, the only Savior of men, and as the rightful Lord, and to advance his honor and glory. All the lines of Christian doctrine centre in Christ; and in preaching Christ, we preach all we should preach. 'As to ourselves,' says the apostle, 'we preach, or declare, that we are your servants for Jesus' sake.' This was no compliment, but a real profession of a readiness to do good to their souls, and that for Jesus' sake, not their own, but Christ's, that they might imitate his great example, and advance his glory. Ministers should be servants to the souls of men; yet, at the same time, they must avoid becoming the servants of the humors or the lusts of men; if they should thus seek to please men, they would not be the servants of Christ, Gal. 1:10. And there was good reason,

(1.) Why they should preach Christ. For by gospel-light we have the knowledge of the glory of God, which shines in the face of Jesus Christ, v. 6. As light was the first-born of the first creation, so it is in the new creation; the illumination of the Spirit is his first work on the soul. The grace of God created such a light in the soul, that they who were sometimes darkness, are made light in the Lord, Eph. 5:8.

(2.) Why they should not preach themselves; because they were but earthen vessels; things of little or no worth or value,—an allusion to the lamps Gideon's soldiers carried in earthen pitchers, Judg. 7:16. Ministers of the Gospel are weak and frail, subject to like passions and infirmities as other men, mortal, and soon broken in pieces. And God has so ordered it, that the weaker the vessel, the stronger his power may appear, that the treasure itself should be valued the more.

tures, because they are obscure, lest the common people should learn heresy from them; and on the same ground they rest the claims of the church to infallibility, and the authority of their traditions. But the reasoning is equally conclusive against all those nominal protestants, who suppose that great learning and skill are needful to understand the Scriptures, especially the apostolical epistles; otherwise conclusions may be drawn from them, which they think heretical; and this is a consideration which is become of very great importance, in the strange and anti-christian controversy of late excited, even among protestant ministers and rulers of the church, about the propriety of circulating the Holy Scriptures alone among mankind in general!

(2.) We have (all along) renounced, and do renounce. Deceitfully, &c.] The phrase is synonymous with corrupting, &c., of ch. 3. and denotes corrupting the Word by impure admixtures of Gentile philosophy, or Jewish tradition; or by intermixing any opinions inconsistent with its purity, and introduced for the sake of private interest, or to flatter the passions and prejudices of men. This was a frequent sense of the Greek word here. Thus we say, to play tricks with an article.

V. 3, 4. If then, after all, the gospel, which the apostle preached so plainly, were 'hidden,' or 'covered with a veil,' as the Mosaic law had been; if its truth, nature, and glory, were concealed from any who heard it; those persons were evidently as yet in a lost estate, and in the most imminent danger of final perdition; and the veil must be on their hearts, through the prevalence of pride, prejudice, and ungodly lusts. Note, 3:12-16. For Satan, 'the god of this world,' &c.—It is astonishing, that many of the ancient Christian writers understood the true God to be meant, by 'the God of this world.'—This shows, that the authority of the fathers, as expositors of Scripture, is not implicitly to be depended on; and that the concessions of the first reformers in this respect greatly embarrassed their cause, in arguing against the papists.

(3.) 'Hid or obscure to them that are lost, i. e. reprobate, the true sense of the Gr. Grot. renders: "those who deserve to perish; who foster their vices, and will not see the truth, which condemns those vices." And this comes to the same thing. The early modern paraphrasts include the inference which necessarily results from hence; namely: "it is not ours nor the Gospel's fault, if they perish; and it is no proof of obscurity, or want of evidence, that they cannot perceive it."

(4.) 'By this world is meant the wicked part of it, the mere worldlings. In Satan, as the author and continual promoter of sin, sinners are, as it were, bound to yield obedience, John 12:31. 14:30, &c.' 1p.

V. 5, 6. The apostle seems especially to have adverted to his own extraordinary conversion; yet he evidently meant to include the change wrought in the minds and hearts of all other faithful ministers and true believers; which is similar in its nature and effects, and effected by the same divine power, though not attended by the same miraculous circumstances.—(v) Face.] 'The apostle continually alludes to the face of Moses, which was not uncovered, (that the Image of God might be clear,) but covered.' Beza. The face of Moses gave a feeble and transient reflection of the glory of God, which was covered with a veil: but the face of Christ, the Image of God, displays it fully and permanently to those who are divinely illuminated. 3:7-16.—'The light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ' (4), and 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God' (6), are spoken of as the same; for 'Christ and the Father are One.'

(5.) Paul had before said, "we walk not in craftiness," after which he inserted something concerning unbelievers, how they are veiled. Now then, he says: "We do not act in a tricky manner, or practise these arts, because we do not preach ourselves, as do the false teachers." For they persuaded their disciples to name themselves after them. Preach.] The Greek signifies, to act not merely as a herald, but also as an ambassador: and so the noun is used, 1 Tim. 2:7. 2 Tim. 1:11. 2 Pet. 2:5. The sense seems to be: We do not act in this business as principals, (we are rather servants to you therein, v. 6.) nor despatch as if it were a business of our own: we merely act as ambassadors and procurators on the part of another, namely, Jesus Christ. And so Grot. Doddridge's sense, "we do not make ourselves the end of our preaching," may be included.

V. 7. Eph. 3:8. Col. 2:1-4. Even the apostles and most eminent evangelists were sinners, by nature and practice; their bodies were frail and mortal, as those of other men; nor were their minds less susceptible of fear, sorrow, anxiety, and disquietude, than those of their brethren and neighbors. Acts 14:11-18, v. 15. Jam. 5:16-18. They were also conscious of many defects and impediments; and destitute of those accomplishments which the world generally admires; they had no wealth or authority; they made no show of superior genius, learning, or eloquence; nor were they delivered from the effects of indwelling sin. So far, therefore, from being such illustrious persons as to attract general admiration, they were treated as 'the filth of the world;' 8-12. 1 Cor. 4:9-13, and while their infirmities often rendered them less acceptable even to the churches, their stripes and imprisonments increased the contempt with which the proud and self-wise beheld them. This was appointed by God for most important purposes: [especially that fewer corrupt motives might influence in professed conversion;] and his power be glorified.

(7.) Earthen vessels.] 'Nothing could more aptly designate the human body. The Gr. for earthen properly signifies testaceous, as being from ostrakon, a shell; afterwards a piece of baked earth. The Platonists (says Grot.) made two bodies of a man; one the "vehicle of the soul;" the other the palpabile, or the grosser, carnal part, which we touch; and that they call the ostrakon, from its standing in the same relation to us as the shell to the fish. The Gr. for vessel, skeuos, (like the Heb. kly, 1 S. 21:6, &c.,) means a vessel or a utensil. In both these views it is here considered: the former, inasmuch as it is the depository of the soul; the latter, as being the organ, or utensil, or tool by which the human mind acts. So the Greek philosophers used it; and the Latin, vas, a vessel. Excellency of the power.] Elegantly put for exceeding great power—might evidently appear to be.'

8 We are troubled<sup>1</sup> on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but<sup>2</sup> not in despair:

9 Persecuted, but not forsaken; east down, but not destroyed;

10 Always bearing<sup>1</sup> about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that<sup>2</sup> the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.

11 For we which live are<sup>2</sup> always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh.

12 So then<sup>2</sup> death worketh in us, but life in you.

13 We having the same<sup>2</sup> spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak;

14 Knowing<sup>2</sup> that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you.

16 For which cause<sup>2</sup> we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward<sup>2</sup> man is renewed day by day.

17 For<sup>2</sup> our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;

V. 8—18. In these vs. he gives an account of their courage and patience under all their sufferings. Where observe,

I. How their sufferings, and patience under them, are declared, v. 8—12. Note, Whatever condition the children of God may be in, in this world, they have a yet not, or a 'but not' to comfort themselves with; their case sometimes is bad, yea, very bad, but not so bad as it might be. The apostle speaks of their sufferings as constant, and as a counterpart of the sufferings of Christ, v. 10. Christ's sufferings were, after a sort, acted over in theirs; thus did they bear about the dying of the Lord Jesus in their body, setting before the world [the example of suffering for goodness' sake] the great example of a suffering Christ, that the life of Jesus might also be made manifest, that people might see the power of Christ's resurrection, and the efficacy of grace in and from the living Jesus, manifested in and toward them, who did yet live, though they were always delivered to death, v. 11. and though death worked in them, v. 12. they being exposed to death, and ready to be swallowed up by death continually. Thus great were the sufferings of the apostles, that, in comparison with them, other Christians were, even at that time, in prosperous circumstances. Death worketh in us; but life in you, v. 12.

II. What kept them from sinking and fainting under their sufferings, v. 13—18.

1. Faith, v. 13. that faith which is of the operation of the Spirit; the same faith by which the saints of old did and suffered such great things. Note, Faith is a sovereign cordial in troublous times; and as we receive help and encouragement from the good words and examples of others, so we should be careful to give others a good example.

2. Hope of the resurrection, v. 14. See I Cor. 15. The hope of the resurrection will encourage us in a suffering day, and set us above the fear of death; for what reason has a good Christian to fear death, that dies in hope of a joyful resurrection?

3. The consideration of the glory of God and the benefit of the church, by means of their sufferings, v. 15. ch. 1: 6. and this did redound to God's glory. For when the church is edified, then God is glorified; and we may well afford to bear sufferings patiently and cheerfully, when we see others are the better for them,—instructed, edified, confirmed, and comforted. The sufferings of Christ's ministers, as well as their preaching and conversation, are intended for the good of the church, and the glory of God.

4. The thoughts of the advantage their souls would reap by the sufferings of their bodies, v. 16. We have every one of us an outward and an inward man, a body and a soul. If the outward man perish, there is no remedy, it must and will be so, it was made to perish. It is our happiness, if the decays of the outward man contribute to the renewing of the inward man; but the best of men have need of further renewing of the inward man, even day by day; and as in wicked men things grow every day worse and worse, so in godly men they grow better and better.

5. The prospect of eternal life and happiness was a mighty support and comfort. (1.) The apostle and his fellow-sufferers saw their afflictions working toward heaven, and that there they would end at last, v. 17. whereupon, they found their afflictions to be light, and the glory of heaven to be a far more exceeding weight. That which sense was ready to pronounce heavy and long, grievous and tedious, faith perceived to be light and short, but for a moment. On the other hand, the worth and weight of the crown of glory, as they are exceedingly great in themselves, so they are esteemed to be by the believing soul,—they far exceed all his expressions and thought; and it will be a special support, in our sufferings, when we can perceive them appointed as the way, and preparing us for the enjoyment of the future glory. (2.) Their faith enabled them to make this right judgment of things, v. 18. It is by faith that we see God, who is invisible, Heb. 11: 27. and by that we look to an unseen heaven and hell, and faith is the evidence of things not 'The true key to this [energetic and noble] passage (which may seem a digression, though very pertinent to the apostle's purpose) is this, that he aims at recovering the affections of these Corinthians, which were much alienated from him; for this purpose he freely opens his heart towards them, and tenderly represents the many and grievous pressures and hardships to which love to souls, and to theirs among the rest, exposed him.' V. 12. Death. 'To be here taken in the sense, peril of death.' 'The preaching of the Gospel exposes us to death; but unto you it brings eternal life.' So most comtrs.; and Ros. and Valpy think it the simplest interpretation. Something more profound, however, seems intended. Ros. explains, 'Wherefore, the fruit of (our) death is seen in us, but of (our) life in you. Hence, when we are tossed with perils of death, that is rather our disadvantage; but when we are freed from them, that is your advantage.' Juspis thus; 'These perils of my life tend to your consolation, that you, by my example, may learn that God sneers the wretched; and that I, delivered from these dangers, can still profit and teach you. Therefore they strengthen your faith in God.' The true, seems that of Chrys.: 'that in us the Gospel takes effect by producing trials and tribulations; but in you (thereby) it takes its effect by life, i. e. a comparative freedom from those perils and tribulations which fall to our lot.' BL. How fitly might our pilgrim fathers say this to us, their favored descendants! Ep.

V. 13—18. The apostle and his fellow-sufferers persevered in their ministry, because they were actuated by 'the same spirit of faith,' which the psalmist had expressed; when, amidst imminent dangers and distressing difficulties, he had declared his confidence, that God, according to his promise, would deliver him out of them all. Ps. 116:10, 11.—The words here used are far more emphatical, than any tr. of them can well be made. There is a repetition of the word hyperbole; by which is generally meant, a person's exceeding the limits of exact truth, in any animated description or narration; but in the subject on which the apostle spoke, the boldest figures of speech must come short of the mark. If a man proceeded from one apparent hyperbole to another, and accumulated the most energetic terms as much as possible, he could not fully express the superlative excellency of that glory, honor, and immortality, in which the believer's sufferings would assuredly terminate. Compared with it, all temporal afflictions were levity itself, 'a momentary lightness of affliction;' and earthly prosperity mere vanity and emptiness. This glory was substantial, weighty, durable, exceeding description and imagination; and human language must labor in vain to convey any suitable ideas of it. It would even have been an insupportable 'weight' to them, until their bodies and souls were prepared by Omnipotence to sustain it. It was a 'weight of glory,' a fulness of God, a measure of knowledge, holiness, dignity, and felicity, in his favor and presence, and according to his glorious excellency and beauty; adequate to whatever they should be made capable of possessing and enjoying; and all this would be unchangeable and eternal [in progress].—'What an influence Paul's Hebrew had on his Greek, is everywhere visible. Cabad, in Hebrew, signifies to be heavy, and to be glorious. . . . Paul, in the Greek, joins them, and says, "weight of glory." Locke.—That the writers of the N. T. frequently hebraize, so to speak, is manifest; but whether this might not, in some cases, be intentional, may be questioned. Even the copious Greek, as found in the most admired pagan writers, could not have expressed, in full energy, many of the apostle's exalted conceptions, without some of those sublime allusions and metaphors, which are found only in the Hebrew scriptures, or in the N. T. exclusively. SCOTT.

'Let us admire the beauty of the position, and see how the good is set against the evil, like two scales differently filled. Here is a feather against lead,—a grain of sand against the universe,—a moment against eternity. Oh, how the scale that contains this world's light trouble kicks the beam, when set in competition with the glory which shall be revealed in us!' HANNAH MORE.

(16.) Renewed. 'This has nothing to do with the renovation implied by "regeneration," [but rather imports progressive sanctification, which follows the instantaneous act of regeneration. En.] Chrys. rightly explains it, by a holy confidence resulting from former deliverances, and an implicit faith, united with an anticipation of the glory that shall be revealed.' BL. In all which the Holy Spirit co-operates. Ep.

(17.) 'This v. and the next contain a passage, which, in energy and beauty of expression, is little inferior to any one of Demosthenes himself, to whom, indeed, and to Thucydides, in his orations, the style of the apostle, when it rises, as here, to the oratorical, bears no slight resemblance.' BL. 'This is one of the most emphatic passages in all Paul's writings, in which he speaks as much like an orator, as he does as an apostle. The lightness of the trial is expressed by "the lightness of our affliction;" as if he had said, it is even levity itself in such a comparison. On the other hand, the kath' hyperbolēn eis hyperbolēn [from hyperbole to hyperbole], which we render far more exceeding, is infinitely emphatical, and cannot be fully expressed by any tr., [Paul's thoughts overleaping the limits both of grammar and language itself.] It signifies, that all hyperboles fall short of describing that weight of eternal glory, so solid and lasting, that you may pass from hyperbole to hyperbole, and yet, when you have gained the last, are infinitely below it.' CHAP. V. V. 1—11. The apostle, in these vs. pursues the argument of the former ch., concerning the grounds of their courage and patience under afflictions. And,

1. He mentions their expectation, and desire, and assurance, of eternal happiness after death, v. 1—5. Observe,

1. The believer's expectation of eternal happiness after death, v. 1. He is not only well assured by faith of the truth and reality of the thing itself, that there is another and a happy life after this present life is ended; but he has good hope through grace of his interest in that everlasting blessedness of the unseen world. Note, Heaven is, in the eye and hope of a believer, a house, or habitation; a dwelling-place, resting-place, hiding place; our Father's house, where are many mansions, our everlasting home; a house in the heavens, in that high and holy place, which as far excels all the palaces of earth, as the heavens are high above the earth; a building of God, and therefore worthy of its Author; what God hath prepared for them that love Him: it is eternal in the heavens, not like earthly tabernacles, the poor cottages of clay, in which our souls now dwell, that are mouldering and decaying, whose foundations are in the dust. Further, This happiness shall be enjoyed immediately after death; so soon as our house of this earthly tabernacle is dissolved.

2. The believer's earnest desire after this future blessedness, which is expressed by this word we groan; which denotes, (1.) A groaning of sorrow under a heavy load; so believers groan under the burden of life; in this we groan earnestly, v. 2. in this tabernacle we groan, being burdened, v. 4. burdened with this body of flesh, the calamities of life, burdened with a body of sin, and many corruptions still remaining and raging. Rom. 7:24. (2.) Groaning with desire after the happiness of another life, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, v. 2. to obtain a blessed immortality, that mortality might be swallowed up of life, v. 4. that being found clothed, we shall not be naked, v. 3. that, if it were the will of God, we might not sleep, but be changed; for death, considered merely as a separation of soul and body, is not to be desired, [for we may do others and ourselves much good in life,] but dreaded rather; yet, considered as a passage to glory, the believer is willing rather to die than live, to be absent from the body that he may be present with the Lord, v. 8. to leave this body, that he may go to Christ, and to put off these rags of mortality, that he may put on the robes of glory. Note, Death will strip us of all the comforts of life, as well as end all our troubles here below. But, (3.) Gracious souls are not found naked in the other world; no, they are clothed with garments of praise, with robes of righteousness and glory, washed white in the blood of the Lamb, Rev. 7:14.

3. The believer's assurance of his interest in this future blessedness, on a double account; (1.) From the experience of the grace

PRACT. OBS. They are not proper persons for the sacred ministry of 'the N. T.,' who do not expect the salvation of their own souls from the free mercy of God through Jesus Christ. — The Lord puts the treasure of heavenly truth into mean, earthly vessels. He often employs persons of infirm bodies, moderate abilities, or low rank in society, even such as worldly policy would reject and despise; for, whatever instrument be selected, He will make it appear, that the 'excellency of the power,' by which the Gospel is made successful, is of 'God, and not of men.' (P. O. 1 Cor. 2:1—9.) He therefore uses various methods to convince his most useful servants of their own weakness and insufficiency; and sometimes He makes their infirmities visible to others, that they may not give them undue honor and respect. 12:7—10. P. O. 1—10.—In one way or other, both Christians and ministers must be troubled; and sometimes it will be 'on every side.' Yet faith and grace will preserve them.—Nothing can be done in the spiritual warfare in which we are engaged, without the 'same spirit of faith,' which animated the ancient prophets, apostles, and martyrs of Jesus; we shall be timid, hesitating, and wavering in our testimony, unless we can firmly say, 'I believed, and therefore have I spoken.' But when we are fully assured of the truth, importance, and excellency of the Gospel, nothing can durably prevail with us to retract, alter, or conceal the great doctrines which we are called to preach or profess. Yet true religion does not require us to neglect our real interest.—But if the apostle call his heavy and long-continued trials, 'light affliction, and but for a moment,' what must our trifling difficulties appear in the estimate of faith and grace? How shameful then is it, that we complain or despond under them! What powerful supports and consolations must there be in the hope and earnest of heaven, beyond what we have hitherto experienced! SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1—4. As the apostle spoke of what was to follow immediately on the dissolution of the body by death, he must be supposed to mean the state of the immortal soul, before as well as after the resurrection, for the language is figurative, and must not be confined by too literal an interpretation.—The passage, being expressed in metaphors unusually bold, is indeed rather difficult; yet the above [as in Henry] seems the evident meaning. Nor does it appear, that the apostle intended to express any expectation, that the day of judgment and the general resurrection were at hand; or to determine anything concerning the manner, as to external circumstances, in which the soul subsists, either before or after that solemn season.—The word 'naked,' may allude to Adam and Eve, after they had eaten the forbidden fruit, and lost the robe of innocence; whereas believers, being 'made the righteousness of God in Christ,' will not be thus 'found naked,' in whatever manner they leave this world. (3.) 'As the Pythagoreans compared the body to a tent (or hut), so did the Platonists liken it to a vestment. So Paul changes the metaphor here.' BL. '1. The Heb. ubsh, signifies surround with a thing, or furnished. 2. The Jews ascribe to the soul a vestment both in this life and the next. 3. They maintain the pre-existence of both, i. e. affirm that the soul has already a covering, while as yet hidden under the throne of God, and as yet not clothed with a body. 4. This vestment is no other than what we call the image of God, which was lost by the fall, and is to be restored in the next life. 5. After the fall, Adam and all men are stripped of this, as long as they remain in sin, and then they are said to be naked. 6. The good are clothed therewith, as soon as the Shechinah begins to dwell in them. 7. When they are clothed therewith, then they are enabled to perform good works, nay, even sometimes to work miracles. 8. Hence it is the duty of every one to preserve this vestment pure, and, as far as lies in him, without spot. 9. In life eternal, this will be a vestment for the soul, or rather an ornament assigned to it for the virtues practised in this world. 10. This celestial vestment they describe as lucid, and radiant, such as on this earth no one can attain. 11. It is necessary for the soul to be clothed with this vestment, for, till it is clothed therewith, it cannot behold the majesty of God. And so the apostle himself, 1 Cor. 15:53. says, it is necessary for this mortal to put on immortality.—Since, therefore, P. speaks both of an habitation, and a vestment, with which he is to be clothed, it is obvious he means, not a corporeal, but a spiritual vestment, clothed with which he desires to enter the heavenly kingdom.' SCHOETTGEN.

The ancient comtrs. understand, "if indeed it may so be that, after assuming this corruptible body, we shall be not found deprived of glory and acceptance. For all men (say they) will put on the clothing of incorruption, but all will not partake of the divine glory." But the ellipsis required here is too arbitrary: and so of Doddr.'s "naked, and exposed to any evil or inconvenience." To tr. (with others) "be found clothed upon, not naked," destroys the construction. The v. is parenthetical, and expressed with that profound and heartfelt humility which everywhere distinguishes the apostle; yet I assent to the ancients, that it was meant to inculcate a lesson of humility on the Corinthians, and so compares with 1 Cor. 9:27. Naked. Gumnoi: some (both of ancients and moderns) infer from this term, (and not without countenance from the context,) that the wicked will be left not only gumnoi, as regards the incorruptible body, but even as regards any body, at all, i. e. will not be clothed with their former mortal body, and that on the soul (which alone then remains) will be inflicted such punishments as God shall in justice award. And so I once, too arbitrarily, tr. "(Hoping) if so be that after having put off (our mortal and corruptible body), we may not be found (by the Lord at the day of judgment) naked, and without a body, (as the wicked.)" I now rather assent to the generality of ancient and modern comtrs., (see Stade,) who think the term does not necessarily imply, that the unfaithful and rejected will have no bodies at all; only that they will be naked, as far as regards a heavenly body, that they will not be clothed upon, in Paul's sense. This the preceding words strongly countenance. Hence nothing can be with certainty pronounced on the nature of the resurrection of the wicked; at least, nothing is here said with any reference to them. Their state must be decided by other passages; yet we may observe, there is no occasion to suppose their bodies will not be raised, as well as those of the righteous.' BL., whom see. ED.

(4.) 'For (I repeat) while we are in this hut, or shed, though groaning under the weight of many afflictions, yet our wish is not so much to put off this body, and thereby be rid of these evils, but rather our anxiety is to put on an heavenly garment, even our incorruptible body.' And 'Physical Theory of Another Life.' In V. 5—8. That change of judgment and affections, by which the apostle and his brethren had been 'wrought,' or fashioned, into a fitness for their perilous and suffering employments, and to a willingness to die for Christ's sake, in the assurance of going to enjoy felicity in his favor, was the work of God Himself, and could have been effected by no other agent. 11 Knowing therefore the terror <sup>m</sup> of the Lord, we persuade men; but <sup>n</sup> we are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

12 For <sup>o</sup> we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory in <sup>p</sup> appearance, and not in heart.

13 For whether we be beside <sup>q</sup> ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.

14 For the love of Christ <sup>r</sup> constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then <sup>s</sup> were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that <sup>t</sup> they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

of God, in preparing and making him meet for this blessedness, v. 5. All who are designed for heaven hereafter, are wrought or prepared for heaven while here. And he that hath wrought us for this, is God; because nothing less than a divine power can make a soul partaker of a divine nature. A great deal is to be done to prepare our souls for heaven, and that preparation of the heart is from the Lord. (2.) The earnest of the Spirit gave them this assurance; for an earnest the Deity of the Holy Spirit, by whom we are sanctified.—This is absolutely decisive, concerning the felicity to be enjoyed by the souls of believers when 'absent from the body;' and it also shows that they will possess their happiness in the very place where Jesus displays his glorious presence.—The words 'at home,' (6) seem not well chosen. This world is not the believer's home, but the place of sojourning and pilgrimage, and his body is the tabernacle in which he sojourns. SCOTT.

On the other hand, they would have interpreted his silence, as the effect of guilt and confusion. II. An inference for the comfort of believers, in this world, v. 6—8.

1. Their present state and condition; they are absent from the Lord, v. 6. pilgrims and strangers in this world; and though God is with us here, by his Spirit, and in his ordinances, yet we are not with Him as we hope to be, v. 7. We have not the vision and fruition of God, as of an object that is present with us, and as we hope for hereafter, when we shall see as we are seen. Faith is for this world, sight for the other world; and it is our duty, and will be our interest, to walk by faith, till we come to live by sight.

2. How comfortable and courageous we ought to be in all the troubles of life, and in the hour of death, v. 6. and again, v. 8. We are confident and willing, rather, to be absent from the body. True Christians, if they duly consider the prospect faith gives them of another world, and the good reasons of their hope of blessedness after death, would be comforted under the troubles of life, and supported in the hour of death; they should take courage, when they are encountering the last enemy; and be willing rather to die than live, when it is the will of God that they should put off this tabernacle; it is but being absent from the body, and we shall very soon be present with the Lord; but to die, and be with Christ; but to close our eyes in this world, and open them in a world of glory. Faith will be turned into sight.

III. An inference to excite and quicken himself and others to duty, v. 9—11. Well-grounded hopes of heaven, far from giving the least encouragement to sloth and sinful security, should stir us up to the greatest care and diligence in religion; Wherefore, or because we hope to be present with the Lord, we labor and take pains, v. 9.—We are ambitious, and labor as industriously as the most ambitious men do to obtain what they aim at. Here observe,

1. What it was the apostle was thus ambitious of, acceptance with God, v. 9. This [he and his brethren] coveted, as the greatest favor, and the highest honor; it was the top of their ambition.

2. What further quickening motives they had to excite their diligence, from the consideration of the judgment to come, v. 10, 11. There are many things relating to this great matter, that should awe the best of men into the utmost care and diligence in religion; the certainty of this judgment, for we must appear; the universality of it, for we must all appear; the great Judge, before whose judgment-seat we must appear, the Lord Jesus Christ, who Himself will appear in flaming fire; the recompense to be then received, for things done in the body; which will be very particular unto every one; and very just, according to what we have done, miration of the vulgar, and of which it seems the false teachers boasted; whilst deficient in the qualities of the heart, viz., sincerity, honesty, disinterestedness, benevolence, and [supreme] concern for the glory of God.' MACKN.

V. 13—15. The love which Jesus had manifested towards sinners in the great work of redemption, and to believers in calling them to partake of this inestimable blessing, had excited in their hearts such reciprocal admiring love, and adoring gratitude to Him, as 'constrained them,' and carried them on with invincible energy in every service, by which they could glorify his name or promote his cause; nor could any fears, hopes, affections, or interests stop their progress, when actuated by this most powerful principle. (14) Constraineth. 'It possesses us entirely, and as seized on by its influence (afflatu) we do all things.' SCOTT.

(13.) 'You say, I am distracted for my present conduct; but this is between God and myself; I am sure you Corinthians ought not to say it; for all my sober thoughts and most painful labors are for you.' LOCKE. See, however, BL.

(14.) Of. 'I. e. similar to Christ: since we reason and think that, if One died for (i. e. in the place of) all, as an expiation and atonement for the sins of all,—not merely for the moral benefit of his example, like Socrates, according to recent glosses!' BLOOMF.

(15.) To themselves. 'I. e. subservient to their own [simply selfish or] carnal inclinations, as opposed to Christ's plans for their spiritual regeneration.' ED.

V. 16. The apostle and his fellow-laborers, therefore, being under such immense obligations, influenced by such strong motives, and en-whether good or bad. The apostle calls this awful judgment the terror of the Lord, v. 11. and, by the consideration thereof, was excited to persuade men to repent, and live a holy life, that, when Christ shall appear terribly, they may appear before Him comfortably. And concerning his fidelity and diligence, he comfortably appeals unto God, and the consciences of those he wrote to, v. 11.

V. 12—15. Here observe,

1. The apostle makes an apology for seeming to commend himself and his fellow-laborers, v. 12. and tells them it was not for that, that he had spoken of their fidelity and diligence, nor was he willing to suspect their good opinion of him; but he would put an argument in their mouths, wherewith to answer his accusers, who made vain boastings, and gloried in appearances only; he would give them an occasion to glory on their behalf, or to defend them against the reproaches of their adversaries. And if the people can say the Word has been manifested to their consciences, and been effectual to their conversion and edification, this is the best defence they can make for the ministry of the Word, when they are vilified and reproached.

2. He gives good reasons for their great zeal and diligence. Some, it is likely, had reproached him for his zeal and fervor, imputing it all to enthusiasm, as the Roman governor. Acts 26:24. But he tells them, (1.) It was for the glory of God, and the good of the church, that he was thus zealous and industrious, v. 13. If they manifested the greatest ardor and vehemency at some times, and used the greatest calmness in strong reasonings at other times, it was for the best ends; and in both methods they had good reason for what they did. For, (2.) The love of Christ constrained them, v. 14. They were under the sweetest and strongest constraints to do what they did. Our love to Christ will have this virtue; and Christ's love to us, which was manifested in this great instance of his dying for us, will have this effect on us, if it be duly considered and rightly judged of. For observe, how the apostle argues for the reasonableness of love's constraints; and declares, [1.] What we were before, and must have continued to be, had not Christ died for us, v. 14. the deplorable condition of all those whom Christ died for; they were lost and undone, dead and ruined. [2.] Such, then, should live to Him, v. 15. We should not make ourselves, but Christ, the end of our living and actions; and it was one end of Christ's death, to cure us of this self-love, and to excite us always to act under the commanding influence of his love.

V. 16—21. In these vs. the apostle mentions two things that are necessary, in order to our living to Christ, both of which are the consequences of Christ's dying for us,—regeneration, and reconciliation.

though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; we behold, all things are become new.

18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation;

19 To wit, that God was, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them: and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, Be ye reconciled to God.

I. Regeneration, which consists in,

1. Weanedness from the world, v. 16. We do not own, or affect, any person or thing in this world for carnal ends and outward advantage; we are enabled, by divine grace, not to mind or regard this world, or the things of the world, but to live above it. Christians must enjoy the comforts of this life, and their relations in this world, with a holy indifferency; Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet, says the apostle, we know Him no more. It is questioned whether Paul had seen Christ in the flesh;—but the rest of the apostles had, and so might some among those he was now writing to. However, he would not have them value themselves on that account; for even the bodily presence of Christ is not to be doted on, but we must live on his spiritual presence. Note, Those who make images of Christ, and use them in their worship, do not take the way God has appointed to strengthen their faith and quicken their affections; for it is the will of God that we should not know Christ any more after the flesh.

2. A thorough change of the heart; For if any man be in Christ, if any man be a Christian indeed, and will approve himself such, he is, or he must be, a new creature, v. 17. (Some read it, Let him be a new creature.) And so great is the change the grace of God makes in the soul, that, as it follows, old things are passed away, old thoughts, old principles, and old practices, are passed away; and all these things must become new. Regenerating grace creates a new world in the soul; all things are new. The renewed man acts from new principles, by new rules, with new ends, and in new company.

II. Reconciliation; here spoken of under a double notion.

1. As an unquestionable privilege, v. 18, 19. Reconciliation supposes a quarrel, and sin has broken the friendship between God and man. The heart of the sinner is filled with enmity against God, and God is justly offended with the sinner. Yet, behold, there may be a reconciliation; the offended Majesty of heaven is willing to be reconciled. And observe, (1.) He has appointed the Mediator of reconciliation,—Jesus Christ, v. 18. By Him God has reconciled the world to Himself, put Himself into a capacity of being actually reconciled to offenders, without any wrong or injury to his justice or holiness; and does not impute to men their trespasses, but recedes from the rigor of the first covenant, which was broken, and does not insist on the advantage He might justly take against us for the breach of that covenant, but is willing to enter into a new treaty, and into a new covenant of grace, and, according to the tenor thereof, freely to forgive us all our sins, and justify freely by his grace all those who do believe. (2.) He has appointed the ministry of reconciliation, v. 18. the Scriptures, which contain the Word of reconciliation; and the ministry, which is a ministry of reconciliation; ministers are to open and proclaim to sinners the terms of mercy and reconciliation, and persuade them to comply therewith. For,

2. Reconciliation is here spoken of as our indispensable duty, v. 20. As God is willing to be reconciled to us, we ought to be reconciled to God; and this is the great end and design of the Gospel. Faithful ministers are Christ's ambassadors, sent to treat with sinners on peace and reconciliation; they come in God's name, with his entreaties, and act in Christ's stead, doing the very thing He did on earth, and what, now that He is in heaven, He wills to be done. Wonderful condescension! Though God can be no loser by the quarrel, nor gainer by the peace, yet by his ministers He beseeches sinners to lay aside their enmity, and be reconciled to Him, to all his attributes, laws, providences; to believe in the Mediator, accept the atonement, and comply with his Gospel, in all the parts of it, and in the whole design of it. And for our encouragement so to do, the apostle subjoins what should be well known and duly considered by us, v. 21. namely, The purity of the Mediator, that He knew no sin; the sacrifice He offered, He was made Sin for us, not a sinner, but Sin, a Sin-offering, a Sacrifice for sin; the end and design of all this, that we might be made the righteousness couraged by such animating hopes, and assurances of assistance, as had been stated, were powerfully impelled to disregard all contrary and interfering objects, that they might show their love to their most gracious Lord and Savior. So that, these principles having been matured in them, they knew no man after the flesh; they had no respect to men's persons, because of nation, sect, rank, or personal attachment, when their obedience to Christ was concerned; they could not accommodate their doctrine or conduct to the humors of men, from any worldly principles, or because of outward connexions with them, or obligations to them. Nay, they did not now regard their external relation to Christ Himself, as being of the same nation with Him, or otherwise acquainted with Him. Even such of the apostles and evangelists as had personally known Him, or been nearly related to Him, did in this respect disregard that external tie, when it came in competition with their union with Him as believers, and their obedience to Him as his servants and ministers. They could not warp their doctrine, or deviate from their instructions, to please the Jews, or the nearest relatives of Christ, any more, than out of respect to their own friends, or to the philosophers, or the princes of the Gentiles. Deut. 33:9. Mat. 12:46—50. Mk. 3:31—35. Lu. 11:27, 28. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22.—Many suppose the apostle here referred to the Jewish converts, who were displeased with him for admitting the Gentiles into the church, and being earnest for their conversion, which they deemed a kind of madness (13); but the Christians at Corinth were chiefly Gentile converts, and they do not seem to have been generally disposed to Judaize.

SCOTT.

(16.) The sense of this v. is not a little obscure, from brevity of expression, and the Hebraic and mystic nature of the phraseology. And, from the extreme flexibility of the terms, it is easier to devise a tolerable sense, than to ascertain and establish the true one. Most moderns rightly maintain, the words are to be understood of Paul, or at most his brother apostles who had forsaken the errors of Judaism. After the flesh. It refers (and so Grot.) to those things on which men, nay, even teachers of religion, sometimes pride themselves, namely, external qualifications, as of form, appearance, learning, eloquence, wealth, rank, and all other carnal advantages. Others take it to refer to the opinions of the apostles, &c. before Christ's resurrection, that his kingdom was temporal. Grot. and most recent contrs. render, "nay, though we had known Christ in the flesh, had conversed with Him on earth, and enjoyed the benefits of his personal instruction, yet we should now recognise Him no longer as the Jesus we knew, but as the glorified Savior and Judge of men, and the heavenly King." Ros. thinks it levelled against teachers at Corinth, who, proud of having had the personal converse of Christ, and perhaps relationship, affected to lord it over others. 1 Cor. 1:12. In Christ. I. e. admitted (by baptism) into the society of Christ and his followers, ingrafted into Christ by the Spirit of Christ, become a Christian.

BLOOMF.

V. 17. The judgment, experience, and principles, which the apostle had stated, should not be regarded as peculiar to him or his friends, but as the standard of genuine Christianity; therefore, 'if any man,' whether Jew or Gentile, was 'in Christ,' as a justified believer, he was also 'a new creature,' or a new creation of God. Rom. 8:1, 2. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Ps 51:10. Gal. 6:15, 16. Eph. 2:4—10. By spiritual illumination, and its invariable effects, a new judgment had been produced, with new inclinations, new affections, and purposes, from which new words and actions must proceed. Rev. 21:1—3. So that the Christian experienced new hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, desires and aversions; he learned to speak a new language, to choose new companions, to act from new motives,—to aim at new objects, and to attend to new employments. Everything was now cast into a new mould, received a new impression, and took a new direction, from the knowledge of God, from faith in Christ and love to Him; from humiliation for sin, and hatred of it, and from the desire of holiness, and the hope of eternal life. Ez. 11:17—20. 18:30—32. 36:25—27. Jn. 3:3—8. Rom. 6:3, 4.—The marg. reading, 'Let him be a new creature,' can in no way be made to accord with what follows, 'Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new, &c.'

SCOTT.

V. 18—21. As the change above described had been wrought by the power, and according to the purpose of God, so it bore on it the stamp of his holy image, and led to a proper state of mind, heart, and conduct towards Him. 'God was in Christ,' (19) 'manifested in the flesh.'—The fullness of the Deity dwelt in and was displayed by the human nature, through the incarnation of the eternal Word and Son of God, as One with the Father; that so, being one with man in human nature, He might 'reconcile the world unto Himself,' by his atonement, mediation, and grace, and that sinners throughout the earth, of every nation and description, might thus be encouraged to hope in his mercy, and taught by his grace to love his holy perfections, law, worship, and service, to which their carnal minds had before been enmity. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:5—9. V. 21. contains most conclusive arguments, in proof of the vicarious sufferings of Christ, as the satisfactory atonement to divine justice for our sins, of the imputation of his perfect righteousness to believers, as their title to eternal life, and of his real Deity, whose righteousness becomes theirs for justification, by virtue of their union with Him. Perhaps stronger language cannot be used, in declaring these doctrines, by those who most zealously contend for them.—The preposition here used, is tr. 'instead,' in the preceding v. 'in Christ's stead,' or instead of Christ. Thus He suffered instead of us. 1 Pet. 3:18. Gr.—The apostle doubtless spoke primarily of himself, and his fellow-laborers, as 'the ambassadors of Christ,' yet, as all faithful ministers are entrusted with the same message, by the same authority, so they too are ambassadors, or envoys and messengers for Christ, though to a smaller number of their fellow-sinners.—Some of the professed Christians at Corinth, were supposed by Paul to be unconverted, and unreconciled to God, and he might have them in view, when he spake of God's beseeching sinners by his ministers. But he was evidently giving an account of his commission and general ministry, through the nations of the earth; wherever he came, he addressed sinners in this pathetic and earnest manner, and while 'he prayed them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God,' it was as if God Himself had besought them to lay aside their enmity, and accept of his mercy.—The change of the language, 'ambassadors for Christ,' 'God beseeches you, we pray you in Christ's stead, &c.' shows how familiar it was to the apostle to consider his divine Lord and Master, as One with the Father, in Deity and authority. Made Him to be sin. Rom. 8:3. Heb. 10:6, 8. Hamartia is often used in the LXX, for 'a sin-offering,' which circumstance is a strong corroboration of the doctrine of reciprocal imputation, as most emphatically stated in this v. our sins imputed to the divine Savior, and his righteousness imputed to all true believers.—Be made. 'Become.' Jn. 1:14. Id.

21 For <sup>b</sup> he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made <sup>c</sup> the righteousness of God in him.

PRACT. OBS. It is most animating for us to 'know,' amidst our sufferings, temptations, conflicts, and perils of death, that whenever we die we shall enter into the heavens, and be admitted to an unspeakable felicity; and this evidently may be known, with such certainty, as to produce habitual courage and confidence, even in the greatest dangers, and most evident approaches of death, in its most formidable appearances; but our assurance or prevailing hope of this, must be proportioned to the evidence of our conversion.—At present we may 'choose whom we will serve,' and what we will do; but, as we must die, so we must stand in judgment, and no more choice will be left us than is left to the criminal, whether he will or will not, he tried, condemned, or punished for his crimes. The expectation of this solemn time of righteous retribution should render all men earnest and diligent, in 'working out their own salvation with fear and trembling,' lest any 'should seem to come short of it;' but especially it should excite ministers to be unwearied and faithful in their work; and, knowing what a tremendous day it will be to all the workers of iniquity, they should be the more earnest and affectionate, in their persuasions and warnings.—If earnestness bring on us the charge of being 'beside ourselves,' we need only inquire, whether our conduct be warranted by the Word of God, and spring from a regard to his authority and glory, and whether our most vehement affections and addresses, as well as our more cool and temperate reasonings, are really intended to promote the salvation of souls. If this be the case, we may venture to disregard the contumely; and we should pray for our revilers, that they may indeed 'come to themselves,' and be delivered from that insanity, under which all unbelievers are held.—All partialities, from external relations or connexions, patronage or obligations, hopes or fears, which tempt the minister to waver in his testimony, or the Christian in his obedience, are inconsistent with a proper regard to the Lord Jesus; and, in this sense, we should 'henceforth know no man after the flesh,' whatever claim he may seem to have to our special regard. Mat. 10:37—39. Lu. 14:25—27.—The justified believer is 'a new

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The word tr. 'grace,' signifies any peculiar, undeserved favor; and when it is used for the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, it implies that this is a special, undeserved favor. The unspeakable love of God to sinners, in the redemption by his Son, and in the appointment of 'the ministry of reconciliation,' and the mercy shown to those, whom He thus 'besought to be reconciled to Him,' would he altogether in vain, to all those who 'neglected so great salvation.' (Heb. 2:1—4, v. 3.) The apostle feared, that this had hitherto been the case of some professed Christians at Corinth; and doubtless many such would at length read or hear his epistle; whom therefore, he most earnestly exhorted and entreated, not to render all the advantages set before them ineffectual to themselves, by persisting in unbelief; but that they would, without delay, while the Word of God was faithfully preached to them, embrace the proposals of mercy and grace set before them. For as Jehovah had assured the Messiah, according to the revelation made by the prophet, that He had 'heard Him in an acceptable time, and succored Him in a day of salvation,' with a special reference to his intercession for the Gentiles, after his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, (Is. 49:7, 8.) so the present season of abundant spiritual advantages might be considered by the Corinthians, as 'an accepted time, and a day of salvation' to all, who sought an interest in the blessings of the Redeemer's kingdom. But those who refused the embassy of peace, or were satisfied with a formal assent, a dead and unholy faith, might expect to be speedily punished as the enemies of Christ.

SCOTT. (1.) Grace.] 'The gracious offer of salvation, and opportunity thereof, the grace contained in the Gospel, and reconciliation with God, offered through Christ, 5:18—21. Grace of every kind, both ordinary, as in of God in Him, might be justified freely by the grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. Note, As Christ, who knew no sin of his own, was made Sin for us, so we, who have no righteousness of our own, are made the righteousness of God in Him. Our reconciliation to God is only through Jesus Christ, and for the sake of his merit; on Him therefore we must rely, and make mention of his righteousness, and his only.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—10. In these vs. we have the apostle's general errand and exhortation in every place where he came, with the several arguments and methods he used.

1. His errand or exhortation, namely, to comply with the gospel-offers of reconciliation, v. 1. And as it is the duty of the ministers of the Gospel to exhort and persuade their hearers to accept of the grace and mercy offered, so they are honored with this high title, of co-workers with God. 1. They must work, and work for God, and with God, yet under Him, as instruments only; however, if faithful, they may hope to find God working with them, and their labor will be effectual. 2. Observe the language and way of the spirit of the Gospel; it is not with roughness and severity, but with all mildness and gentleness, to beseech and entreat, to use exhortations and arguments, in order to prevail with sinners, and overcome their natural unwillingness to be reconciled to God, and to be happy for ever.

11. His arguments and method.

1. The present time is the only proper season to accept of grace and salvation. The morrow is none of ours; we know not what will be on the morrow, nor where we shall be; and we should remember that present seasons of grace are short and uncertain, and cannot be recalled when past. It is therefore our duty and interest to improve them while we enjoy them, and no less than our salvation depends on our so doing.

2. What caution they used, not to give offence, and hinder the success of their preaching, v. 3. When others are too apt to take offence, as the Jews were on the one hand, and the Gentiles on the other, against the apostles, we should be cautious lest we give offence; and ministers especially should be careful lest they do anything that may bring blame on their ministry, or render that unsuccessful.

3. Their constant aim and endeavor in all things to approve themselves faithful, as became the ministers of God, v. 4. Ministers of the Gospel should look upon themselves as God's servants or ministers, and act in everything suitable to that character. So did the apostle.

(1.) By much patience in afflictions, of which he met with many, often in necessities, wanting the conveniences, if not the neces-

creature' in a new world; his new relation to Christ, to the church, and to heavenly things, together with his new obligations, interests, pursuits, principles, and satisfactions, have superseded those, which formerly prevailed. Even the same actions are now performed from new motives and in a new manner, from what they before were; his attention to relative and social duties, and his diligence in worldly business, spring from new purposes, and receive a new direction. Nay, when, baffled by temptation, he falls into sin; his grief, his shame, his distress, and remorse, are altogether new, and such as before he never had experienced. His heart was then stone, now living flesh; and sensibilities wholly new arise from this important change.—Every good gift comes from God, and to Him the whole glory belongs. Enmity to God began wholly on man's part; but the reconciliation was entirely devised, revealed, and effected by his offended Sovereign; and the language of our God and Savior, by his ministers, to his feeble but haughty enemies, must appear wonderful beyond conception to the holy inhabitants of heaven; yet the reception with which it often meets, and the contempt and disdain which it excites, must exceedingly increase their astonishment, and it will assuredly satisfy them, concerning the propriety and equity of punishing the irreconcilable haters of God, 'with everlasting destruction from his presence.' Let sinners then hear the voice of God, 'heseeching them to be reconciled;' let the trembling penitent rejoice in the assurance, that his application for 'peace with God will not be rejected.' Let professed Christians examine their supposed interest in Christ, the great Reconciler, by inquiring whether they are become the friends of God, his cause, and his people; let ministers not only 'warn men by the terror of the Lord,' but beseech them by his abundant mercies, to repent and turn unto Him; and let believers consider, whether God can now withhold any good thing from them, or whether they can venture, lose, labor, or suffer too much, for Him who gave his beloved Son for their sins. *13—15. the case of Christians in general, and extraordinary, which was confined to the apostolic age. See the able note of Whitby, here, and the masterly Appendix, in which he has successfully shown that God, in every succeeding age, has vouchsafed to men, not only the outward dispensations of his Word, to be the ordinary means of their conversion and sanctification, but also some inward assistances and operations of the Holy Spirit. In this he shows, that these assistances may be so explained, as to be no more unintelligible than are all the influences of God, on the soul, or the temptations of the devil. Bl.—In vain.] 'Without any fruit or benefit to you:' they must improve every gift and influence of the Spirit. Bl. expl. not so to act, as to seem to have received grace in vain. (2.) 'The words of the prophet (Is. 49:8.) are adduced in their spiritual and mystical sense, such as has always been assigned to them, even by the Jewish interpreters. "Now is (eminently) the accepted time, and the day of salvation; since now it is offered, by those whose divine mission is confirmed by signs and wonders, and mighty deeds." Though, in a certain sense, the present is the only accepted time, or day of salvation, because on the future we cannot calculate. Heard.] Epikousa: hearkened to, and granted help. This notion of listening to or granting the request, seems contained in the epi, which is expressed in our phrase, "lend an ear." Thus hearken comes from hear, and ken, (to know or mind.)

V. 3—10. The whole universe, if they had been the proprietors of it, could have afforded them nothing more, as conducive to their real good, than what they actually enjoyed or expected. (1 Cor. 3:18—23.) Thus the whole of their temper and conduct, in the varied circumstances through which they passed, combined to show, that their doctrine had a blessed effect on their own souls; and rendered them holy, beneficent, useful, and happy.—The animation, sublimity, pathos, and energy of expression, in this beautiful passage, have been generally and justly admired; and it shows how full the apostle's heart was of holy affections; and how open and communicative, in speaking on these interesting top-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—10. It is the peculiar honor of faithful ministers and zealous Christians, most willingly to labor in concert with their Lord, and with each other; but tempters, seducers, false teachers, persecutors, scoffers, and all who oppose or disgrace the cause of God, are fellow-workers of the devil.—To prevent this fatal consequence [failure of salvation], as far as we are able, we should warn, expostulate, persuade, entreat, and exhort men, by all the means which we can devise, to attend [at once] to 'this one thing needful.'—It is peculiarly incumbent on all who preach this great salvation, to 'give no offence in anything,' except by their faithfulness, 'that the ministry be not blamed;' and in all things to approve themselves, as the ministers of God, who are sent to show the descendants of fallen Adam the way of eternal life. 1 Cor. 10:29—33.—But alas! how very few of those, who wear the garb or bear the office of ministers, answer this description [of the apostle]! How very many are the exact reverse of it! How often do even the preachers of the Gospel give such offence, and cause such scandals, by their evident, allowed, and habitual misconduct, that 'the
